

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

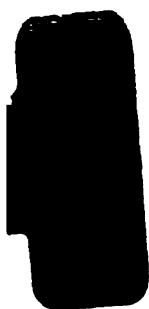

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION, COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

AND

HOUSE OF LORDS,

FROM AUGUST 5, 1891, TO AUGUST 9, 1892.

REPORTED BY

MIDDLETON RETTIE, JAMES PATTEN MACDOUGALL,
H. J. E. FRASER, GEORGE R. GILLESPIE, AND JOHN DAVID SYM, ESQUIRES, ADVOCATES.

Stanford Library

FOURTH SERIES.—VOL. XIX.

EDINBURGH:

T. & T. CLARK, LAW BOOKSELLERS.

LONDON: STEVENS & SONS.

M.DCCC.XCII.

PRINTED BY GEORGE ROBB & CO., THISTLE STREET, EDINBURGH.

279728

1900

1900

J U D G E S
OF THE
COURT OF SESSION
DURING THE PERIOD OF THESE REPORTS.

FIRST DIVISION.

Lord President, The Right Hon. J. P. B. ROBERTSON.
Lord ADAM.
Lord M'LAREN.
Lord KINNEAR.

SECOND DIVISION.

Lord Justice-Clerk, { The Right Hon. J. H. A.
MACDONALD.
Lord YOUNG.
Lord RUTHERFURD CLARK.
Lord TRAYNER.

PERMANENT LORDS ORDINARY.

Lord WELLWOOD.
Lord KYLLACHY.
Lord KINCAIRNEY.
Lord STORMONTH DARLING.
Lord Low.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

Lord Justice-General, Right Hon. J. P. B. ROBERTSON.

Lord Justice-Clerk, Right Hon. J. H. A. MACDONALD.

LORDS COMMISSIONERS OF JUSTICIARY.

The other Judges of the Court of Session.

Lord Advocate, { The Right Hon. Sir CHARLES PEARSON, Knt.

Dean of Faculty, The Right Hon. J. B. BALFOUR.

Solicitor-General, ANDREW GRAHAM MURRAY, Esq.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

P E E R S

WHO DELIVERED JUDGMENTS IN SCOTCH APPEALS DURING THE PERIOD OF THESE REPORTS.

Lord Chancellor, LORD HALSBURY.

Lords WATSON, HERSCHELL, MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS, FIELD, and HANNEN.

INDEX OF NAMES

IN

VOLUME XIX.

For Index of Names in Registration Appeal Cases, see p. xii.,— Lands Valuation Appeal Cases, see p. xii.,—
Court of Justiciary, see p. xiii.,—House of Lords, see p. xiv.

I.—COURT OF SESSION.

	Page
"Abertawe," The - - - - -	209
Advocate, Lord, v. Clyde Navigation Trustees, - - - - -	174
Advocate, Lord, v. Dunlop's Trustees, - - - - -	461
Advocate, Lord, Lanarkshire County Council v. - - - - -	617
Aitken, Second Edinburgh and Leith 493d Star-Bowkett Building Society v. - - - - -	603
Aitken, &c. (Baird's Trustees) v. Duncanson, - - - - -	1045
Aitkenhead v. Bunten & Co., - - - - -	803
Alexander, Yule v. - - - - -	167
Allan v. Johnstone, - - - - -	364
Allan's Trustee v. Allan & Sons, - - - - -	15
Allan's Trustee v. Allan & Sons, - - - - -	215
Anderson v. Anderson's Trustee, - - - - -	684
Anderson (Davidson's Trustee) v. Urquhart, - - - - -	808
Arbuthnott, Rait v. - - - - -	687
"Archdruid," The - - - - -	364
Arizona Copper Company v. Surveyor of Taxes, - - - - -	150
Baillie's Trustees v. Baillie, - - - - -	220
Baird & Stevenson v. Malloch, - - - - -	1061
Baird's Trustees v. Duncanson, - - - - -	1045
Balfour, M'Duff v. - - - - -	440
Bankier Distillery Co. v. Young & Co., - - - - -	1083
Barony, Inspector of, v. Inspector of Bothwell, - - - - -	417
Batchelor's Trustees v. Honeyman, - - - - -	903
Beatson, &c. (Mackinnon's Trustees) v. Official Receiver in Bankruptcy in England, - - - - -	1051
Beattie v. Muir, - - - - -	417
Beattie & Sons, Macfarlane v. - - - - -	953
Begg, &c. (Trustees of Moffat Working-Men's Institute), Simpson v. - - - - -	389
Bell, Forfar and Brechin Railway Co. v. - - - - -	786
Benhar Coal Company, Liquidators of, - - - - -	108
Beresford's Trustees, Lucas's Trustees v. - - - - -	943
Bhagvat Sinhjee, Roes v. - - - - -	31
Birnie v. Christie, - - - - -	334
Board of Trade, Watson v. - - - - -	1078
Bothwell, Inspector of, Inspector of Barony v. - - - - -	417
Bothwell, Inspector of, Flannigan v. - - - - -	909
Bowers v. Pringle Pattison's Curator Bonis, - - - - -	941
Bowman v. Russell's Trustees, - - - - -	205
Brand v. Scott's Trustees, - - - - -	768
British Publishing Co. v. Hedderwick & Sons, - - - - -	1008
Brotch v. Dodds, - - - - -	855
Brown, Webster v. - - - - -	765
Brown, Sinclair v. - - - - -	780

	Page
Bruce v. Leisk, - - - - -	482
Bryan v. Butters Brothers & Co., - - - - -	490
Buchanan, Houstoun v. - - - - -	524
Bulloch, Lade, & Co., Robb v. - - - - -	971
Bunten & Co., Aitkenhead v. - - - - -	803
Butters Brothers & Co., Bryan v. - - - - -	490
Byng and Another (Lucas's Trustees) v. Scott and Another (Beresford's Trustees), - - - - -	943
Cain v. M'Colm, - - - - -	813
Caledonian Insurance Co. v. Gilmour, - - - - -	64
Caledonian Railway Co., Cramb v. - - - - -	1054
Caledonian Railway Co. v. M'Bride, - - - - -	255
Caledonian Railway Co., Magistrates of Glasgow v. - - - - -	874
Caledonian Railway Co., Port-Glasgow and Newark Sail Cloth Co. v. - - - - -	608
Callander and Oban Railway Co., Town-Council of Oban v. - - - - -	912
Cameron, Fraser v. - - - - -	564
Cameron, M'Kercher v. - - - - -	383
Campbell v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, - - - - -	159
Campbell, Malcolm v. - - - - -	278
Campbell v. A. & D. Morrison, - - - - -	282
Campbell v. Falconer, - - - - -	563
Campbell, National Bank of Scotland v. - - - - -	885
Cannon & Co., Patmore & Co. v. - - - - -	1004
Carnegie Park Orphanage, Trustees of, - - - - -	605
Carswell, Collard v. - - - - -	987
Carter's Trustees v. Carter, - - - - -	408
"Cassia," The - - - - -	38
Chaplin's Trustee v. Hoile, - - - - -	237
Chapman v. Sulphite Pulp Co., - - - - -	837
Cheyne, Mitchell & Baxter v. - - - - -	324
Christie, Birnie v. - - - - -	334
Clark, Sawers v. - - - - -	1091
Clidero v. Scottish Accident Insurance Co., - - - - -	355
Clyde Coal Co., Hughes v. - - - - -	343
Clyde Navigation Trustees, Lord Advocate v. - - - - -	174
Collard v. Carswell, - - - - -	987
Colquhoun v. Colquhoun's Trustees, - - - - -	946
Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., Liquidators of, Stocker v. - - - - -	17
Cowan v. Scottish Publishing Co., - - - - -	437
Coyle, Reid v. - - - - -	775
Coyle and Others (Paterson's Trustees), Walker (Paterson's Trustee) v. - - - - -	91
Crabb v. Fraser, - - - - -	580
Craik v. Penny, - - - - -	339
Cramb v. Caledonian Railway Co., - - - - -	1054
Crichton, Duncan v. - - - - -	594
Crum, Dalglish's Trustees v. - - - - -	170
Culross Special Water Supply District Committee v. Smith-Sligo's Trustees, - - - - -	58
Culter Paper Mills Co., Wallace v. - - - - -	915
Dalglish's Trustees v. Crum, - - - - -	170
Davidson, Forbes' Trustees v. - - - - -	1022
Davidson's Trustee v. Urquhart, - - - - -	808
Dawson v. M'Kenzie, - - - - -	261
Delaney v. Directors of Edinburgh and Leith Children's Aid and Refuge, - - - - -	8
Den (Inspector of Meldrum) v. Lumsden, - - - - -	77
Dick, Thomson v. - - - - -	804
Diverall, Governors of Strichen Endowments v. - - - - -	79
Dodds, Broatch v. - - - - -	855

INDEX OF NAMES.

vii

	Page
Duff & Co. v. Iron and Steel Fencing and Buildings Co.,	199
Duncan v. Crighton,	594
Duncan & Co., Sweeney v.	870
Duncanson, Baird's Trustees v.	1045
Dunlop & Co., Letricheux & David v.	209
Dunlop's Trustees, Lord Advocate v.	461
Dunsmore's Trustee v. Stewart,	4
Duthie, Johnstone v.	624
Duthie Brothers & Co. v. Duthie,	905
Edinburgh and Leith Children's Aid and Refuge, Directors of, Delaney v.	8
Edinburgh Employers, &c. Company, Liquidators of, v. Griffiths,	550
Edinburgh, Magistrates of, Campbell v.	159
Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann,	24
Ellis (Fleming's Trustee) v. M'Hardy,	542
Falconar Stewart v. Wilkie,	630
Falconer, Campbell v.	563
Ferguson's Trustees, Martin v.	474
Flannigan v. Inspector of Bothwell,	909
Fleming, Jack v.	1
Fleming and Others (M'Culloch's Trustees) v. M'Culloch,	777
Fleming's Trustee v. M'Hardy,	542
Forbes and Others (Forbes' Trustees) v. Davidson,	1022
Forfar and Brechin Railway Co. v. Bell,	786
Fraser, Crabb v.	580
Fraser v. Cameron,	564
Fraser v. Magistrates of Rothesay,	817
Fraser's Judicial Factor,	500
Gaffney, Rowan v.	62
Galashiels, Inspector of, v. Inspector of Melrose,	758
Gallagher v. Pattison,	79
Galloway Saloon Steam Packet Co. v. Wallace,	330
General Accident Assurance Corporation, Sickness and Accident Assurance Association v.	977
Gilmour, Caledonian Insurance Co. v.	64
Glasgow, Magistrates of, v. Caledonian Railway Co.,	874
Gordon (Dunsmore's Trustee) v. Stewart,	4
Govan, Police Commissioners of, v. Mickel,	670
Granite City Steamship Co. v. Ireland & Son,	124
Grant and Others (Low's Trustees) v. Whitworth,	431
Gray v. Smart,	692
Gray v. Weir,	25
Great Britain Steamship Premium Association v. Whyte,	109
Great North of Scotland Railway Co. v. Mann,	1035
Greenock, Magistrates of, Peters v.	643
Greer v. Turnbull & Co.,	21
Grierson, Mavor & Coulson v.	868
Griffiths, Liquidators of Edinburgh Employers, &c. Co. v.	550
Haddington, Inspector of, Inspector of North Berwick v.	6
Hall's Trustees v. Macdonald,	567
Halvorsen, Napier, Shanks, & Bell v.	412
Hedderwick & Sons, British Publishing Co. v.	1008
Henderson v. Watson,	954
Henry v. Scott,	545
Hermand Oil Co., Young v.	867
Heron Maxwell, &c. (Maxwell Heron's Trustees) v. Maxwell Heron,	922
Hewat's Trustee v. Smith,	403
Highland Railway Co., Louttit v.	791

	Page
Hill v. Thomson, - - - - -	377
Hillhouse v. Walker, - - - - -	47
Hoile, Chaplin's Trustee v. - - - - -	237
Honeyman, Batchelor's Trustees v. - - - - -	903
Houstoun v. Buchanan, - - - - -	524
Howat, Lowenfeld (Liquidator of Universal Stock Exchange Co.) v. - - - - -	128
Hughes v. Clyde Coal Co., - - - - -	343
Hutchison, Molleson v. - - - - -	581
Imrie v. Imrie, - - - - -	185
Inglis v. M'Neil, - - - - -	924
Ingram, Tully v. - - - - -	65
Inland Revenue v. Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh, - - - - -	751
Inveraray, School Board of, Smith v. - - - - -	247
Ireland & Son, Granite City Steamship Co. v. - - - - -	124
Iron and Steel Fencing and Buildings Co., Duff & Co. v. - - - - -	199
Irvine v. M'Hardy, - - - - -	458
Jack v. Fleming, - - - - -	1
Jackson v. MacDiarmid, - - - - -	528
Jamieson v. Russell & Co., - - - - -	898
Johnstone v. Duthie, - - - - -	624
Johnstone, Allan v. - - - - -	364
Kay's Trustee v. Stalker, - - - - -	1071
Keillor, Mackenzie v. - - - - -	963
Kemp (Inspector of Haddington), Lees (Inspector of North Berwick) v. - - - - -	6
Kilmuir Easter, Inspector of, v. Inspector of Lochbroom, - - - - -	396
Knight & Co. v. Stott, - - - - -	959
Lanark, County Council of Lower Ward of, Neilson v. - - - - -	311
Lanarkshire County Council v. Lord Advocate, - - - - -	617
Lang's Trustee v. Steel, - - - - -	488
Laurencekirk, Inspector of, Inspector of St Nicholas v. - - - - -	233
Lawrie v. Lawrie's Trustees, - - - - -	675
Lees (Inspector of North Berwick) v. Kemp (Inspector of Haddington), - - - - -	6
Leisk, Bruce v. - - - - -	482
Leith (Anderson's Trustee), Anderson v. - - - - -	684
Leslie, Middleton v. - - - - -	801
Leslie's Trustee, Rattray v. - - - - -	853
Letricheux & David v. Dunlop & Co., - - - - -	209
"Linn o' Dee," The - - - - -	124
Lochbroom, Inspector of, Inspector of Kilmuir Easter v. - - - - -	396
Louttit v. Highland Railway Co., - - - - -	791
Low v. Low, - - - - -	115
Low's Trustees v. Whitworth, - - - - -	431
Lowenfeld v. Howat, - - - - -	128
Lucas's Trustees v. Beresford's Trustees, - - - - -	943
Lumsden, Den (Inspector of Meldrum) v. - - - - -	77
M'Alpine, M'Ginty v. - - - - -	935
M'Bride, Caledonian Railway Co. v. - - - - -	255
M'Colm, Cain v. - - - - -	813
M'Culloch's Trustees, - - - - -	777
M'Cusker, Sproul v. - - - - -	539
MacDiarmid, Jackson v. - - - - -	528
Macdonald, Hall's Trustees v. - - - - -	567
M'Dowall & Neilson, Thorsen v. - - - - -	743
M'Duff v. Balfour, - - - - -	440
M'Ewan, &c. (Carter's Trustees) v. Carter, - - - - -	408
M'Fadyen v. Spencer & Co., - - - - -	350
Macfarlane and Others (Dunlop's Trustees), Lord Advocate v. - - - - -	461

INDEX OF NAMES.

ix

	Page
Macfarlane v. Beattie & Sons, - - -	953
Macgillivray v. Mackintosh, - - -	103
M'Ginty v. M'Alpine, - - -	935
M'Hardy, Irvine v. - - -	458
M'Hardy, Fleming's Trustee v. - - -	542
Mackay (Inspector of Kilmuir Easter) v. Munro (Inspector of Lochbroom),	396
M'Kenzie, Dawson v. - - -	261
Mackenzie v. Keillor, - - -	963
Mackenzie's Trustee, Macrae v. - - -	138
M'Kercher v. Cameron, - - -	383
Mackinnon, &c. (Russell's Trustees), Bowman v. - - -	205
Mackinnon's Trustees v. Official Receiver in Bankruptcy in England, -	1051
Mackintosh, Macgillivray v. - - -	103
M'Kinven v. M'Millan, - - -	369
M'Knight & Co. v. Montgomerie, - - -	501
M'Langhlin, Nicholson's Trustees v. - - -	49
M'Laurin v. North British Railway Company, - - -	346
M'Lean, - - -	1043
Maclellans, Taylors v. - - -	10
Macleod, Stuart & Stuart v. - - -	223
Macleod & Co., Stephens, Mawson, & Goss v. - - -	38
M'Millan, M'Kinven v. - - -	369
M'Neil, Inglis v. - - -	924
M'Quillan v. Smith, - - -	375
Macrae v. Mackenzie's Trustee, - - -	138
Malcolm v. Campbell, - - -	278
Malloch, Baird & Stevenson v. - - -	1061
Mann, Great North of Scotland Railway Co. v. - - -	1035
Mann, Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. - - -	24
Martin v. Ferguson's Trustees, - - -	474
Mavor & Coulson v. Grierson, - - -	868
Maxwell Heron's Trustees v. Maxwell Heron, - - -	922
Meldrum, Inspector of, v. Lumsden, - - -	77
Melrose, Inspector of, Inspector of Galashiels v. - - -	758
Mickel, Police Commissioners of Govan v. - - -	670
Middleton v. Leslie, - - -	801
Middleton (Hewat's Trustee) v. Smith, - - -	403
Milligan v. Muir & Co., - - -	18
Milne v. Townsend, - - -	830
Mitchell and Others (Moir's Trustees), Orr v. - - -	700
Mitchell and Others (Whittet's Trustees) v. Whittet, - - -	975
Mitchell & Baxter v. Cheyne, - - -	324
Moffat Working Men's Institute, Trustees of, Simpson v. - - -	389
Moir's Trustees, Orr v. - - -	700
Molleson v. Hutchison, - - -	581
Molleson (Pringle Pattison's Curator Bonis), Bowers v. - - -	941
Montgomerie, M'Knight & Co. v. - - -	501
Moray, Earl of, Taylor v. - - -	399
More (Chaplin's Trustee) v. Hoile, - - -	237
Morrison, Stewart v. - - -	1009
Morrison, A. & D., Campbell v. - - -	282
Morrison & Co., - - -	1049
Muir (Inspector of Bothwell), Flannigan v. - - -	909
Muir & Co., Milligan v. - - -	18
Muir, Smyth v. - - -	81
Muir (Inspector of Bothwell), Beattie (Inspector of Barony) v. - - -	417
Muir (Muir's Executrix), Shaw v. - - -	997
Munro, Mackay v. - - -	396
Murdoch, Royal Burgh of Renfrew v. - - -	822

	Page
Napier, Shanks, & Bell v. Halvorsen, - - -	412
National Bank of Scotland v. Campbell, - - -	885
Neilson v. County Council of Lower Ward of Lanark, - - -	311
Nelson v. Scott, Croall, & Sons, - - -	425
Nicholson's Trustees v. M'Laughlin, - - -	49
North Berwick, Inspector of, v. Inspector of Haddington, - - -	6
North British Railway Company, M'Laurin v. - - -	346
North of Scotland Steam Navigation Co., Walker v. - - -	386
Niddrie and Benhar Coal Company, - - -	820
Oban, Town Council of, v. Callander and Oban Railway Co., - - -	912
Official Receiver in Bankruptcy in England, Mackinnon's Trustees v. - - -	1051
Oliver, Turnbull v. - - -	154
Oncken's Judicial Factor v. Reimers, - - -	519
Orr v. Moir's Trustees, - - -	700
Paterson's Trustee v. Paterson's Trustees, - - -	91
Patmore & Co. v. B. Cannon & Co., - - -	1004
Pattison, Gallagher v. - - -	79
Pearson (Reeve's Executor) v. Reeve's Judicial Factor, - - -	1013
Penny v. Penny Craik, - - -	334
Penny, Craik v. - - -	339
Peters v. Magistrates of Greenock, - - -	643
Petrie, Smith v. - - -	405
Port-Glasgow and Newark Sailcloth Co. v. Caledonian Railway Co., - - -	608
Powrie & Pitcaithley, Ross v. - - -	314
Prestonpans, Kirk-Session of, v. School Board of Prestonpans, - - -	193
Pringle Pattison's Curator Bonis, Bowers v. - - -	941
Pringle v. Pringle, - - -	926
"Queen," The - - -	386
Rait v. Arbuthnott, - - -	687
Rattray v. Leslie's Trustee, - - -	853
Reeve's Executor v. Reeve's Judicial Factor, - - -	1013
Reid v. Coyle, - - -	775
Reimers, Oncken's Judicial Factor v. - - -	519
Renfrew, Royal Burgh of, v. Murdoch, - - -	822
Renwick v. Stamford, Spalding, and Boston Banking Co., - - -	163
Robb v. Bulloch, Lade, & Co., - - -	971
Robertson v. Ross & Co., - - -	967
Robertson v. Robertson's Trustees, - - -	849
Robinow, Sim v. - - -	665
Ross v. Bhagvat Sinhjee, - - -	31
Ross (Inspector of Laurencekirk), Wallace (Inspector of St Nicholas) v. - - -	233
Ross v. Powrie & Pitcaithley, - - -	314
Ross (Fraser's Judicial Factor), - - -	500
Ross & Co., Robertson v. - - -	967
Rothsay, Magistrates of, Fraser v. - - -	817
Rowan v. Gaffney, - - -	62
Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh, Inland Revenue v. - - -	751
Russell & Co., Jamieson v. - - -	899
Russell's Trustees, Bowman v. - - -	205
St Nicholas, Inspector of, v. Inspector of Laurencekirk, - - -	233
Sawers v. Clark, - - -	1091
Scott, Henry v. - - -	545
Scott and Another (Beresford's Trustees), Byng and Another (Lucas's Trustees) v. - - -	943
Scott, Croall & Sons, Nelson v. - - -	425
Scott's Trustees, Brand v. - - -	768
Scott's Trustees v. Shaw, - - -	895

INDEX OF NAMES.

xi

	Page
Scottish Accident Insurance Co., Clidero v. - - -	355
Scottish Publishing Co., Cowan v. - - -	437
Second Edinburgh and Leith 493d Starr-Bowkett Building Society v. Aitken, - - -	603
Seddon, - - -	101
Shaw, Scott's Trustees v. - - -	895
Shaw v. Muir's Executrix, - - -	997
Sickness and Accident Assurance Association v. General Accident Assur- ance Corporation, - - -	977
Sim v. Robinow, - - -	665
Simpson v. Trustees of Moffat Working-Men's Institute, - - -	389
Sinclair v. Brown, - - -	780
Smart, Gray v. - - -	692
Smith, M'Quillan v. - - -	375
Smith v. School Board of Inveraray, - - -	247
Smith (Allan's Trustee) v. Allan & Son, - - -	215
Smith v. Petrie, - - -	405
Smith v. Wilson, - - -	428
Smith, Hewat's Trustee v. - - -	403
Smith-Sligo's Trustees, Culross Special Water Supply District Committee v. -	58
Smyth v. Muir, - - -	81
Spencer & Co., M'Fadyen v. - - -	350
Spröul v. M'Cuaker, - - -	539
Stafford, Marquess of, Duke of Sutherland v. - - -	504
Stamford, Spalding, and Boston Banking Co., Renwick v. - - -	163
Stalker, Kay's Trustee v. - - -	1071
Steel Co. of Scotland v. Tancered, Arrol, & Co., - - -	1062
Steele, Lang's Trustee v. - - -	488
Stephens, Mawson, & Goss v. Macleod & Co., - - -	38
Stewart v. Morrison, - - -	1009
Stewart, Gordon (Dunsmore's Trustee) v. - - -	4
Stewart, Falconar, v. Wilkie, - - -	630
Stewart v. Stewart, - - -	310
Stocker v. Liquidators of Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., - - -	17
Stott, Knight & Co. v. - - -	959
Strathie (Lang's Trustee) v. Steele, - - -	488
Strichen Endowments, Governors of, v. Diverall, - - -	79
Stromness, Town-Council of - - -	207
Stuart & Stuart v. Macleod, - - -	223
Sulley v. Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh, - - -	751
Sulphite Pulp Co., Chapman v. - - -	837
Surveyor of Taxes, Arizona Copper Co. v. - - -	150
Sutherland, Duke of, v. Marquess of Stafford, - - -	504
Sweeney v. Duncan & Co., - - -	870
Tancered, Arrol, & Co., Steel Co. of Scotland v. - - -	1062
Taylor v. Earl of Moray, - - -	399
Taylor v. Maclellans, - - -	10
"Theodor Korner," The - - -	743
Thomson v. Dick, - - -	804
Thomson, Hill v. - - -	377
Thomson v. M'Dowall & Neilson, - - -	743
Townsend, Milne v. - - -	830
Tudhope, Weir v. - - -	858
Tully v. Ingram, - - -	65
Turnbull & Co., Greer v. - - -	21
Turnbull v. Oliver, - - -	154
Universal Stock Exchange Co., Liquidator of, v. Howat, - - -	128
Urquhart, Davidson's Trustee v. - - -	808

	Page
Valentine (Oncken's Judicial Factor) v. Reimers, -	519
"Victoria," The -	987
Walker, Hillhouse v. -	47
Walker (Paterson's Trustee) v. Coyle and Others (Paterson's Trustees), -	91
Walker v. North of Scotland Steam Navigation Co., -	386
Wallace, Galloway Saloon Steam Packet Co. v. -	330
Wallace v. Culter Paper Mills Co., -	915
Wallace v. Ross, -	233
Watson v. Board of Trade, -	1078
Watson, Henderson v. -	954
Webster v. Brown, -	765
Weir, Gray v. -	25
Weir v. Tudhope, -	858
Whittet's Trustees v. Whittet, -	975
Whitworth, Low's Trustees v. -	431
Whyte, Great Britain Steamship Premium Association v. -	109
Wilkie, Falconar Stewart v. -	630
Wilson, -	219
Wilson, Smith v. -	428
Yeaman (Leslie's Trustee), Rattray v. -	853
Young v. Hermand Oil Co., -	867
Young & Co., Bankier Distillery Co. v. -	1083
Yule v. Alexander, -	167

REGISTRATION APPEAL CASES.

Burns v. Cassells, -	287
Cassells, Burns v. -	287
Comrie, M'Kenzie v. -	292
Falconer, Lindsay v. -	290
Falconer v. Macleod, -	291
Falconer v. M'Guffie, -	295
Lindsay v. Falconer, -	290
M'Guffie, Falconer v. -	295
M'Kenzie v. Comrie, -	292
M'Kenzie v. Watt, -	297
Macleod, Falconer v. -	291
Neilson v. Robertson, -	301
Robertson, Neilson v. -	301
Watt, M'Kenzie v. -	297

LANDS VALUATION APPEAL CASES.

Edinburgh, Assessor for, Ferrier v. -	882, 1074
Ferrier v. Assessor for Edinburgh, -	882, 1074
Hughes v. Assessor for Stirling, -	840
Lanarkshire, Assessor of, Steel Co. of Scotland v. -	847
Steel Co. of Scotland v. Assessor of Lanarkshire, -	847
Stirling, Assessor for, Hughes v. -	840

II.—COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

	Page
Advocate, Her Majesty's, v. Scott,	63
Auld, Phillips v.	29
Batchen v. Morrison,	25
Blain v. Rankin,	96
Board of Trade, Simpson v.	66
Boyce v. Shaw,	13
Brown v. Renton,	22
Cadenhead, Hutcheon v.	32
Donald v. Hart,	88
Duff, M'Donald v.	1
Duffie v. M'Cormick,	89
Duncan v. Neilson,	43
Eastburn v. Wood,	100
Halliday v. Wilson,	3
Hart, Donald v.	88
Henderson, Rodgers v.	40
Houghton v. Phyn,	37
Howman v. Ross,	19
Hutcheon v. Cadenhead,	32
Hutton v. Main,	5
Irving v. Phyn,	7
Lamb, Walker v.	50
Lamb v. Threshie,	78
Lamont, Macdonald v.	41
Lang v. Munro,	54
M'Cormick, Duffie v.	89
M'Donald v. Duff,	1
Macdonald v. Lamont,	41
M'Hattie v. Wyness,	95
M'Leod, Ross v.	18
Main, Hutton v.	5
Malcolm, Robertson v.	18
Miller, Torrance v.	85
Miller v. White,	104
Morrison, Batchen v.	25
Munro, Lang v.	54
Murray, Russell & Co. v.	61
Neilson, Duncan v.	43
Phillips v. Auld,	29
Phyn, Houghton v.	37
Phyn, Irving v.	7
Rankin, Blain v.	96
Rattray v. White,	23
Renton, Brown v.	22
Robertson v. Malcolm,	18
Rodgers v. Henderson,	40
Ross v. M'Leod,	18
Ross, Howman v.	19
Russell & Co. v. Murray,	61
Scott, Her Majesty's Advocate v.	63

	Page
Sharp v. Todd, - - - - -	47
Shaw, Boyce v. - - - - -	13
Simpson v. Board of Trade, - - - - -	66
Threshie, Lamb v. - - - - -	78
Todd, Sharp v. - - - - -	47
Torrance v. Miller, - - - - -	85
Walker v. Lamb, - - - - -	50
White, Rattray v. - - - - -	23
White, Miller v. - - - - -	104
Wilson, Halliday v. - - - - -	3
Wood, Eastburn v. - - - - -	100
Wyness, M'Hattie v. - - - - -	95

III.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

Anglo-American Brush Electric Light Corporation v. King, Brown, & Co.,	20
Buccleuch, Duke of, Johnstone v. - - - - -	39
Darling v. Gray & Sons, - - - - -	31
Edwardes, Hughes v. - - - - -	33
Gray & Sons, Darling v. - - - - -	31
Heritable Reversionary Co. v. Millar (M'Kay's Trustee), - - - - -	43
Hughes v. Edwardes, - - - - -	33
Johnstone v. Duke of Buccleuch, - - - - -	39
King, Brown, & Co., Anglo-American Brush Electric Light Corporation v.	20
Kirkcudbright, Magistrates of, Renney v. - - - - -	11
M'Kay's Trustee, Heritable Reversionary Co. v. - - - - -	43
Millar (M'Kay's Trustee), Heritable Reversionary Co. v. - - - - -	43
Pickard & Curry v. Prescott, - - - - -	56
Prescott, Pickard & Curry v. - - - - -	56
Renney v. Magistrates of Kirkcudbright, - - - - -	11
Smith, Tennant v. - - - - -	1
Tennant v. Smith, - - - - -	1

ERRATA.

P. 128, line 6 from end of rubric, for "company," read "jobber."
P. 941, line 1, for 1887, read 1877.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE HOUSE OF LORDS,

1892.

ALEXANDER TENNANT, Appellant.—Sir Horace Davey, Q.C.—
C. J. Guthrie.

No. 1.

ROBERT SINCLAIR SMITH (Surveyor of Taxes), Respondent.—Lord Adv.
Sir C. Pearson—Sol.-Gen. Murray.

Mar. 14, 1892.
Tennant v.
Smith (Inland Revenue).

Revenue—Income-tax—Abatement—Bank-agent residing in bank premises—Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. c. 35), Schedules D and E—Income-Tax Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. c. 34), sec. 51—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. c. 16), sec. 8.—The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876, sec. 8, provides for an abatement of income-tax in the case of any person whose "total income from all sources" is less than £400.

A bank-agent, who had an income of £374 and occupied rent free a house forming part of the bank premises, which was of the annual value of £50, was disallowed the abatement by the Assessor of Income-Tax, on the ground that the value of the house fell to be reckoned as part of his income, and that his income was thus not under £400. The bank-agent objected, on the ground that it was part of his duty as bank-agent to occupy the house for the protection of the bank, and that he could not sublet the house or vacate it even temporarily without consent of the directors and without another bank official being appointed to occupy it in his absence, and that he was liable to be removed at any time. The house was suitable for the bank-agent, and if it had not been provided he would have required another of the same annual value.

Held (rev. judgment of the Second Division and three consulted Judges) (1) that in ascertaining total income from all sources with a view to the exemption enacted by sec. 8 of the Inland Revenue Act, 1876, no income arising in this country can be taken into account which is not chargeable under one or other of the income-tax schedules;

(2) That the advantage of free residence which the appellant derived from the discharge of his duty of residing in the bank premises for the purposes of the bank was not a subject of assessment in any of the schedules of the Income-Tax Act, and therefore was not to be taken into account in calculating his total income under sec. 8 of the Income-Tax Act, 1876.

Observations on the construction of the Income-Tax Acts.

(In the Court of Session, Jan. 21, 1891, 18 R. 428.)

Ld. Chancellor
(Halsbury).
Lord Watson.
Lord Mac-
naghten.
Lord Morris.
Lord Field.
Lord Hannen.

At a meeting of the General Commissioners of Income-Tax for the district of Brechin Alexander Tennant, agent at Montrose for the Bank of Scotland, appealed against an assessment made on him under schedules D and E of the Income-Tax Act, for the year ending 5th April 1890, on £317 of income, less £22 of insurance premiums, on the ground that he was entitled to a further abatement from his income of £120 allowed on incomes under £400.*

* The Act 39 and 40 Vict. c. 16 (Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876), enacts (sec. 8) that "the exemption granted by the Act 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, to persons whose respective incomes are less than £150 a-year is hereby restored,

No. 1. The appellant stated that his whole income was £374, but that the assessor had improperly taken his income as above £400 by adding £50 as the value of a house in the bank occupied by him.

Mar. 14, 1892. Tennant v. Smith (Inland Revenue). The Commissioners of Income-Tax sustained the appeal, and allowed the abatement.

The Surveyor of Taxes took a case for appeal.

The facts as stated in the case were as follows:—

Mr Tennant had a stated income from the bank of £300 per annum, from commissions, &c., £17, making together £317, besides an income from invested capital, from which tax had been deducted, £57. These three sums amounted to £374.

With respect to the house the case bore:—"1. The appellant is bound, as part of his duty, to occupy the bank house as custodier of the whole premises belonging to the bank, and also for the transaction of any special bank business after bank hours. He is not allowed to vacate the house even for a temporary period unless with the special consent of the directors, who, in that case, sanction the occupation of the house by another official of the bank during the absence of the agent. It is imperative that in the absence of the agent some responsible person should occupy the house and attend to the carrying on of the bank's business, so far as that may be necessary, after bank hours, and to the due locking up of the premises, and specially to the security of the cash and books in the bank's safe, communicating with which there is a night bolt from the agent's bedroom. The annual value of the house so occupied is £50. 2. The appellant is not entitled to sublet the bank house or any part thereof, and is not entitled to use it for other than the bank's business, but the appellant, with the tacit consent of the bank, carries on insurance business in the bank's premises. 3. By bond of fidelity granted by the appellant on his appointment as agent at Montrose, dated 17th February 1888, he agreed that he should be liable to removal at any time, and in case of his removal from office, that he should be obliged forthwith to fit and remove from the whole premises occupied by him. 4. If the appellant were to desire not to occupy the bank house, the sanction of the directors would be necessary for any arrangement which he might propose. In other cases where a bank-agent has desired not to occupy the bank house, the directors have agreed to his not doing so, and have made arrangements for its occupation by a subordinate official at the branch. In such cases the bank-agent's salary has not been affected by the change, and the subordinate officer of the bank who was appointed to occupy the house did not pay the agent any rent for the bank house, and the said officer's own salary was not affected by the change. In some special cases the bank have increased the salary to the official required to occupy the house on account of their requiring him to do so. In such cases the bank house was unsuitable for his use. 5. The general rule of the bank is that the bank-agent must occupy the bank house, and no case has ever occurred in which they have asked the agent to give up his house, and they have accordingly never had to consider whether any increase of salary would and . . . any person . . . who shall claim, and prove in the manner prescribed by the Acts relating to income-tax, that his total income from all sources, though amounting to £150 or upwards, is less than £400 shall be entitled to be relieved from so much of the said duties assessed upon or paid by him as an assessment or charge of the said duties upon £120 of his income would amount unto, and the relief shall be given either by reduction or abatement of the assessment upon such person, or by the repayment to him of so much of the excess as he shall have paid, or by both of those means as the case may require."

be given to the agent if such a case ever arose. 6. The bank house is suitable in respect of size and accommodation for the appellant. If a dwelling-house were not provided by the bank, he would require to provide a house for himself of similar size to the bank house. . . .”

No. 1.

Mar. 14, 1892.

Tennant v.

Smith (Inland

Revenue).

Mr Tennant's contentions against the annual value of the house being reckoned as part of his income were thus stated in the case :—“(1) That the occupancy of the house is imposed upon him as part of his duty. (2) That the premises are not a dwelling-house in the sense of the Act, but are truly bank premises occupied by him specially in connection with the bank's business. (3) That his occupancy of the premises does not fall under schedule E and the rules applicable thereto. (4) That the premises come under the exemption of section 51* of 16 and 17 Victoria cap. 34, as being a necessary expense incurred in the performance of the duties of his office.”

On 4th June 1890 the Second Division, in respect of the difficulty and importance of the question submitted for decision, appointed the cause to be argued before them and three Judges of the First Division.

The case was advised on 21st January 1891, when a majority of the Judges (the Lord President Inglis, the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Rutherford Clark, and Lord M'Laren, diss. Lord Young, Lord Adam, and Lord Trayner), held that the assessment should be sustained.

Mr Tennant appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—To put this case very simply, the question depends upon what is Mr Tennant's income. This is an Income-Tax Act, and what is intended to be taxed is income. And when I say “what is intended to be taxed,” I mean what is the intention of the Act as expressed in its provisions, because in a taxing Act it is impossible, I believe, to assume any intention, any governing purpose in the Act, to do more than take such tax as the statute imposes. In various cases the principle of construction of a taxing Act has been referred to in various forms, but I believe they may be all reduced to this, that inasmuch as you have no right to assume that there is any governing object which a taxing Act is intended to attain other than that which it has expressed by making such and such objects the intended subject for taxation, you must see whether a tax is expressly imposed.

Cases, therefore, under the Taxing Acts always resolve themselves into a question whether or not the words of the Act have reached the alleged subject of taxation. Lord Wensleydale said, in In re Micklethwait,¹ “It is a well-established rule that the subject is not to be taxed without clear words for that purpose, and also that every Act of Parliament must be read according to the natural construction of its words.”

Now, it is certainly true that the occupation of a house rent free is not income.

* Section 51 of the Act 16 and 17 Victoria, cap. 34, enacts,—“In assessing the duty chargeable under schedule E of this Act, in respect of any public office or employment where the person exercising the same is necessarily obliged to incur and defray out of the salary, fees, or emoluments of such office or employment, the expenses of travelling in the performance of the duties thereof, or of keeping and maintaining a horse to enable him to perform the same, or otherwise to lay out and expend money wholly, exclusively, and necessarily in the performance of the duties of his office or employment, it shall be lawful to deduct from the amount of the said salary, fees, and emoluments to be assessed under this Act, the amount of all such expenses and disbursements necessarily incurred and defrayed in manner aforesaid.”

¹ 1855, 11 Exch. (Hurlston and Gordon), p. 456.

No. 1. Of course the possession of a house which may be used for purposes of profit is property, and taxable as such. But the bald dry proposition that the mere fact of occupying a house, which house as property is already taxed, is not income in any sense, could, I think, hardly be disputed. For my own part I doubt very much whether a house could ever properly be described as part of a man's income, though, doubtless, the rent for it when received would be income in the hands of the person receiving it.

Mar. 14, 1892.
Tennant v.
Smith (Inland Revenue).

Another observation that occurs to me is, that in dealing with real property the whole framework of the statute seems to point to a peculiar kind of assessment while treating the things themselves as the subjects of assessment; and the provisions which give effect to that peculiarity of assessment are entirely distinct from the provisions as to income.

Now, Mr Tennant occupies this house without paying any rent for it. It may be conceded that if he did not occupy it under his contract with the bank rent free he would be obliged to hire a house elsewhere, pay rent for it, and pro tanto diminish his income. And if any words could be found in the statute which provided that besides paying income-tax on income, people should pay for advantages or emoluments in its widest sense (such as I think the word "emoluments" here has not, for reasons to be presently given), there is no doubt of Mr Tennant's possession of a material advantage, which makes his salary of higher value to him than if he did not possess it, and which upon the hypothesis I have just indicated would be taxable accordingly.

But, upon the principles to which I at first referred, your Lordships are to ascertain not whether Mr Tennant has got advantages which enable him to spend more of his income than if he did not possess them, but whether he has got that which any words in the statute point out as the subject on which it imposes taxation.

Now, I agree with Lord Adam in his very lucid judgment, that what Mr Tennant is to be assessed upon must be assessed under schedule E, and I agree with the criticisms which he applies to the words within which, if at all, this advantage of occupying a house rent free must be brought, and none of the words, either "perquisites," "profits," or "emoluments," are properly applicable, inasmuch as by the rule in which those words are used or explained the word "payable," as applied to them, renders it to my mind quite impossible to suppose that the mere occupation of a house is reconcilable with the just application of that word.

I come to the conclusion that the Act refers to money payments made to the person who receives them, though, of course, I do not deny that if substantial things of money value were capable of being turned into money they might for that purpose represent money's worth and be therefore taxable.

The illustration given in the argument of the mode of arriving at a trader's profits, and the mode of treating his stock in trade, suggests that money's worth may be treated as money for the purposes of the Act in cases where the thing is capable of being turned into money from its own nature.

I have designedly avoided considering the question whether in any sense the occupation of this house is a benefit or a burden to the recipient of the advantage or disadvantage, whatever it may be, though I doubt very much whether such considerations on the one side or the other are relevant to the question which your Lordships have to determine. I am aware that their relevancy has the high authority of the late Lord President, and his Lordship undoubtedly treated the question as, if it were established to be a clear pecuniary profit it would be taxable, whereas, if it were a heavy burden, it would not. Nor did his Lordship shrink from suggesting that this occupation of a house rent free would be taxable or not, according as it was unsuitable for the occupant's domestic arrangements or the reverse. It followed, therefore, that in every case where such a question arose it would be necessary to examine the particular circumstances of each man's family. If he had a large family that could not be accommodated in the house, and he must hire a house elsewhere, one result would follow. If he was a bachelor, and the house was appropriate to his wants, then another result would follow.

No. 1.
Mar. 14, 1892.
Tennant v.
Smith (Inland Revenue).

I cannot think that the Legislature ever contemplated such an examination or discrimination of persons subject to taxation as such a system of assessment would imply. Nor do I understand upon what principle the inquiry could properly be directed. The money a man has been compelled to spend for the maintenance of his wife and family, if he has them, has not the less formed part of his income. The fact that he is compelled to spend on this or that subject of expenditure does not make the money that he has had to spend the less his income because he has had to spend it. The example given by Lord Young, on the other hand, of a man who is saved by the form of his occupation as a sea captain from the necessity of hiring a house, is a very cogent and striking illustration to what extreme views such an interpretation of the Act would lead.

I observe both the Lord President and the Lord Justice-Clerk used the phrase "gains" as applicable to the advantage which Mr Tennant derives from the occupation of the house. That seems to be a reference to schedule D, whereas, as I have already said, I concur with Lord Young and Lord Adam that Mr Tennant's income must be assessed under schedule E. And further, it appears to me impossible to contend that it can be assessed under both D and E, each being in terms exclusive of the other. Nor do I think that a different class of emolument can be intended to be reached under schedule D, though the words "emoluments or gains" in schedule D do not receive exposition from the words that occur in schedule E.

For these reasons, I am of opinion, in the words of Lord Young, that the thing sought to be taxed is not income unless it can be turned into money. Accordingly, I think that the determination of the commissioners was right, and that the order appealed from ought to be reversed, and I so move your Lordships.

LORD WATSON.—(After stating the facts)—In ascertaining total income from all sources, with a view to the exemptions enacted by section 8 of the Act of 1876, I am of opinion that no income arising in this country can be taken into account which is not chargeable with duty under one or other of the income-tax schedules. What may be the rule with respect to income arising in another country and not assessable here, I do not consider it necessary for the purposes of this case to determine. Accordingly, it appears to me that the case was decided in the Court below, as it has been argued at your Lordships' bar, upon the true legal issue—namely, whether the appellant's residence is income, within the meaning of the statutes, which must be valued and assessed for income-tax.

Schedule A, which assesses property according to its annual value, includes

No. 1. all lands, tenements, hereditaments, and heritages capable of actual occupation. Schedule B imposes an additional assessment in respect of occupancy upon some of the lands and others comprehended in schedule A, the occupation of which in itself constitutes a trade or business. The appellant is not a proprietor, neither is he an occupier within the meaning of schedule B. The bank are the only occupiers, being, as Lord Herschell said in Russell v. Town and County Bank,¹ "in the same position as if that portion of their bank premises were used in any other way in the strictest sense for the purposes of the bank and the business of the bank." The appellant does, no doubt, reside in the building, but he does so as the servant of the bank and for the purpose of performing the duty which he owes to his employers. His position does not differ in any respect from that of a caretaker or other servant, the nature of whose employment requires that he shall live in his master's dwelling-house or business premises instead of occupying a separate residence of his own.

Mar. 14, 1892.
Tennant v.
Smith (Inland Revenue).

The Legislature has made elaborate provision for ascertaining the yearly value of lands, tenements, hereditaments, and heritages assessable under schedule A, and also the yearly value of occupation falling under schedule B; but there is no machinery to be found in any of the Income-tax Statutes for arriving at the annual value of residence as distinguished from such occupation. Yet it is manifest that the ascertainment of annual value in the latter case may be attended with greater difficulty and nicer considerations than are involved in the application of the rules for assessing and charging duties under schedules A and B. Even according to the respondent's argument, the assessable value of a servant's residence, in premises which he does not occupy, is not the price which other persons might be prepared to pay for the privilege, but the benefit which he personally derives from it, estimated in money.

In the present case the learned Judges of the majority have assessed the value of the appellant's residence at £50, upon the somewhat speculative footing that, if his duty did not require him to reside in the bank, he would be compelled to pay that sum for suitable accommodation for himself and family elsewhere. In that view, the so called benefit may in some instances prove a heavy burden, as in the case of a bank-agent who, but for the service required by his employers, would continue to reside, free of charge, in his parent's house. I entertain very serious doubt whether, according to the scheme of the Income-Tax Acts, it was intended to assess in any shape mere residence, either in performance of duty to the actual occupant or by licence from him. But I do not find it necessary to decide the point, because I am satisfied that the appellant is not liable to duty under any schedule.

I agree with your Lordships that income arising from employment as a bank-agent is assessable under schedule E in all cases where the bank which employs him is a company or society, whether corporate or not corporate, as specified in the third rule of that schedule. The Bank of Scotland being a corporation, the appellant's office is undoubtedly within the schedule. Neither is it doubtful that the appellant is liable to pay duty in respect of all "salaries, fees, wages, perquisites, or profits whatsoever," accruing to him by reason of such office, as provided by the first rule.

It is clear that the benefit, if any, which a bank-agent may derive from his residence in the business premises of the bank is neither salary, fee, nor wages.

¹ April 26, 1888, 13 App. Cas. 418, at p. 426, 15 R. (H. L.) 51.

Is it then a perquisite or a profit of his office? I do not think it comes within the category of profits, because that word, in its ordinary acceptation, appears to me to denote something acquired which the acquirer becomes possessed of and can dispose of to his advantage—in other words, money—or that which can be turned to pecuniary account. If the context had permitted, it might have been possible to argue that a benefit of that kind was a perquisite. But the fourth rule of schedule E defines perquisites, for all purposes of the Act, to be “such profits of offices and employments as arise from fees and other emoluments, and payable either by the Crown or by the subject in the course of executing such offices or employments.”

No. 1.

Mar. 14, 1892.
Tennant v.
Smith (Inland Revenue).

It was argued, however, that, if not liable under schedule E, the appellant was, at all events, liable under schedule D. I do not think it can be reasonably maintained that a public office or employment assessable under schedule E is also liable to assessment as an employment or vocation within the meaning of schedule D. No doubt that schedule also includes all “other profits and gains not charged by virtue of any of the other schedules contained in this Act.” But it appears to me that everything in the shape of profit or gain arising from a public office or employment, which the Legislature intended to be chargeable with duty, is ascertainable and assessable under the rules of schedule E, and under these rules only. The profits and gains arising from public offices and employments are in no sense profits and gains not charged by virtue of schedules other than schedule D.

There is a clause in the Act of 1842 (section 188) which enacts that “every provision in this Act contained, and applied to the duties in any particular schedule, which shall also be applicable to the duties in any other schedule, and not repugnant to the provisions for charging, ascertaining, or levying the duties in such other schedule shall, in charging, ascertaining, and levying the same, be applied as fully and effectually as if the application thereof had been expressly and particularly directed.” The respondent did not rely in argument upon the terms of that clause, the construction of which is by no means free from difficulty. Thus far its terms are clear enough. The provisions of schedule D with respect to employments and vocations are not to be applied to offices and employments under schedule E, unless they are in the first place “applicable” to such offices and employment, and, in the second place, not repugnant to the rules of assessment enacted for schedule E. Assuming for the sake of argument that the rules of assessment for employments and vocations under schedule D differed in material respects from the rules for assessing public offices and employments under schedule E, I do not think they would be applicable to cases falling under schedule E, or could be applied without repugnancy, or, in other words, without abrogating pro tanto the rules of schedule E.

I think it right to add that, in my opinion, the result would not be different if the rules of schedule D were applied to the appellant’s so-called benefit of residence.

In that case the appellant would be chargeable upon the full balance of “the profits, gains, and emoluments” accruing to him from his employment as bank-agent. Having regard to the general scheme and context of the Act, I am unable to come to the conclusion that these words “profits, gains, and emoluments” of a private employment as bank-agent under schedule D were meant by the Legislature to include more than the “salaries, fees, wages, perquisites, or profits whatsoever,” accruing to a similar employment by a public company.

No. 1. In my opinion, the word "emolument" occurring in the rules of schedule D means some more tangible benefit than a servant's residence in his master's house, or a meal or a suit of livery supplied by the master.

Mar. 14, 1892.
Tennant v.
Smith (Inland
Revenue).

I therefore concur in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords, I agree.

The appellant, who is the agent at Montrose for the Bank of Scotland, being assessed for income-tax, claims an abatement. The question is whether his "total income from all sources" is or is not less than £400. That depends upon whether he has to bring into account the value of a free residence provided for him by the bank in the bank premises.

Notwithstanding the opinion of one of the learned Judges of the Court of Session, I think it is perfectly clear that nothing is to be brought into account on a claim to relief except what is chargeable for the purpose of assessment.

The first point for consideration is what is the meaning of the expression "total income from all sources." It certainly means more than income properly so described—it includes more than "profits and gains" chargeable under the last three schedules of charge. It includes the annual value of property chargeable under schedule A, and the annual value of the occupation chargeable under schedule B. The Income-tax Code (5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, sec. 167, and 16 and 17 Vict. c. 34, sec. 28) contains express directions for estimating and calculating these values for the purpose of ascertaining the title to abatement when relief by way of abatement is claimed. But it contains no directions for estimating or bringing into account any benefit, or advantage, or enjoyment derived from lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages, which does not come under schedule A or schedule B.

The next point to be considered is what is the nature of the appellant's occupation of the residence provided for him in the bank premises. From the case stated for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer in Scotland it appears that "the appellant is bound, as part of his duty, to occupy the bank house as custodian of the whole premises belonging to the bank, and also for the transaction of any special bank business after bank hours." He is not entitled to sublet the bank house or to use it for other than bank business, and in the event of his ceasing to hold his office he is under obligation to quit the premises forthwith. Property, therefore, in the house he has none, of any sort or kind. He has the privilege of residing there. But his occupation is that of a servant, and not the less so because the bank thinks proper to provide for gentlemen in his position in their service accommodation on a liberal scale. It is clear therefore that the appellant is not chargeable under schedule A in respect of the bank house, or liable to pay the duty as occupying tenant. The bank and the bank alone is chargeable and liable to pay.

Then this question suggests itself, Has not the Crown got all that it is entitled to in respect of this house when it has received the duty on its full annual value? Is not the notion of finding some subject for taxation in lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages, over and above the full annual value chargeable under schedules A and B, a fanciful notion and foreign altogether to the scope and intent of the Income-tax Code? The learned counsel for the Crown say no. Their case is that the benefit derived by the appellant from his occupation of the bank house is chargeable under schedule E, or, at anyrate, under schedule D.

I do not doubt that the occupation of the bank house rent free, though not unattended with some inconveniences, is, on the whole, a considerable advantage to the appellant. It is a gain to him in the popular sense of the word. Whether such a benefit or gain comes under the head of "profits and gains" chargeable for income-tax purposes is the question submitted to your Lordships. I use the expression "profits and gains" because that is the term which the Legislature uses as applicable to both the schedules of charge under which it is said the appellant is chargeable.

No. 1.

Mar. 14, 1892.
Tennant v.
Smith (Inland Revenue).

In the course of the argument the learned counsel for the Crown admitted that there was a difficulty in maintaining their claim under schedule E. On examining that schedule it became obvious that it extends only to money payment or payments convertible into money. And so they took their stand on schedule D.

For the purposes of this case I am willing to assume that, in assessing a person holding an office chargeable under schedule E, the Crown may resort to schedule D in order to reach gains or profits arising or accruing from his office which, for some reason or another, do not come within the letter of schedule E. The third paragraph of schedule D imposes the duty in respect of all profits and gains not charged by virtue of any of the other schedules. It seems to me, therefore, that if the privilege of occupying the bank house rent free is really a profit or gain within the meaning of the Income-tax Code, and if it is not chargeable under schedule E, it might be caught by schedule D—not, I think, under case 2, rule 2, on which the Crown mainly relied, but under case 6. Case 2, rule 2, is, I think, inapplicable because it only extends to the duty to be charged in respect of employments not contained in any other schedule. Case 6 goes much further. It gives effect to the third paragraph of schedule D, and extends to the duty to be charged in respect of any annual profits or gains not falling under any of the foregoing rules and not charged by virtue of any of the other schedules.

In my opinion the answer to the claim of the Crown does not depend on any minute criticism of the language of the different schedules. The real answer is, that the thing which the Crown now seeks to charge is not income, nor is it required to be taken into account as income for the purpose of ascertaining title to relief by way of abatement. It falls neither under schedule A nor under D or E. I have already dealt with schedule A. Under that schedule the duty is payable on the "annual value." The duty under schedules D and E is payable on the "annual amount." It is a tax on income in the proper sense of the word. It is a tax on what "comes in"—on actual receipts. Take, for example, the 6th case of schedule D, which sweeps in all profits or gains not otherwise chargeable. What the person liable to be assessed is required to do under schedule G is to return "the full amount" of annual profits "received" (5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, sec. 190, schedule G, xii.). No doubt if the appellant had to find lodgings for himself he might have to pay for them. His income goes further because he is relieved from that expense. But a person is chargeable for income-tax under schedule D, as well as under schedule E, not on what saves his pocket, but on what goes into his pocket. And the benefit which the appellant derives from having a rent-free house provided for him by the bank, brings in nothing which can be reckoned up as a receipt or properly described as income.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal must be allowed.

LORD MORRIS.—I concur in the judgment which has been moved.

No. 1.

Mar. 14, 1892.
Tennant v.
Smith (Inland Revenue).

LORD FIELD.—I also concur in the judgment that the appeal should be allowed and the decision of the Commissioners restored. For the reasons which have been so fully indicated to your Lordships, it appears to me that the residence of the appellant upon the bank premises, which although rent free could not in any way be converted by him into money or money's worth, cannot be held to be either a gain, profit, perquisite, or emoluments within the meaning of the statutes.

LORD HANNEN.—The question for consideration is whether the appellant is entitled under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876, sec. 8, to an abatement on the amount of income on which he has been assessed, on the ground that his total income from all sources is under £400. His undisputed income is £374; if to this should be added the annual value of the house he resides in rent free, his assessable income exceeds £400, otherwise not.

The appellant is agent for the Bank of Scotland at Montrose. He is bound as part of his duty as such agent to live in the bank house as custodian of the whole premises, and to transact business there after bank hours. He cannot temporarily vacate the house without special consent of the directors, and he cannot sublet or use the premises for other than bank business. Is such an occupation as this to be regarded as a part of the appellant's income? It certainly does not come within the natural meaning of the word "income." It saves the appellant from the expenditure of income on house rent, but it is not in itself income. That it is a suitable residence for the appellant is an accident which ought not to affect the determination of a question of principle as to the incidence of taxation. The income-tax is imposed, not on the personal suitability of a man's surroundings, which must vary with each man, and with the same man in different circumstances, but on his income capable of being calculated. The appellant occupies the bank house as a part of his duty, and I do not see how the case can be distinguished from that, so aptly put by Lord Young, of the master of a ship who is spared the cost of house-rent while afloat. His cabin does not on that account become a part of his income.

Different considerations would apply to the case of an agent who as part of his remuneration has a residence provided for him which he might let. That which could be converted into money might reasonably be regarded as money—but that is not the case before us.

Although the question raised on this occasion is on a claim for abatement, I think it would equally arise on an assessment under either of the schedules D and E. For the reasons given by Lord Adam, I am of opinion that the occupation of this house does not fall within the description of "salaries, fees, wages, perquisites, profits, or emoluments" in the sense in which those words are used in the Act.

I think, therefore, that the judgment appealed from should be reversed, and that of the Commissioners affirmed.

INTERLOCUTOR of the 22d of January 1891 appealed from reversed, and the determination of the Commissioners reversed by that interlocutor restored; cause remitted to the Court of Session; the respondent to pay the appellant the costs both in this House and in the Court of Session.

LOCH & GOODHART—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—W. H. MELVILL, Solicitor for Inland Revenue, England—DAVID CROLE, Solicitor for Inland Revenue, Scotland.

JAMES RENNEY, Pursuer (Appellant).—W. R. Kennedy, Q.C.—
J. G. Witt, Q.C.

No. 2.

THE MAGISTRATES OF KIRKCUDBRIGHT, Defenders (Respondents).—
Sol.-Gen. Murray—G. L. Crole.

Mar. 31, 1892.
Renney v.
Magistrates
of Kirkcud-
bright.

Ship—Harbour—Powers of harbourmaster—Reparation.—A schooner sailing up the River Dee to Kirkcudbright harbour was steered by the master, with the assistance of two local fishermen acting as pilots.

On the vessel reaching a point within the harbourmaster's jurisdiction, one of the pilots hailed the harbourmaster, who was standing at the head of the west pier, for instructions when to drop the anchor. The harbourmaster made signs for the vessel to come on. The master thereupon changed his course from the mid-channel to one leading directly to the head of the pier. The harbourmaster, after the course was changed, continued to make signs for the vessel to advance. The vessel continued in her course till she grounded on a bank near the pier. The harbourmaster in giving the orders was in the belief that the tide was full, while in fact it had ebbed three inches.

In an action of damages brought by the owner of the vessel against the harbour trustees, the First Division held that the harbourmaster was in fault, but that there was contributory negligence on the part of those in charge of the vessel in changing its course.

In an appeal held (rev. the judgment) (1) that the accident was caused by the fault of the harbourmaster in directing the vessel to take a wrong course; and (2) that the shipmaster was not in fault in following that course, as he was bound to obey the harbourmaster's orders.

(In the Court of Session, Dec. 19, 1890, 18 R. 294.)

The sailing vessel "Janets and Ann," of Chester, of 175 tons gross measurement, arrived in the River Dee, off Kirkcudbright, on the afternoon of Friday, 23d March 1889.

Ld. Chancellor
(Halbury).
Lord Watson.
Ld. Herschell.
Lord Morris.
Lord Field.

On her way to the harbour, and when within the jurisdiction of the harbourmaster, she struck upon a bank, and sustained considerable damage, amounting to, as alleged, £300, for which Mr James Renney, the owner of the vessel, brought an action against the Magistrates of Kirkcudbright, as trustees of the harbour.

The pursuer averred that the accident was occasioned by the faulty directions of the harbourmaster, which those in charge of the vessel had obeyed, as they were bound to do.

The defenders averred that if those in charge of the vessel had steered a proper course, and had obeyed the orders of the harbourmaster, no accident would have happened.

The pursuer pleaded;—The pursuer having suffered the loss and damage sued for through the fault of the defenders, or those for whom they are responsible, is entitled to decree as craved.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The alleged injury to the said vessel the "Janets and Ann" not having been caused by any fault or negligence on the part of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, they are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. (3) Those in charge of the said vessel having disobeyed, or not timeously obeyed, the orders of the harbourmaster, the owner is not entitled to recover damages for any injury sustained by the said vessel. (4) The grounding of the vessel having been caused, or materially contributed to, by the fault of those in charge of the vessel on the occasion in question, the defenders ought to be assolizied.

The following were the facts proved:—The River Dee flows in a westerly direction past the town of Kirkcudbright on the south bank. The entrance to the harbour is between two piers running northward. When the schooner in sailing up the river on the afternoon of 23d March

No. 2.

Mar. 31, 1892.
Renney v.
Magistrates
of Kirkcud-
bright.

1889 had reached a point about 130 to 140 yards below the west pier she was in mid-channel, or nearly so. Here a man named Smith, one of two local fishermen, who had been taken on board to assist the master in the navigation of the vessel, there being no licensed pilots, hailed the harbourmaster, who was standing on the west pier-head, and asked him to let them know when to drop the anchor. The schooner was at this time within the harbourmaster's jurisdiction. The harbourmaster heard Smith hailing, and in reply waved his arm, and cried out "Come on," which Smith interpreted to mean that the schooner was to come on towards the pier-head where the harbourmaster was standing. To do this the master ported the helm, and the vessel went out of the mid-channel, taking a straight course towards the pier-head. Very soon afterwards Smith, who knew that the vessel was approaching a dangerous bank or beach extending from the west pier, hailed the harbourmaster, calling out, "Be sure to tell us when we are to anchor," the reply to which was the continued waving of the harbourmaster's arm, and another call to come on. Smith saw the waving, but did not hear the call which the harbourmaster admitted that he gave. Almost immediately after the harbourmaster gave orders to drop the anchor, and at the same moment the schooner struck. The tide had then ebbed 3 inches, but the harbourmaster did not know that it had begun to ebb. It appeared that in ebb tides a vessel in order to get into dock should have come on in the channel, which at low water was only from 30 to 40 yards wide, and been warped into the harbour by lines. The harbourmaster admitted that he intended the vessel to sail into the harbour without warping. If the tide had been flood tide, the operation of the tide would have kept the vessel away from the shore even although she was under a port helm. The master, who was at the helm the whole time, had no knowledge of the locality.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 11th June 1890, gave decree against the defenders in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defenders having reclaimed, the First Division pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that the fault of the harbourmaster, for which the defenders are responsible, directly led to the stranding of the 'Janets and Ann,' the vessel in question, on the occasion libelled; but find further that the persons in charge of the navigation of the said vessel were in fault in porting the helm when it should have been starboarded, and that this fault directly conduced to the stranding of the said vessel: Therefore sustain the fourth plea in law for the defenders: Assolzie them from the conclusions of the summons, and decern."

The pursuer appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The facts of this case are extremely clear, and I entertain no doubt as to the party upon whom the responsibility for the accident rests. This vessel, as I understand the matter, was hindered in her approach to the dock to which she was intended to proceed by reason of going over a bank which is not obvious to anybody not familiar with the place, but which was perfectly familiar to the harbourmaster. We start with this concession, about which there can be no doubt, because it is proved by the person who is principally interested in denying it, that the harbourmaster was under the impression that the tide was either flood tide or slack water. The next proposition which is established by the harbourmaster is that the manœuvre which he had intended the vessel to execute was not to anchor at all but to come straight into the dock. Now, that immediately raises this question. It is clear that if the tide had been flood tide the operation of the tide would have kept the vessel away from the shore, even although she was under a port helm. The question is a question of yards, so that a yard or two one way or the other would make the whole difference.

No. 2.

Mar. 31, 1892.
Renney v.
Magistrates
of Kirkcud-
bright.

The harbourmaster's own account of the transaction is that he saw the vessel, and he would therefore know that she was under a port helm. He says,—“I intended her to be in the middle channel, and to keep her so that she would be perfectly safe, and therefore what I intended to do was to tell her to keep off, and I afterwards intended to give her further directions when she should be sufficiently level with the entrance to the dock—my intention was to make her keep off.” He carries out that intention by directing her to come on. I omit, for the moment, the particular direction which he gave. I do not think that anybody is able to give a proper verbal description of the way in which the harbourmaster's hand waved—whether it was right or left or backwards or forward,—but that everybody on board understood it to be a direction and an obligation to them to come on, to come nearer to the dock, is certain—in fact there is no denial of it at all. The result was, as a matter of fact, that the vessel, being steered by the master, who knew nothing of the particular obstruction which was ultimately caused to the vessel, was steered in the appropriate and proper way to bring her into the dock, assuming that no such obstruction existed, and the accident happened by reason of the vessel grounding on the bank through that wrong steering.

It is said, in the first place, that the two persons who were on board (whom I decline to dignify by the name of “pilots,” for that is not an appropriate description of them, inasmuch as they were merely fishermen who came on board to assist the captain by their local knowledge) knew of the difficulty. Then comes this question. The original blunder was on the part of the harbourmaster, who did not know what the state of the tide was, it being admitted that the state of the tide makes a considerable difference in the direction which ought to be given by the person in charge of the operation. He gave directions which would have been appropriate to one state of the tide, in which the tide was not, but which were perfectly inappropriate to the state of the tide at that time. It is said that the two local pilots (I give them their dignified appellation) ought to have seen that there was danger. Now, we must see upon what hypothesis the two local pilots were proceeding. One was under the impression (there can be no doubt about it, not only because they say so, but also because the acts of the persons at the time shew what was thought to be intended) that so far from the vessel being sailed straight into the dock, the vessel was being brought up as near as she could be safely got to the pier-head, and was then to drop her anchor, so as to keep the vessel in a proper position for afterwards entering the harbour. Smith called out twice, and the last time in a tone which indicated some anxiety or impatience, I think, “Tell me when I am to drop my anchor.” Now, upon what hypothesis was the harbourmaster acting? If, as he says himself, he was under the impression that the vessel was to sail straight in, what was his duty then? Surely, when these local men (upon whom the Solicitor-General for Scotland relied, and as to whom he urged that we were entitled to consider that they would know what the difficulty was) called out to the harbourmaster, the harbourmaster must have known from their words that the idea in their minds, and in respect of which they must be supposed to have been acting, was first anchoring and then warping the vessel in. Instead of acting upon that idea he twice used the words “Come on.” I do

No. 2.

Mar. 31, 1892.
Renney v.
Magistrates
of Kirkcud-
bright.

not care with what gesture they were accompanied, for everybody concerned was under the impression that he meant the vessel to come on, and she did come on.

Under these circumstances there appears to me to be no doubt as to what was the cause of the mischief and as to who was responsible for it. The harbour-master gave the direction which he did, as he was entitled to do, but I do not think that his evidence and that of another witness are a model of candour. It is admitted that the vessel at that time was under the order of the harbour-master. The effort of the harbourmaster is to shew that until the vessel has actually got into the dock his authority does not arise, and that all the functions up to that time belong to those who are on board the vessel. It is not necessary to shew (because it is admitted on the record, and even if it were not admitted on the record, it is quite manifest) that the harbourmaster was then, in the exercise of his duty and vocation, giving directions to the vessels which were coming into the harbour—he did give directions to this particular vessel—and, as it appears to me, those directions were implicitly obeyed. I do not understand what direction is supposed to have been disregarded or what negligence is supposed to have been committed. The Solicitor-General said that the direction to come on was negligently obeyed, because they came on under a port helm. What was the thing which was being done? If it was what anybody might suppose, from the harbourmaster's statements and directions, was intended to be done, I do not see any negligence. The witness said that the place where he expected to anchor, and which was within a few yards of where they did actually anchor, was the usual place to anchor. But, as the Lord President very pertinently observes, if the harbourmaster had even then called out in time and had ordered the vessel to be anchored, no accident would have happened. I think that the judgment of the Lord President is confirmatory of the view which I take, because in his judgment he says that the harbour-master eventually gave that direction, but that he ought to have given it sooner than he did. My Lords, if that be the true view of the facts, there does not seem to me to be room for the defence of contributory negligence. The Solicitor-General, with the candour which distinguishes him, rather repudiated the notion of the matter being decided upon the question of contributory negligence at all. In truth there is no question here of contributory negligence. The question is, Who is responsible for what was ordered? Taking one view, the cause of it was the negligence of one set of people, and, taking the other view, the cause of it was the negligence of the other set of people, there being no contributory negligence upon either hypothesis.

Under these circumstances, it appears to me that the cause of the accident is abundantly clear; and the only proposition made here on the other side is a sort of suggestion that the harbourmaster had a limited authority by reason of his being aware that those persons who were on board the vessel were more familiar with the local circumstances of the place, and with the navigation, as being fishermen, than he was. My Lords, I think that that would be a very dangerous proposition to lay down. Of course, no one supposes that this is a case of wilfully running against an obstruction; but to say that the harbour-master's authority is limited, or that a person is at liberty to disregard the orders of the harbourmaster (who has by law power to give orders) because that person may have the idea in his mind that the harbourmaster is making a mistake, would be, to my mind, a most dangerous principle to establish. A double authority would probably in many cases be fatal. Those who have the power to give orders have the right to consider that they will be obeyed. It would, to my mind, be a very strong thing to say that a particular direction of the harbourmaster, in reference to what a vessel shall do, and who is within his right in giving it, should be disobeyed.

No. 2.
Mar. 31, 1892.
Renney v.
Magistrates
of Kirkcud-
bright.

I therefore move your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed from be reversed, and that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary be restored.

LORD WATSON.—I also am of opinion that the judgment of the Inner-House in this case must be reversed, and the decision of the Lord Ordinary restored. The mistake which caused damage to the ship arose from the vessel porting her helm, in consequence of which she ran on the bank and there stranded. The question is, Who is responsible for that mistake?

Now, when the vessel stranded she was confessedly within the harbourmaster's jurisdiction, her own captain being in charge. In the performance of his duty he was assisted by two local fishermen. It seems to me to be clearly proved, and to have been assumed by the learned judges in both Courts below, that the line upon which the vessel was steered by her captain was the very course which the harbourmaster by his words and gestures had invited her to pursue. It was suggested in argument by the Solicitor-General that, although the captain was ignorant of the danger which following that course as far as the pier would necessarily entail, yet it was known to two persons on board, namely, the fishermen to whom I have referred; and he further argued, that the owner of the vessel was affected by the knowledge of these men. My Lords, I consider that (to say the least of it) to be a very doubtful and dangerous proposition. But I do not think it necessary to consider that point, because these two men were not in charge of the vessel at the time. If they had known or understood that the harbourmaster intended the vessel to sail straight along the course which I have indicated into the harbour, I think it would have been their duty, seeing the knowledge which they had, to take some steps to prevent that order being followed out. Although they were not in charge, I think it would have been their duty to inform the captain. I do not suggest that their failure of duty in that respect, the captain being in charge, would have absolved the harbourmaster, or the respondents in this appeal, whose servant he was, from the consequences of his neglect. But these two fishermen were under the impression (a very natural one) that the captain of the vessel had been directed as to the course which was meant to be pursued; but that the vessel would be ordered to come to anchor before reaching the pier, in order that she might subsequently be warped into the harbour. Accordingly, when they reached that point, they made an earnest appeal, or rather, a series of earnest appeals, to the harbourmaster, to give them directions, and to let them know when they were to drop their anchor. The harbourmaster made no response to these appeals, for this very obvious reason, that at the time when they were made it was his intention that the vessel should proceed and enter the harbour under her own sail. He did entertain that intention, and intended to give directions to that effect, because he was negligently ignorant of the state of the tide at the time. He discovered his own ignorance just a moment too late, and then he changed his plan and gave the order, which he should have issued before, to drop anchor; and the consequence of his having been too late is one for which I think the respondents are clearly responsible.

No. 2.

Mar. 31, 1892.
 Renney v.
 Magistrates
 of Kirkcud-
 bright.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I am of the same opinion. According to the account which the harbourmaster himself gives, for whom the defenders are responsible, he was on the occasion in question inviting this vessel to enter the harbour. He was so inviting her under the impression that the tide was a flood tide, or at all events in ignorance that it was an ebb tide; and it appears clear upon all hands, that for a vessel to enter the harbour otherwise than upon a flood tide is a dangerous operation, and one which ought not to be attempted. According, therefore, to the shewing of the harbourmaster himself, he was giving an invitation which, under the circumstances, he ought not to have given, because it was one which could not be followed without danger.

Now that is the case put forward by the defenders' own main witness, on whose action everything turned so far as they are concerned. It seems to me impossible to doubt that the learned Judges in the Court below were right in thinking that there was ample evidence to warrant the conclusion (indeed that only one conclusion was possible) that there had been negligence on the part of the harbourmaster, and that for that negligence the defenders were responsible. This was the conclusion of the Lord Ordinary at the close of his judgment in favour of the appellant. But the learned judges in the Inner-House came to the conclusion, that although that negligence was established the defenders must be assoilzied because there was contributory negligence on the part of the appellant, without which this accident would not have happened. Now, that contributory negligence is alleged to have been the contributory negligence of those in charge of the ship. I think that expression is an unfortunate one, because it seems to me that when negligence is sought to be imputed to the owner of the vessel, it is necessary to inquire who is the particular person for whose negligence you seek to make him responsible. To speak in this way, "of those in charge of the ship," is calculated to lead to misunderstanding, and, I think, to mistake.

At the critical time, according to the view which I take, the person in charge of the ship was the master of the ship. These fishermen (local pilots if you will) who had been taken on board by him for his assistance and guidance, were not at that time in fact in charge of the ship. The evidence is this, that when a vessel comes to a certain point she must from that point obey the instructions of the harbourmaster. The master was himself at the helm, and so far from these men assuming any command or control of the vessel, they were looking for instructions, as is clear from the request which they made to the harbourmaster to direct them what to do. Therefore, if they had ever had charge of the ship they had abandoned it; and there was no obligation that they should have charge of her. The master himself was steering the ship, and was looking to the harbourmaster for directions. I am, therefore, quite unable to take the view that these two men were in any sense in charge of the ship—the master was in charge of her. It may still be that if there had been any failure to give information which the captain ought to have received from them, they might have been to blame, and a question would then have arisen, whether that blame could under the circumstances be imputed to the master of the vessel. But it is unnecessary to give any opinion upon that point.

Now, who was guilty of the contributory negligence which is alleged? Was it the master? The master of the vessel, no doubt, was the person who ported the helm, which is said to have been a wrong manœuvre. But it appears to me obvious that the master of the vessel was led to port the helm by the act of the harbourmaster; and if the tide had been a flood tide, as the harbourmaster supposed that it was, my impression is that the accident would not have happened, and that the vessel would have passed this bank in safety. The witnesses all say that the set of the ebb tide was towards the bank, and that the set of the flood tide was from the bank, and that in flood tide there would have been no danger in the manœuvre. The porting of the helm, though no doubt erroneous in an ebb tide, was erroneous only to a person who knew the condition of the river. There was nothing in the state of the river, as far as it could be seen, to indicate to a person not acquainted with it any danger in coming on in the course which the "Janets and Ann" was taking. The master was ignorant of the state of the river—he had only been there once before, I think nine years before. How is it possible to say that the master was guilty of any negligence, with a direction from the harbourmaster to come on, whatever the gesture connected with it may have been, and to come on as the master of the vessel says (and there is no contradiction of it so far as I can see) in a course which was appropriate for entering the harbour, according to ordinary navigation, but for the existence of a bank of which he was ignorant? How it can be said that under such circumstances he was guilty of any negligence at all, I am entirely at a loss to see.

No. 2.
Mar. 31, 1892.
Renney v.
Magistrates
of Kirkcud-
bright.

But then it is said that there was negligence on the part of the two pilots, and that their negligence may be imputed either to the master or to the owner of the vessel,—I do not quite know in which way the case is put. I think that there is very great difficulty in imputing the negligence of these fishermen either to the master or to the owner of the vessel. But was there any negligence on their part at all? They, it is quite true, knew of the bank; but because they knew of the bank they very naturally interpreted the manœuvre suggested by the harbourmaster in a different way from that in which it was interpreted by the captain. He, not knowing of the danger, understood that he was to make the best of his course into the dock. It was natural enough that they, knowing of the danger which there would be if the vessel came too near in towards the pier, should understand that she was merely being brought near the pier for the purpose of anchoring in order to be warped in. Therefore they called out to the harbourmaster, "Let us know when we are to let go our anchor," imagining that he would give that order so as to save her from going on the bank; and if he had given that order in time no accident would have happened. Was there any negligence on their part in doing so? It is quite true that he let them go on too long. It is quite true that they were apprehensive that if he let them go on too long danger would ensue. But when did the time come at which these men ought to have disregarded the orders of the harbourmaster, and to have taken upon themselves to anchor, instead of obeying his orders? It is obvious that by disregarding his order danger might have followed. If it had followed, that would have thrown the entire responsibility upon them. I fully agree with my noble and learned friend, the Lord Chancellor, in his statement that when a vessel is within the jurisdiction of the harbourmaster, and he is giving his orders as to the place of anchorage, it is only in the last resort, and when the danger is fully obvious, that any rational man would think that the harbourmaster's orders should not be strictly attended to. I very much doubt whether the negligence of these men could, under the circumstances, be treated as negligence of the person in charge of the ship for which the owner was responsible; but, even assuming that it could, I cannot see that there was any negligence at all.

No. 2.

Mar. 31, 1892.
Renney v.
Magistrates
of Kirkcud-
bright.

I should add this further, that the harbourmaster saw the vessel coming under a port helm, which is said to have been a wrong manœuvre, and seeing her coming under a port helm, he called out again, "Come on." That was not done in a way which would unmistakably and unequivocally indicate to her that she was in the direction of danger, and must change her course, and carry out an entirely different manœuvre.

Under these circumstances, I think that the defenders are responsible for the negligence of the harbourmaster, and that there was no contributory negligence negating that responsibility.

LORD MORRIS.—In the view which I take of this case, I consider that the pursuer is affected by the knowledge of Smith and Poland, the pilots, and that if contributory negligence could be brought home to Smith and Poland, it would affect the pursuer. The captain took those two men on board as pilots. I see that at the trial it seems to have been the object of the defenders to disparage Smith. It was suggested that he was rather a poacher than a pilot. Now, it would appear that it was rather the object of those on the part of the pursuer to shew that Smith was only a fisherman. He was accepted by the captain as a pilot. The captain in his evidence says that because of this he took these men on board. He took their directions right through. He allowed Smith to hail the harbourmaster while he was standing on the deck. The answer of the harbourmaster was to the hailing of Smith, who was the pilot, at all events, on that particular occasion. He was accepted by the captain, and an observation was made by the harbourmaster by which he was really as much affected as the captain himself. I am therefore clearly of opinion that the captain must be affected by the knowledge of Smith and Poland, and if so, the pilot was in the place of the owner of the ship on that occasion; and if contributory negligence is brought home to Smith and Poland, I think that the case ought to be decided in favour of the defenders.

But on the assumption that that is so, I am still of opinion that the judgment which has been moved is the proper one. What exactly did the harbourmaster say? "Come on" was admittedly his phrase. I leave out of consideration his gesture or the wave of his hand; but at the time when he was asked, "When are we to anchor?" he said, "Come on." Ordinarily speaking to one who is not a nautical person that means "come on" in the direction of the person who is making the observation—that is to say, "come on" in the course that you are going. The harbourmaster saying that, whoever is in charge of the vessel is under the impression that "come on" means that he is to port his helm and come in the direction of the speaker—that is, a distance of 150 yards. The case now of the harbourmaster is, that by "come on" he intended that the vessel should sail right through into port. In answer to the question, "When shall we anchor?" which appears to be a very natural question, the harbourmaster says, "Come on." Anchoring is not a mode of progression. Even taking the most favourable view of it, it appears to me, looking at the captain's story, that he was never under the impression at that time, when this observation was addressed to him in answer to the question, "When are we to anchor?" that the vessel was to sail right through into port. Those words would bear to him a totally different character. The question being, "When are we to anchor?" the reply would not convey to him the idea that "come on" meant "come right on into port." I am under the impression that the harbourmaster, it being a flood tide, thought that the vessel could advance with safety under a port helm. They did not see the danger until one of the pilots, Smith, again hailed the harbourmaster, and said, "Be sure to tell us when we are to anchor." Smith said that seeing the approaching danger; but neither Smith nor the harbourmaster, who had as much knowledge of the bank as these two pilots had, could have come to the conclusion that they were tilting up against the bank, or why should they have pursued a course which led them towards the bank? Both Smith and the harbourmaster, in my opinion, thought the vessel was approaching the bank. Smith seems to have been more wary than the harbourmaster, and to have seen that the vessel was getting into danger. The harbourmaster, as it appears to me, did not at first think so; but at last he said, "Now let go the anchor." That would not have been the observation of a man who intended the vessel to sail right through and not to port her helm. In addition to that, it seems to me, that seeing the vessel going along that river about 150 yards (because the accident took place at about 50 yards, and it would occupy three or four minutes), if the harbourmaster had seen that to be the wrong course he would have remonstrated, instead of which, he encourages those on board to keep their course.

No. 2.

Mar. 31, 1892.

Renny v.

Magistrates

of Kirkcud-

bright.

In my opinion, my Lords, there is no contributory negligence established against Smith. He hailed the harbourmaster twice at least, and put the question to him which I have stated; and he acted under the impression that, although he might have apprehended danger, that danger was not of a manifest and plain character, and he thought that he might stop in time to avoid actual danger, he taking the course which was prescribed to him.

LORD FIELD.—I am also of opinion that this appeal should be allowed. The question is one of fact. Now, the Lord Ordinary and the learned Lords of Session have all been of opinion that the act of porting the helm, when and where the helm was ported, was directly due to the act of the harbourmaster, and I see no reason whatever to differ from that conclusion. The only point which seemed to me capable of being argued at your Lordships' bar, with any prospect of success, was whether or not the master, and those on board the ship, were guilty themselves of such negligence, directly conducing to the accident, as to absolve the defenders from blame.

Now, I have followed with great care the observations which have been made by both of my noble and learned friends who have preceded me, and I cannot help concurring in the view which has been expressed by my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Herschell) upon the question, whose negligence it is that is alleged to be contributory, so as to afford protection to the defenders. It must be the negligence either of the master or of the two so-called pilots who were on board. I agree in thinking that the ship at the time when she ported her helm was in charge of the master. It is true that he had the two men on board, who were acquainted with the river; but it seems to me that he is the person upon whom the negligence ought to be fixed, if it can be fixed at all. Now, was he justified in doing what he did? He himself was a stranger to the river. The harbourmaster was the person whose orders, in my judgment, he was bound to obey. The bye-law is very express; it points out that as soon as a ship arrives at the Moat Brae she is not to proceed if the harbourmaster's orders are that she is not to do so.

Now, was the master guilty of any negligence? or did he act reasonably in

No. 2.

Mar. 31, 1892.
Benney v.
Magistrates
of Kirkcud-
bright.

what he was then doing? Now it is difficult, of course, with a considerable conflict of evidence as to what did take place, to decide upon what is the exact truth; but there is evidence that the harbourmaster said, "Come on." It is also said that he waved his hand, and that the master of the ship was himself ignorant of the state of the water, or of the condition of the river. It seems to me, therefore, that the harbourmaster certainly acted in such a way as that the master and everybody concerned thought that he was inviting the ship to come on, both by his language and by his gesture; and that under these circumstances it is impossible to impute to the master of the ship such negligence as to destroy the pursuer's right to sue.

Then with regard to the two persons who are called pilots, they certainly did know of the danger which the ship was running; but looking to the terms of the bye-law, and also to the power of the harbourmaster and the ordinary course of practice in the river, it seems to me that they might not unreasonably act upon the view that the harbourmaster was going to stop them, and to answer their inquiry, made twice, "Where shall we anchor?" and "Let us know when we are to anchor," in time to prevent any injury. Therefore, I think that they did not act unreasonably in proceeding as far as they did.

INTERLOCUTORS of the 19th December 1890 and 26th February 1891 appealed from reversed: Interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of the 11th of June 1890 restored: Cause remitted to the Court of Session: The respondents to pay to the appellant the costs of the action in the Court of Session, and the costs incurred by him in respect of the appeal to this House.

PRITCHARD & SONS—MOSS & SHEARPE—STIBBEARD, GIBSON, & WILLS—JOHN BELL, W.S.

No. 3.

THE ANGLO-AMERICAN BRUSH ELECTRIC LIGHT CORPORATION (Defenders), Appellants.—Att.-Gen. Webster—Moulton, Q.C.—J. C. Graham.

April 5, 1892.
The Anglo-
American
Brush Electric Light Corporation v.
King, Brown,
& Co.

KING, BROWN, & COMPANY (Pursuers), Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Murray—Alfred Daniell.

Patent—Prior publication.—The validity of a patent for making dynamo-electric machines was challenged on the ground of prior publication founded upon a description in the specification of an earlier patent.

Held (aff. judgment of the First Division) that the test to be applied to the description so published was not whether it was sufficient to enable a mechanic to make the machine, but whether the invention was disclosed to the public in a manner so clear as to enable educated men conversant with the subject to give instructions for the making of the machines, and that applying that test there had been prior publication.

Ld. Chancellor
(Halsbury).
Lord Watson.
Ld. Herschell
Lord Mac-
naghten.
Lord Field.

(IN the Court of Session, July 16, 1890, 17 R. 1266.)

The defenders appealed.

In the appeal the only questions argued were prior publication and public user.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—This is an appeal against an interlocutor of the First Division of the Court of Session affirming the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, setting aside the patent of which the appellants are the assignees, on the ground that the portion of the invention patented (with which, under the circumstances, it is alone material to deal) had been previously published.

The patent so set aside is known as Brush's patent, and bears date the 18th of November 1878, and the question in debate is whether a patent taken out by Mr Samuel Alfred Varley in 1876 does or does not so anticipate the patent of No. 3. 1878, of which the appellants are the assignees, as to make the latter patent bad.

The patent has relation to the particular form of dynamo-electric machines, all of which have, and were known to have before the date of either patent, this principle in common, that they move magnets past coils of wire or coils past magnets with sufficient velocity to produce the desired result.

April 5, 1892.
The Anglo-American
Brush Electric
Light Corporation v.
King, Brown,
& Co.

It was also familiar knowledge before the date of either patent, that a current of electricity sent round a bar of soft iron would render the bar of iron magnetic.

Undoubtedly the progress of electrical science has given rise to various forms of using that energy in which the two principles to which I have adverted have become important, and the practical application of them by means of different mechanical devices has for some time past exercised the ingenuity of practical electricians.

One appears to have been the idea of making one wire go round the iron bar, to make it and maintain it as a magnet,—making the same wire go to perform whatever work it was intended to perform, and returning to the magnet, and thus the single current doing two things.

The further step was made when what was called the shunt apparatus was invented. The current of electricity was divided into two. One stream, so to speak, was made to go round the iron bar, keeping it magnetic, while the other was led to do the work which it was required to do, and they were rejoined after the work had been accomplished.

Mr Imray explains with great clearness what are the two principles called series and shunt-winding.

On the machine being revolved, he says, a wire wrapped round and round the magnet crosses over to another magnet, proceeds to do whatever work is required of it in what is called the external or working circuit, and goes back again after doing the work.

It is called “series” winding, because the coils of the electro-magnet are in series with the external circuit—that is to say, it is one continuous wire. The current goes straight from start to finish. The whole electricity produced by the machine goes to excite the magnet and to the external wire, and straight from the one to the other.

The weak point of it (said Mr Imray) is this, that as soon as you break the external circuit you cease to have an electric machine, because there is no current. In electrical language, that is spoken of as having the external circuit opened. When the external circuit is broken or opened, the current ceases to flow, and you do not have the advantage of any magnetising action by the current going around the magnets of the machine.

In the same way, the more resistance you put in your external circuit—that is to say, the more work you ask your machine to do—the less current will flow through the external circuit; and the more work you have, the less you will be doing towards the magnetising of your machine. Resistance in wire depends, first, upon the character of the wire, and what metal it consists of; secondly, upon its transverse section; and thirdly, upon its length. The longer the wire, the greater the resistance; the smaller the section, the greater the resistance; and one kind of metal has more resistance than another. Roughly speaking, a short thick wire has much less resistance than a long thin one.

No. 3.
 April 5, 1892.
 The Anglo-American
 Brush Electric
 Light Corporation v.
 King, Brown,
 & Co.

Another form is what is called "shunt" winding, in which the difference is simply in the disposition of the wires. The current coming away is split into two. One portion of it goes to what has been called the external circuit, doing whatever is to be done, and having done that work returns to the machine, but without any actual contact with the magnets of the machine at all. The other portion goes straight to the magnet, is wrapped round it as before, and then returns to the brush, as it is called, without any contact with the external circuit at all.

The strong point (says Mr Imray) of this arrangement is that, whether the external circuit is open or closed, there is always magnetism in the wire capable of producing electricity, because the current is continually running through the shunt to the magnet. A defect in it is that some of the electricity is taken away from the external circuit which otherwise would go through it.

One further explanation of Mr Imray's becomes necessary to follow the question with which your Lordships have to deal, and that has reference to what Mr Imray says is variously known as "electro-motive force," "tension," "pressure," and "potential."

"Potential" seems to be the word generally used, and means the intensity of pressure by which the electricity is caused to pass along a conductor.

The advantage of what is called a compound winding,—which is neither more nor less than a combination of the two previously described, the first being known as "series," the second as "shunt,"—is in producing a constant pressure, or an equal volume, or an even current. It is difficult, except by finding analogies in other subjects of physical research than electricity, to convey the exact idea; but the advantage attained at all events is, that when the work is changed in the outer circuit the amount of current that goes round the magnet is so changed that one compensates, or nearly compensates, for the other.

Now in the patent patented in 1876, Mr Varley says,—“Part of the electricity developed by the machine is diverted” (and the word is significant) “to maintain the magnetism of the soft iron magnets, and the remaining portion is used to produce the electric light. There are several well-known ways of doing this” (this has been the subject of very violent comment); “but the method I prefer is to wrap the soft iron magnets with two insulated wires, one having a larger resistance than the other. The circuit of larger resistance is always closed, and the circuit of less resistance is used for the electric light.

“When the electric light is being produced, the greater portion of electricity passes through the circuit of less resistance, which I term ‘the electric light circuit,’ maintaining the magnetism of the magnets and producing the light. When the electric light circuit is opened from any cause, the electricity developed passes through the circuit of greater resistance only, and maintains the magnetism of the magnets.”

It is impossible to deny that in the present state of electrical knowledge dealing with dynamos, the description given undoubtedly does disclose to anybody familiar with the principle of electro-dynamos and the medium by which the electric current is turned to account, the very thing for which the patent was granted to Mr Brush.

But it is said that, for the purpose of judging of the novelty of the invention of 1876, one must, as nearly as one can, apply one's self to the knowledge existing at that date, and not apply what we have learned since, so as to interpret the language of the patent of 1876 by the light of later discoveries. No. 3.

I am not quite certain that I understand the application to this case of that principle of interpretation, which, however, I admit to be sound. The “series” was known, the “shunt” was known, and the language seems to me incapable of any other interpretation than that the patentee did mean to combine two previously known systems. If he did, and disclosed the mode of doing it, the novelty of the later patent cannot be supported. April 5, 1892.
The Anglo-American
Brush Electric
Light Corporation v.
King, Brown,
& Co.

I confess that I am unable to entertain a doubt that it was so disclosed. What he intended was, I think, conclusively shewn by the original rough sketch produced. Distinguished electricians cavil at the mode of its disclosure, criticise the language (which is not, perhaps, the most felicitously chosen), and possibly suggest doubts as to what would have been the fate of Mr Varley’s patent if it had been attacked upon the ground of the insufficiency of the specification ; but that is not the question to be determined here.

The question is the disclosure of the invention, which consisted in the combination of two known forms of dynamo-electric machines.

I doubt whether there is much to choose in clearness of exposition between the one patent and the other. I think it is certain that neither the one patentee nor the other had any very definite notion of the importance of the invention until a year or two later.

The invention of the incandescent light brought into prominence the importance of an even, uniform, and continuous flow of the electric energy.

I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor appealed from ought to be affirmed.

I have confined myself, however, in arriving at this conclusion, to the specifications themselves, aided by scientific witnesses, in interpreting the scientific nomenclature in which the specifications are couched, and the explanations of the witnesses as to the operations produced by the different forms adopted.

I designedly avoid giving any opinion upon the question of the user of Varley’s machine. Many questions, to my mind, arise as to what publication there was from the use of that machine as a machine disclosing the mode by which the electric light was produced. But inasmuch as I have come to the conclusion that I have indicated, it is not necessary further to discuss the extent to which the use of the electric light by means of Varley’s machine for the purpose of illustrating some submarine invention was such an exhibition or publication of it as would make a subsequent patent void.

I therefore move your Lordships, that the interlocutor appealed from be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed, with costs.

LORD WATSON.—The appellants are assignees of Brush’s patent of 1878, for improvements in apparatus for the generation and application of electricity for lighting, plating, and other purposes. The patent originally included two different dynamo-electric apparatus, now known respectively as the shunt and the series-shunt ; but in 1882 the appellants, having become aware of the fact that their shunt-winding machine had already been fully described and claimed in Clark’s patent of 1875, amended their specification by disclaiming that part of it which related to shunt-winding, and limiting their claim to the series-shunt.

In this appeal, they complain of a decision of the First Division of the Court

No. 3.

April 5, 1892.
The Anglo-
American
Brush Electric Light Corporation v.
King, Brown,
& Co.

of Session, affirming an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary (Trayner), by which he reduced and set aside their letters-patent as amended by disclaimer, on the grounds, inter alia, that the series-shunt apparatus therein described had been published in Varley's patent of 1876, and also that there had been prior public user.

Dynamo-electric machines are useful for various kinds of work, but are now chiefly employed for producing light. I shall, in so far as it may be necessary to describe such machines, refer to them as if they were used for the latter purpose.

At the date of Clark's patent, the only known variety of self-exciting dynamos was the series-winding apparatus in which the current of electricity generated in the revolving coils, after it has passed through the commutator, is conducted to and round the magnets, and thence to the lamps, from which it returns to the machine, thus forming a single electric circuit, which performs the double function of magnetising the magnets and doing work. In the shunt apparatus, the volume of electricity, after it has passed the commutator, is divided into two unequal currents by means of a shunt, or bifurcation of the conducting wire, which is in itself a common device. The smaller current is then made to circulate round the magnets, whilst the larger is led to the lamps; and they are again united just before they re-enter the machine. So that these currents form two separate circuits, that of greater resistance maintaining the supply of electric force in the magnets, and that of lesser resistance producing light.

The series-shunt-winding apparatus is, as its name imports, a combination of the two systems already described. Its arrangements are practically the same with those of the shunt-winding machine, subject to this modification, that, after bifurcation, the larger current, instead of being taken direct to the lamps, is, in the first instance, made to encircle the magnets. Accordingly, the smaller current serves for excitation only, as in the shunt system; whereas the larger current serves both for excitation and for work, as in the series-winding system.

Whether the series-shunt system was first disclosed to the public by Varley in 1876, or by Brush in 1878, it seems to be certain that the real merit of the arrangement was neither understood nor appreciated until the subsequent discovery of the incandescent lamp. The efficiency of light produced by the incandescence of filaments of carbon depends upon the maintenance of a uniform and steady flow of electricity in the working circuit, which is now termed a constant potential. In the series, and also in the shunt system, the working current is liable to considerable variation; with this difference, that the same disturbing elements which in the one case cause a decrease, in the other occasion an increase of electro-motive force. The combination of these opposite tendencies brings into play the principle of compensation, and makes it possible, by careful adjustment, to attain a more constant potential with the series-shunt than with either of its component systems.

The terms of Brush's specification indicate that the patentee had not in his view the attainment of that high degree of constancy in the motive force which is desirable for the purpose of incandescent lighting. He points out that other machines were "not well adapted for certain kinds of work, notably that of electroplating," and then proceeds to describe his own in these terms:—"I attain my object by diverting from external work a portion of the current of the machine, and using it either alone or in connection with the rest of the current for working the field magnets. I prefer the latter plan of the two, No. 3. especially for electroplating machines." In other words, he attains his object by using either the shunt or the series-shunt, but prefers the latter for electroplating. For other purposes than electroplating, he does not suggest that the one system is in any respect greatly preferable to the other. As matter of fact, it appears to be doubtful which of the two is most suitable for plating. Preece, one of the appellants' skilled witnesses, says,—“Pure shunt is preferred in England for electroplating. In America the compound is preferred.”

April 5, 1892.
The Anglo-American
Brush Electric
Light Corporation v.
King, Brown,
& Co.

In Varley's patent in 1876 no claim is made either for shunt or series-winding. The passage which has been held by both Courts below to anticipate the invention claimed by the appellants, is merely descriptive of the machines to which the arrangements claimed by Varley may be usefully applied, and is in these terms. [His Lordship read the portion given above in Lord Halsbury's opinion.*]

In estimating the real significance of Varley's specification, it is necessary to consider what amount of information with respect to dynamo-electric apparatus ought to be attributed to persons who had an opportunity of reading it in the year 1876. The language used by the patentee must be construed with reference to the information then open to the public, and not in the light of subsequent discoveries. To my apprehension, it does not admit of doubt that a reader acquainted only with series-winding might not attach the same meaning to the words used by Varley as would naturally occur to one who was also familiar with the shunt, or with the shunt and series-shunt systems of winding.

Since the hearing of this appeal, I have carefully perused the whole evidence adduced by both parties, in so far as it has any bearing upon the issue of prior publication. Of the respondents' evidence it is sufficient to say that it is in entire accordance with the decision appealed from. The appellants' evidence consists of oral testimony by electricians of great eminence, and is directed mainly, if not wholly, to prove (1) that, on a fair construction of the specification of 1876, the words relied on by the Court of Session do not disclose either shunt or series-shunt winding, and (2) assuming them to do so, that the specification does not contain explanations or directions which would enable a workman of ordinary skill to construct either a shunt or a series-shunt machine. I need hardly say that it is for the Court, and not for the witnesses, to construe the terms of the specification; and that their evidence upon the first of these points is only material in so far as it may supply scientific facts which ought to be taken into account in arriving at the true construction of the instrument.

There is one circumstance which, in my opinion, seriously affects the value of the appellants' evidence upon both points. The testimony of their witnesses was given upon the footing that, in 1876, Clark's invention of the previous year was still unknown, and that those who read Varley's specification could have no knowledge of any system other than series-winding. Upon that assumption, it occurs to me that a reader, whether a man of science or skilled workman, would probably have been at a loss to discover what Varley meant, and might not have arrived at either shunt or series-shunt winding without some exercise of his inventive faculty. I am, however, unable to find any good reason for holding that Clark's shunt machine was unknown in the year 1876.

No. 3.

April 5, 1892.
The Anglo-
American
Brush Electric Light Corporation v.
King, Brown,
& Co.

It is true that in 1878, Mr Brush had never heard of Clark's invention, and also that shunt-winding was unknown to Sir William Thomson before 1879. But it appears to me, that Clark's taking out a patent for his invention was, both in fact and law, a publication of it. I do not suppose that every electrician, however eminent, is by necessity personally cognizant of every invention patented within the bounds of his science; and the ignorance of two or more of them is unavailing to prove that the knowledge of others was equally defective. I cannot, therefore, avoid the conclusion that in 1876 Clark's shunt-winding machine had been disclosed to the public, and must have been known to some, if not to all electricians; and consequently that the controverted passage in Varley's specification ought to be construed on the footing that shunt-winding was known at its date.

I do not think it necessary to deal with the conflict of testimony as to the sufficiency of Varley's specification for the guidance of a skilled workman. The Lord Ordinary was of opinion that the appellants had failed to prove that part of their case. But I agree with his Lordship, and with the learned Judges of the First Division, in holding that the sufficiency or insufficiency of the specification for that purpose does not afford a crucial test of prior publication. Every patentee, as a condition of his exclusive privilege, is bound to describe his invention in such detail as to enable a workman of ordinary skill to practise it; and the penalty of non-compliance with that condition is forfeiture of his privilege. His patent right may be invalid by reason of non-compliance; but it certainly does not follow that his invention has not been published. His specification may, notwithstanding that defect, be sufficient to convey to men of science and employers of labour information which will enable them, without any exercise of inventive ingenuity, to understand his invention, and to give a workman the specific directions which he failed to communicate. In that case, I cannot doubt that his invention is published as completely as if his description had been intelligible to a workman of ordinary skill.

Assuming as, in my opinion, I am bound to do, that Clark's invention was known in 1876, I have no hesitation in holding that Varley's specification sufficiently describes both the shunt and the series-shunt machine. The first sentence in the passage already quoted contains an accurate representation of shunt-winding. The electricity developed by the machine is to be "diverted," which is the word used in the appellants' specification to denote bifurcation, into two parts, one for magnetising, and the "remaining portion" for producing light. These expressions plainly refer to a single current of electricity generated by the machine, which is to be split into two currents, one for excitation of the magnets, and one for work—an arrangement which, according to the evidence, embraces all the essential features of a shunt machine. The sentences which follow appear to me to describe the series-shunt with equal accuracy. They commence with the statement that there are several ways of "doing this,"—that is, of obtaining a circuit of excitation and an electric lighting circuit from a single current by dividing it into two portions. The method preferred is to make both circuits pass round the magnets, that of greater resistance being employed for excitation only, whilst that of lesser resistance excites the magnets, and also does the work of lighting. The series-shunt is evidently treated as a mere modification of the shunt system; and I think it might be reasonably regarded in that light by the patentee. The alteration in the mechanical arrangement of the apparatus is in itself trivial; and the possibility of thereby obtain ing such a constant potential as would, at a future date, suffice for the purpose of incandescent lighting was not present to his mind. There might, as one of the witnesses suggests, still remain room for a patentable improvement upon the series-shunt as described by Varley, consisting in an adjustment which would ensure a high degree of constant potential. No such possibility is indicated either by Varley or in Brush's patent of 1878.

In the argument addressed to your Lordships, counsel for the appellants laid much stress upon these words occurring in Varley's specification. "The insulated wire composing the helices is connected to the insulated wire surrounding the soft iron magnets of the machine, and is usually inserted in the circuit of greater resistance." They maintained that the necessary result of giving effect to that direction would be to deprive the apparatus contemplated by Varley of all the characteristics of series-shunt winding. The point does not appear to have been pressed in the Courts below; at least, it is not noticed by any of the Judges. In the absence of evidence to support the appellants' contention, I have come to the conclusion that the adjustment thus indicated might affect the constancy of the volume of electricity conveyed by the electric light circuit, but that the apparatus would still be a series-shunt-winding machine.

These reasons are sufficient to dispose of this appeal, and I desire to express no opinion upon the matter of prior public user. The argument of the appellants satisfied me that the question was one upon which I should prefer not to form any conclusion without hearing counsel for the respondents. I therefore concur in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor.

LORD HERSCHELL.—This is an appeal against interlocutors pronounced in an action of reduction brought by the respondents for the purpose of obtaining the revocation of certain letters-patent then vested in the appellants. The letters-patent in question bear date the 18th of November 1878, and claim the invention of "improvements in apparatus for the generation and application of electricity for lighting, plating, and other purposes." The original specification concluded with sixteen claims, to only two of which I need now refer. The eighth claim is for what is termed in relation to dynamo-electric machinery the "shunt" system; that is to say, a dynamo-electric machine wherein a portion of the current produced is diverted for the purpose of maintaining a permanent magnetic field. The ninth claim is for what is now termed the shunt-series system or compound winding. In January 1882 a disclaimer was filed by which the eighth claim was abandoned, it having been discovered that the shunt system was not new at the date of the letters-patent. The main question, and indeed in my opinion the only question with which your Lordships need concern yourselves, is whether the shunt-series system was a new invention at that date. It is alleged by the respondents that it was not only communicated to the public by the specification of the letters-patent granted to Samuel Alfred Varley in December 1876, but that a machine was under his instructions constructed on that system, and had been in actual use before the date of the patent now vested in the appellants.

Varley's specification claimed a method of obtaining a high degree of "magnetic potential" in the bobbins of an electric machine, and the claim had no reference to the manner in which the electricity generated was to be employed; but there occurs in the course of the specification the following passage:—[His

No. 3.

April 5, 1892.
The Anglo-American
Brush Electric
Light Corporation v.
King, Brown,
& Co.

No. 3. Lordship read the portion of the specification given above in Lord Halsbury's opinion*].

April 5, 1892.
The Anglo-American
Brush Electric
Light Corporation v.
King, Brown,
& Co.

It is scarcely denied that to any electrician possessed of the knowledge of the present day these words would convey the idea of the series-shunt system of winding. But it is said, and with truth, that this is not the test, and that the question is, what idea they would convey to a person reading them prior to the date of the patent which is in contest in the present suit. The learned counsel for the appellants argued strenuously at the bar that in the light of the more limited information then available such a reader would not be led to a knowledge of the device described in Brush's patent. They contended, moreover, that in other parts of Varley's specification statements are to be found which, taken in connection with the passage relied on, would lead the reader away from the conception of this scheme of compound winding. It is necessary, therefore, to inquire what was the state of knowledge prior to 1878. The system of series-winding was well known. By this arrangement the current generated is led round the magnets, and from the magnets is conducted to the lamps, or to serve the other purposes for which it is to be employed, and then back to the machine so as to complete the circuit. This device was subject to the defect that the magnetism of the magnets might be diminished at the very time when it was desirable that the current generated should be maintained. In May 1876 letters-patent were sealed bearing date the 11th of December previous, the specification of which, it is admitted, disclosed the shunt system of winding, by which one part of the current is diverted to maintain the magnetism of the soft iron magnets, whilst the remainder is used to produce the electric light, or serve any other purpose for which the current is required. It was urged on behalf of the appellants that there was no evidence that the invention thus disclosed had become commonly known prior to 1878, or that it had ever been put in operation, and that Varley's specification ought, therefore, not to be construed on the assumption that those who read it would be acquainted with the shunt system of winding. I cannot accede to this view. It appears certain that at the date when he took out his patent Varley was acquainted with the shunt system, and, indeed, with the shunt-series system of winding, for this is conclusively established by the drawing made by him which was put in evidence. Of course, I do not refer to this for the purpose of construing his specification, but only as bearing on the question whether the shunt system was known prior to 1878. The shunt system had been described in Clark's specification of 1875, and it is impossible to say that other electricians may not have been, like Varley, acquainted with it. Under these circumstances, I cannot regard it otherwise than as part of the stock of public knowledge, which must be taken into account when approaching the construction of Varley's specification. Taking, then, the shunt system and the series system of winding as both known, what information ought the specification of Varley to be regarded as conveying? The words with which the important passage in Varley's specification commences appear to me to be apt to describe the shunt system. It is impossible not to be struck with the similarity of the language used to that which is to be found in the part of Brush's specification, which was avowedly describing that system. I am not much struck with the suggestion that the words "the remaining portion is used to produce the electric light" indicate that the use was to be for that purpose alone, and that this portion of the current was to play no part in maintaining the magnetism of the magnets, and that the description is therefore inconsistent with the shunt-series system. It seems to me impossible so to understand the language employed when the import of the sentences which immediately follow is considered. Indeed, it is admitted by one of the defendants' witnesses, Professor Sylvanus Thomson, that the criticism resolves itself into this, that he finds in two sentences what he might have expected to find in one. But a passage such as that with which we are dealing, in which each sentence is obviously connected with those which precede and follow, must be construed as a whole, and such a criticism as that which has been applied to it appears to me wholly inadmissible. Then it is said that, although compound winding is described, it would not be understood at that time to refer to compound winding as now understood, but to the winding on the magnets of two wires the current of electricity in each of which was separately excited. But the fact that it is prescribed that one of the two wires is to have a larger resistance than the other, and the statement that when the electric light is being produced "the greater portion of electricity" passes through the circuit of less resistance, appear to me not to suggest the idea of separate excitation, but the contrary; and when the whole passage is read together this impression is strengthened. And it is admitted by the defendants' witnesses that there is at least one passage in the specification inconsistent with the idea that separate excitation was contemplated. The argument that other parts of Varley's specification would lead the reader away from the conception of compound winding was mainly founded upon this passage:—"The insulated wire composing the helices is connected to the insulated wire surrounding the soft iron magnets of the machine, and is usually inserted in the circuit of greater resistance." It was argued that if this were done the circuit of greater resistance would not be always closed. This assertion is controverted. But whether it be correct or no, I do not think the words relied on would lead anyone reading the earlier part of the specification to the conclusion that the circuit of greater resistance was not intended to be always closed in face of the express statement that it was to be so. The other criticisms were, to my mind, of less weight, and I do not think that any part of the specification would divert a reader of the important passage on which the controversy has mainly turned from the idea of shunt-series winding. Sir W. Thomson, one of the defendants' witnesses, admits that it is quite probable that in 1876 a workman might have been led to series-shunt winding by Varley's descriptions. And Professor Sylvanus Thomson says,— "If a workman of the present day were to read Varley's patent, I think he would read it as describing a shunt-series machine, because he would read the knowledge of the present day into it, and that would alter the meaning he attached to the language." Now, I admit the difficulty of divesting one's self of existing knowledge, and interpreting any description as it would have been interpreted when the stock of knowledge was more limited. But to anyone acquainted with the shunt and series systems, I think the same idea would be conveyed as is conveyed now. If to a person cognisant of these two systems the conception of their combination into the shunt-series system would have constituted a new departure, the case might have assumed a different complexion; but it is clear that Varley did not regard this combination as a new discovery. And I think it is impossible to read Brush's specification without seeing that when once he had arrived at the shunt system the application of it in conjunc-

* Ante, p. 22.

No. 3.

April 5, 1892.
 The Anglo-American
 Brush Electric
 Light Corporation v.
 King, Brown,
 & Co.

No. 3.

April 5, 1892.
The Anglo-
American
Brush Electric Light Corporation v.
King, Brown,
& Co.

tion with the series system appeared to follow as a corollary. His object was to secure a permanent magnetic field. He attained this object by means of the shunt system. His words are,—“I attain my object by diverting from external work a portion of the current of the machine, and using it either alone or in connection with the rest of the current for working the field magnets.” He treats the shunt-series system, in truth, as a mere modification of the shunt system, of which he believed himself to be the inventor, though he has naturally a distinct claim to cover this modification.

The learned counsel for the appellants laid great stress on the fact that since Brush's specification the shunt-series system has come largely into use, and deduced from it the argument that it could not previously have been known. But it must be remembered that the importance of this system has only become very marked since the incandescent lamp has come into use. In connection with this form of electric lighting it is no doubt of the highest importance to secure a constant potential. And this object is best attained by the shunt-series system, the defects of each of these systems when used separately tending to counteract one another when they are used in combination. But there is not a trace in Brush's specification of this idea of a constant potential. What he was concerned to obtain was a permanent magnetic field. He expresses his preference for the combined systems, “especially for electroplating machines.” It is true that a certain number—not, I think, a very large number—of Brush's machines were introduced into this country for electroplating purposes before the days of the incandescent lamp. It is, however, regarded as an open question whether pure shunt is not better for the purpose of electroplating than series-shunt owing to the possibility that the polarity of the magnets may be reversed. It would seem that whilst the latter system is more in vogue in America, the former is given the preference in this country. I am satisfied that neither Varley nor Brush had in his mind the importance of maintaining a constant potential. But for the reasons I have given I think that any electrician reading Varley's specification with a knowledge of the two systems of series and shunt would have found there a description, which he would have had no difficulty in giving practical effect to, of the system of compound winding known as series-shunt.

Having arrived at this conclusion, it is unnecessary to determine the effect of the use of the machine constructed under Varley's instructions, though I think it would be a matter for serious consideration whether after that use the appellants' patent could be supported.

I think the judgment of the Court below was right, and ought to be affirmed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I have had an opportunity of reading in print the opinions which have just been delivered, and I only desire to say that I concur in the judgment which has been proposed, and in the reasons which have been assigned by my noble and learned friends.

LORD FIELD.—I have carefully read and considered the evidence in this case, and the authorities bearing upon the questions involved in it, and I have had the advantage of perusing the opinions expressed by the Lord Chancellor and my noble and learned friends.

I entirely agree with them that the appeal should be dismissed, and for the reasons which they have given, and even if I could succeed in stating those reasons in different—it could not be in better—language.

I entertain, in common with my noble friend Lord Watson, some doubt whether the alleged prior use of the Varley machine was such as to avoid the appellants' patent, and if it had been necessary to decide that point, I should have wished to have heard the argument on behalf of the respondents, but, in the view I take of the case, that becomes unnecessary.

No. 3.

April 5, 1892.
The Anglo-American
Brush Electric
Light Corporation v.
King, Brown,
& Co.

INTERLOCUTORS appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

RENSHAW—MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—FAITHFUL & OWEN—DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.

MRS JANE WOOD OR DARLING (Pursuer), Appellant.—Rhind—Kennedy.
WILLIAM GRAY & SONS (Defenders), Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Murray—C. N. Johnston.

No. 4.

May 31, 1892.
Darling v.
Gray & Sons.

Reparation—Action by mother for solatium and damages for son's death pending action raised by him for damages for injury.—A workman raised an action against his employers for damages for personal injury alleged to have been caused by the defenders' fault. The pursuer having died, his mother, as his executor, was sisted in his room.

While this action was pending the mother raised a second action in her own right against the same defenders for solatium and damages for the death of her son, which she alleged to be due to the same injury.

Held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) that the second action was incompetent.

(In the Court of Session, July 14, 1891, 18 R. 1164.)

The pursuer appealed.

LORD WATSON.—I am of opinion that the unanimous decision of the Second Division of the Court of Session in this case is in strict accordance with the existing law. The reasons assigned for it, which were delivered by Lord Young, are not fully expressed, but it sufficiently appears that the judgment of the Court proceeded upon the ground that the appellant's action was unknown to the law, and was therefore incompetent.

Ld. Chancellor
(Halsbury).
Lord Watson.
Ld. Herschell.
Lord Morris.
Lord Field.

The maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona has a very limited application in the law of Scotland, and in evidence of that proposition I need do no more than refer to the elaborate opinions of Lord Neaves and other Judges in Auld v. Shairp.¹ It is in my opinion unnecessary for the purposes of this appeal to examine that case or to consider how far a bare claim in respect of personal injuries occasioned by the negligence of another constitutes a debt due to the party injured, which will pass upon his death without having brought an action to his personal representatives. The law has long been settled that when the deceased has instituted an action to enforce his claim his executor can take up and insist in the process to the effect of recovering the pecuniary damages to which the deceased was entitled.

The Court of Session, by a series of decisions which trench somewhat closely upon the province of the Legislature, has, subject to certain limitations, sustained actions at the instance of relatives of the deceased in their own rights, and not in a strictly representative capacity, against the parties whose negligence occasioned his death for the loss which they personally suffered through that event. Your Lordships had recent occasion in Clarke v. Carfin Coal Com-

¹ Dec. 16, 1874, 2 R. 191.

No. 4. *pany*¹ to consider the class of persons to whom such a right of action has been given, and it was there held, in accordance with the rule adopted in the Courts below, that it only comprehended those persons between whom and the deceased there existed a reciprocal obligation of support in the event of either of them becoming indigent. The practical effect of your Lordships' decision was to limit the class to persons standing in the legitimate relation of husband, father, wife, mother, or child to the deceased. In Eisten v. The North British Railway Company,² which is the leading authority upon this branch of the law, the Lord President (Inglist) observed,—“As the existence of such claims in our common law is a peculiarity in our system, it is not desirable to extend this class of actions, unless they can be justified on some principle which has been already established.” In that observation, which has been repeatedly made in different terms by other Judges of the Court of Session, I entirely concur. In Clarke v. Carfin Coal Company I had occasion to say that the rule which admits the particular action with which we are now dealing “does not rest upon any definite principle capable of extension to other cases which may seem to be analogous, but constitutes an arbitrary exception from the general law which excludes all such actions, founded in inveterate custom, and having no other ratio to support it.”

The appellant maintained that whenever an individual is negligently injured there arises to each person standing towards him in the relation which I have explained an independent right of action contingent only upon his death sooner or later, and its being traceable to the injury which he received. For that proposition no authority whatever was produced except the worn-out analogy of actions of assythment. It would be the merest waste of your Lordships' time to go back to our ancient authorities for the purpose of examining the nature of an action of assythment, and shewing that between it and an action by relatives in respect of negligence no analogy exists. In the case of Eisten v. North British Railway Company, already cited, the Lord President said,—“This is not an action of assythment, and it does not partake in any degree of the nature of such an action.” Lord Deas,—“To such a case I agree with your Lordships that the law of assythment is not applicable.” Lord Ardmillan and Lord Kinloch expressed their opinions in similar terms.

To my mind the only relevant question in the present case is, has the rule ever been carried so far as to recognise the competency of an action at the instance of relatives, where an action in respect of the same injuria has been raised by the deceased during his lifetime, and is still a depending litigation? Unless that question can be answered in the affirmative, the appellant's action is in my opinion incompetent. There is no case to be found in the reported decisions of the Court of Session in which an action was sustained after the deceased's claims had been settled or extinguished by an adverse judgment, or where he had raised an action which passed to and might be insisted in by his executor, and the existence of such a right of action has not been affirmed or even suggested by a single text writer. There is not a single instance in which the Court has allowed two actions to be brought in respect of the same negligent act leading to the injury and death of one person. Even in cases where the right of relatives to sue has been recognised they must bring one suit, and one only, in which the damages due to them respectively might be assessed. In that state of the law I do not think this House ought to encourage the creation of a new right and corresponding liability which are at present unknown in Scotland. No. 4.

¹ July 27, 1891, 18 R. (H. L.) 63.

² July 13, 1870, 8 Macph. 980, Lord President, 984, 42 Scot. Jur. 575.

May 31, 1892.
Darling v.
Gray & Sons.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, and LORDS HERSCHELL, MORRIS, and FIELD concurred.

THEIR LORDSHIPS dismissed the appeal.

KEEPING & GLOAG—D. HOWARD SMITH, Solicitor—INGLEDEN, INCE, & COLT—
T. & W. A. M'LALEN, W.S.

FREDERICK ROBERT HUGHES AND ANOTHER (Edwardes' Trustees)

(Defenders), Appellants.—Rigby, Q.C.—Asher, Q.C.—Peddle.

HENRY STAPLETON EDWARDES AND ANOTHER (Pursuers), Respondents.

No. 5.

July 25, 1892.

Hughes v.
Edwardes.

Succession—Marriage-contract—Provisions to "children"—Conditio si sine liberis—Trust.—In an antenuptial marriage-contract a wife conveyed a sum of £4000 to trustees for the purposes,—(2) That, in the event of the marriage being dissolved by the predecease of the wife, "leaving a child or children of the marriage," the trustees should pay the annual produce of the fund to her husband "during his life, for his life and alimentary use only," excluding creditors and assignees, and that after his death the capital should be paid over to the child or children of the marriage, to the sons on attaining majority and to the daughters on attaining majority or being married. In the event of the failure of children when the term of payment arrived the fee was to be subject to the disposal of the wife by will, with power to the trustees to convey or pay over the capital "at any time after the death of the predeceasing wife and the failure of issue, on obtaining the consent and discharge of the surviving husband, the liferenter, and the beneficiaries under the wife's will." (3) In the event of the marriage being dissolved by the predecease of the husband, the wife was to enjoy an alimentary liferent of the £4000, and after her death the interest was to be applied for behoof of the children during their minority, and on their majority (or marriage in the case of daughters) the capital was to be paid over to them. It was further declared that if such child or children should all die before their mother, or although they should survive her, "should they all die before attaining majority and without leaving issue of their own bodies," the capital was to be disposed of according to the wife's will, or, in the event of her leaving no will, to be given to her heirs and executors. It was further provided that the provisions to the children should not be payable or become vested interests until after the death of the longest liver of the spouses and until the children attained majority.

The marriage was dissolved by the predecease of the wife, who was survived by one son, and who left a will in which she made over all she possessed to her husband.

In an action against the trustees by the husband and the son (who had no children) for payment upon their joint discharge of the £4000, held (rev. judgment of the First Division) that the trustees were bound to retain the capital of the trust (1) for the protection of the alimentary liferent of the husband, and (2) for the eventual interest of the possible issue of the son.

Opinions that the conditio si sine liberis is applicable to provisions to children in marriage-contracts.

Testament—Revocation—Conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit.—Per Lord Watson,—"According to the law of Scotland, the question whether the testament of a parent is revoked by the subsequent birth of a child is one wholly dependent upon the circumstances of the case."

(In the Court of Session December 19, 1890, 18 R. 319.)

Hughes and another, Edwardes' marriage-contract trustees, appealed.

No appearance was made for the respondents.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, all I desire to say in this case is that I am quite satisfied, after the argument before your Lordships, that there is no authority in the law of Scotland for any such construction as is insisted on.

Ld. Chancellor
(Halsbury).
Lord Watson.
Ld. Herschell.
Lord Mac-
naghten.
Lord Morris.
Lord Hadden.

No. 5.

July 25, 1892.
Hughes v.
Edwardes.

I have had an opportunity of reading the judgment prepared by my noble and learned friend Lord Watson. I entirely concur in that judgment, and I do not think it necessary to state anything further.

LORD WATSON.—The appellants as trustees under an antenuptial contract between Dr and Mrs Edwardes, dated 20th February 1855, hold in trust a sum of £4000 which was settled by the lady's stepfather upon the spouses and their children. The marriage was dissolved by the death of Mrs Edwardes on the 10th June 1862, leaving a son who was her only child. In this action her husband and son are pursuers, and they conclude for a declaration that the appellants are bound to make payment of the sum in question to them upon receiving their joint discharge. The First Division of the Court, reversing the decision of the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney), has given decree to that effect. The pursuers have not appeared as respondents in this appeal, which has been heard ex parte. Although your Lordships have not had the advantage of listening to an argument in support of their judgment, the reasoning which prevailed with the three learned Judges who constituted the majority of the First Division is fully disclosed in the opinions which they delivered.

Under the provisions of the marriage-contract the sole duty of the trustees, during the lifetime of both spouses, was to pay the income of the fund to Mrs Edwardes for her personal and alimentary use, exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of her husband. Separate directions are given with respect to the disposal of the income and corpus of the fund applicable to the alternative events of the wife or husband predeceasing. In the event of the wife's predecease leaving a child or children, the trustees are directed to pay the income to the husband during his life for his alimentary use, his right to assign, and the diligence of his creditors, being excluded. On his death the capital is made payable to "the said child or children," after their attaining majority in the case of sons, and in the case of daughters, after their attaining majority or being married. Should there be no child or children alive at the wife's decease, or should they die before the terms at which their provisions become payable, the trustees are directed to make over the capital at her husband's death to any person whom she may appoint by will or other writing, whom failing to her nearest heirs and executors.

Mrs Edwardes on the 17th April 1860 made a will in favour of her husband the terms of which are sufficient to carry the capital of the trust-fund to him upon the occurrence of the events in which the testatrix had power to dispose of it. Although these events have not occurred, the pursuers maintained, in both Courts below, that they were entitled to present payment upon their joint demand, because the fund, which has not yet vested in either of them, must inevitably belong to one or other of them—to the son in the event of his surviving his father, and to the father in the event of his son's predecease. If that were an accurate statement of the beneficial interests in the fee of the trust fund which can emerge in any possible event, and there were no obstacle interposed by the terms of the trust, I should be prepared to hold, as I indicated in Muirhead v. Muirhead and Orellin,¹ that they were entitled to immediate payment of the fund. But, in my opinion, their right to immediate payment cannot be affirmed if, notwithstanding their ultimate interest, the terms of the trust require that it shall be kept up, or if their right is liable to defeasance by the possible existence of other beneficiaries. No. 5.

¹ May 12, 1890, 15 App. Cas. 300, 17 R. (H. L.) 48.

The appellants argued that there are three reasons, each of them in itself sufficient to justify their refusal to pay over the capital of the trust fund to the pursuers. First, that in present circumstances they are bound to retain it for the protection and continuance of the husband's alimentary liferent; secondly, that in the possible event of the son's death leaving issue before his interest becomes vested, such issue will be entitled to take if they survive their grandfather; and thirdly, that the will of Mrs Edwardes in her husband's favour was revoked by the subsequent birth of her son. July 25, 1892.
Hughes v.
Edwardes.

Only the first and second of these reasons were pleaded by the appellants in the Court of Session. The Lord Ordinary and Lord Adam, who held that the appellants were under no obligation to denude, rested their judgment upon an affirmance of the second, and expressed no opinion upon the first. The late Lord President (Ingليس), who with Lords M'Laren and Kinnear constituted the majority of the First Division, necessarily dealt with and rejected both these reasons in arriving at the judgment appealed from. The third reason was not submitted by the appellants either to the Lord Ordinary or to the Inner-House, and, in my opinion, it ought not to be considered by your Lordships. According to the law of Scotland, the question whether the testament of a parent is revoked by the subsequent birth of a child is one wholly dependent upon the circumstances of the case. In this case not only was the point not raised in either Court below, but the record contains no averment to the effect that the younger of the pursuers was born after the date of his mother's will. The allegation of the date of his birth, upon which the plea is founded, was made for the first time in the appellants' case, to which there is no answer; and even there it is stated incidentally, and is not put forward as a reason for denying effect to the will of Mrs Edwardes.

The learned Judges of the Inner-House, who decided in favour of the pursuers, do not suggest that a trust duly constituted for payment of an alimentary annuity can be brought to an end by the joint action of the annuitant and the parties having beneficial right to the fee. A rule to the contrary has long been settled, and was recently enforced in White's Trustees v. Whyte,¹ and Duthie's Trustees v. Kinloch.² In both instances the parties entitled to the fee had a vested interest, which is not the case here; and in Duthie's Trustees v. Kinloch, the alimentary liferenter and the beneficial fiar were one and the same person. Yet it was held that the combined action of all parties interested could not defeat the settlor's intention to make the annuitants' right alimentary, a result which could not be attained except by continuing the trust. None of their Lordships disputed the existence or force of the rule, but they were of opinion that its application was in this case excluded by the terms of a clause in the marriage settlement which provides that the trustees shall have power to pay over the capital of the fund "at any time after the death of the predeceasing wife, and the failure of issue, on obtaining the consent and discharge of the surviving husband, the liferenter, and the beneficiaries under the wife's will or settlement, or of her heirs and executors failing her executing a will or settlement." The view which they took was thus explained by the Lord President,³—"The only obstacle to the application of this clause is the existence

¹ June 1, 1877, 4 R. 786.² June 5, 1878, 5 R. 858.³ 18 R. 327.

No. 5.

July 25, 1892.
Hughes v.
Edwardes.

of the other pursuer, Henry Frederick (that is, of the son). But the clause just quoted shews that there was no intention to maintain the trust in all events merely for security of the alimentary liferent, and if all parties interested, the surviving husband and the only child, are desirous to put an end to the trust and obtain a conveyance of the fee, it appears to me that the principle, if not the letter, of the clause is clearly applicable." I find it is impossible to concur in that interpretation, which, in my opinion, is as much at variance with the spirit as with the letter of the clause. The clause contains an exception which appears to me to accentuate the expression of the settlor's intention that the trust shall continue for the purpose of making the husband's liferent alimentary, in every event save the one specified, namely, the failure of issue of the marriage, and the consequent devolution of the fee to the wife's heirs, legal or testamentary. It was the obvious purpose of the settlor to provide that the surviving husband should remain in the enjoyment of a strictly alimentary allowance so long as there existed children or issue of the marriage whom he was under an obligation to support, and that the trust was not to be terminated until the fee devolved upon persons to whom he owed no such obligation.

The Lord Ordinary held that by virtue of the implied condition si sine liberis decesserit, issue of children are conditionally instituted, and that a child of the younger pursuer would take the fee in the event of his father predeceasing the liferenter. When the case went to the First Division, the majority were of opinion that the deed contained expressions sufficient to oust the condition, if otherwise applicable; whilst Lord Adam thought that, irrespective of the condition, its terms were sufficient to give to issue of children, on the failure of their parent before the term of payment, the share of fee which he would have taken on survivance. But all the learned Judges of the Division, Lord Adam included, treated it as an open and doubtful question whether the conditio si sine liberis decesserit applies to a provision in a marriage-contract. No reason was assigned by any of their Lordships for the doubt which they thus cast upon a principle which I have been accustomed to regard as settled, and I have not been able to discover any foundation for it.

In Wood v. Aitchison,¹ John Aitchison became bound, in the marriage articles of his son Thomas, to invest £400 in land, or on security, and to take the right in favour of the spouses and the longest liver of them in liferent, "and to the child or children to be procreated betwixt them, whom failing, to the said John Aitchison, his heirs and assignees whatsoever, in fee." The wife predeceased her husband, at whose death there were alive one son of the marriage, and the daughter of a predeceasing child. The surviving son claimed the whole provision, but the Court held that the daughter, by virtue of the implied condition, was entitled to take her parent's share. Their Lordships were unanimously of opinion, "that in all provisions of this sort the issue of children predeceasing the term of payment were entitled to that share which their parent could have claimed." It would be no light matter to disturb a decision of the Court of Session upon such a point in the year 1789—a decision which must not only have been relied upon in practice, but so far as I am aware, during the century which has elapsed, the authority of which has never been questioned. It was followed in Robertson v. Houston,² and so late as the year 1870 the First Division, in Arthur and Seymour v. Lamb,¹ upon a case remitted for their opinion, advised the Court of Chancery that a provision by a father in a Scotch contract of marriage, "in favour of himself in liferent and to the children of the said intended marriage in fee," did not lapse by the only child of the marriage predeceasing the liferenter, but subsisted in favour of the issue left by that child. No. 5.

¹ Mor. Dict. June 26, 1789, 13,043.

² May 28, 1858, 20 D, 989.

July 25, 1892.
Hughes v. Edwardes.

I cannot therefore doubt that according to the law of Scotland the condition must be read into the provision with which we are dealing, unless its application is expressly or impliedly excluded by the context. The expressions upon which the majority relied as ousting the condition occur in the directions for the disposal of the fee in the event of the husband's predecease. In that case the wife took an alimentary liferent, the fee being payable on her decease to the "child or children" of the marriage. Then follow declarations to the effect that "if such child or children should all die before their mother, or although they should survive her, should they all die without leaving issue of their bodies," their mother's alimentary annuity was to continue, but that in the event of "failure of issue" she was to have the power of disposing of the capital by will or other writing, to take effect at her decease. Upon these conditions the Lord President observed,—“The contrast between this and the clause applicable to the predecease of a wife is very remarkable. In the latter the only parties entitled to the fee as institutes are ‘children.’ In the former the grandchildren are conditionally instituted to their parents, and the widow's right to test is made dependent not on the failure of children but on the failure of the issue of the marriage, a term of more elastic signification than ‘children.’ and including descendants of any generation if the natural meaning is not controlled by the context.” His Lordship accordingly came to the conclusion that the settlor having used different words of gift in the two events contemplated, and having expressly instituted issue of children in the one case and omitted them in the other, must be held to have done so intentionally. The same reasoning was adopted by Lords M'Laren and Kinnear.

I do not think that there exists any such contrast between the two clauses as their Lordships have suggested. In both clauses the words of gift are precisely the same, being to "the child or children of the marriage." The expressions "should they all die before attaining majority, and without leaving issue of their own bodies," are only introduced for the purpose of limiting the wife's power of disposal by will in the event of her surviving her husband. In the event of her predeceasing him, her powers appear to me to be subject to the same limitation, because in that event it is provided that the trustees may pay to the liferenter, and to her heirs-at-law or by will, "at any time after the death of the predeceasing wife and the failure of issue," or, in other words, after the failure of children and their descendants. What might have been the effect of an express gift to children in the one event, and to children and their issue in the other, it is unnecessary for the purposes of this case to determine. In my opinion these incidental expressions occurring in each clause point in the same direction. They equally indicate the understanding of the settlor that his gift to "a child or children" would bear the meaning which the law ascribes to the words in the marriage-contract provision, and would therefore include the issue of such child or children. I am confirmed in that impression by the fact that the two clauses already referred to are followed by provisions applicable to both,

¹ June 30, 1870, 8 Macph. 928, 42 Scot. Jur. 542.

No. 5.
July 25, 1892.
Hughes v.
Edwardes.

in which the beneficiaries are described as "children of the marriage." I can hardly conceive that the settlor meant these words to signify "children" only in the one clause, and "children whom failing their issue" in the other.

For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that the interlocutor of the Inner-House, in so far as appealed from, must be reversed, and the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary restored. Your Lordships are not required to deal with the question of expenses in the Courts below, seeing that there is no appeal from that part of the interlocutor of the First Division which disposes of them. I think the appellants ought to have their costs of this appeal as between agent and client out of the trust fund in question.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I have had an opportunity of reading the opinion which has just been delivered by my noble and learned friend. I entirely concur with it, and I have nothing to add.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—It seems to me that the trustees have done no more than their duty in refusing to hand over the trust funds to Dr Edwardes and his son. In my opinion they have made good both the grounds on which their refusal was based.

The authorities cited by the learned counsel for the appellants have satisfied me that the trustees were bound to uphold the trust for the purpose of protecting the surviving husband's alimentary liferent. If I understand aright the opinion of the late Lord President, he would have come to the same conclusion but for a special clause in the settlement which gives the trustees power to pay over the capital of the trust-estate after the wife's death in the event of failure of issue of the marriage. Whether, even in that case, the trustees would have been bound to denude against their own judgment is perhaps doubtful. I can understand that the lady's stepfather or his advisers may have thought that if it should happen that there was no issue of the marriage to be cared for, there would be less reason for securing an alimentary provision for the husband, and that the matter might well be left to the discretion of the trustees. But however that may be, I am unable to assent to the view that because the trustees are authorised or even required to part with the trust funds in one particular case which has not happened, it follows that in another and a different case the Court is at liberty to set aside restrictions which the law allows and the settlement has in terms imposed.

On the second point also I venture to differ from the opinion of the majority of the First Division of the Court of Session. The settlement is not well drawn, but if it is read fairly, it is I think impossible not to see that it was the intention of the parties to make provision for the issue of children dying in the lifetime of their parents. I doubt whether the word "children" in this settlement of itself and by its own force comprehends "grandchildren." I rather think that the word "children" is used in its proper sense, and so I think is the word "issue." But it seems to me that the settlement is framed upon the view that in calling children the settlors were at the same time calling the issue of children. The settlement itself speaks of its provisions as being provisions "for the issue of the marriage." Each purpose of the trust that deals with the interest of children contains somewhere a reference to issue, and the reference I think is not the less significant because it is brought in (so to speak) rather casually. In fact the condition si sine liberis seems to run through the whole settlement, and to have been in the contemplation of the parties throughout.

In the result I think that the interest of possible grandchildren cannot be disregarded. No. 5.

On both grounds therefore I am of opinion that the appeal must be allowed. July 25, 1892.
Hughes v.
Edwardes.

LORD MORRIS.—My Lords, I concur.

LORD HANNEN.—My Lords, I also concur.

INTERLOCUTOR appealed from reversed, with costs.

ANDREW BEVERIDGE—MACANDREW, WRIGHT, & MURRAY, W.S.

SIR FREDERICK JOHN WILLIAM JOHNSTONE (Second Party), Appellant.— No. 6.

Johnston—Craigie—Le Breton.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH (First Party), Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Murray— July 25, 1892.
Johnstone v
Duke of Buccleuch.
P. J. Blair.

Superior and Vassal—Entry—Composition or Relief-duty—Confirmation.—

A proprietor having a personal title to the lands of W.—inherited from an ancestor who was a singular successor of the last entered vassal, and who held an infeftment unconfirmed,—in 1810 disposed the lands to trustees for payment of debts and of annuities to himself and his wife, for implementing the provisions of any settlement to be left by him, and finally for reconveyance to himself or to his heirs of the lands not sold. Power was given to the trustees to sell with the grantor's written consent. In 1815 the trustees, having obtained decree of adjudication in implement against the truster's heir, and having been infeft thereon, were entered with the superior as trustees, for the purposes of the trust-deed, by a charter of sale, adjudication, and confirmation, which, inter alia, expressly confirmed the infeftment of the truster's ancestor. The trustees paid composition to the superior. In 1860 they granted a disposition to the truster's heir-at-law of the lands not sold, who was infeft thereon, and subsequently by the Conveyancing Act, 1874, obtained an entry with the superior. The last surviving trustee having died in 1863, the superior claimed composition. The vassal tendered relief-duty.

Held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) that the vassal was bound to pay composition, in respect (1) that if the charter of confirmation obtained by the trustees created a new investiture, it did not operate as an enfranchisement of the truster's heirs, and that the heir to whom the trustees conveyed was a singular successor to them; (2) that if the trust title did not create a new investiture, but was a mere burden upon the truster's right, the vassal was not the heir of any investiture recognised by the superior, since his ancestor's infeftment had not been confirmed prior to the charter of confirmation obtained by the trustees, and since the confirmation of it contained in that charter was to be regarded as confirming it only to the limited effect of validating the trustees' title.

(In the Court of Session, Feb. 28, 1891, 18 R. 587.)

Sir Frederick John William Johnstone, second party, appealed.

At delivering judgment,—

I d. Chancellor
(Halsbury).
Lord Watson.
Lord Mac-
naghten.
Lord Hannen.

LORD WATSON.—My Lords, the appellant is proprietor of three parcels of land, known respectively as Dornock, Woolcoats, and Torbeckhill, situated in the county of Dumfries, and within the dukedom of Queensberry, which is now vested in the respondent. These lands were conveyed to the appellant by Masterton Ure as trustee under a disposition executed by Sir John Lowther Johnstone of Westerhall, the appellant's grandfather. In September 1860 the appellant recorded his conveyance in the General Register of Sasines, and immediately on the passing of the Conveyancing and Land Transfer (Scotland) Act, 1874, he, by virtue of its provisions, became the entered vassal of the respondent, and (Mr Ure having died in the interval) also liable in payment of a feudal casualty in respect of his entry. The parties have differed as to the

No. 6.

July 25, 1892.
Johnstone v.
Duke of
Buccleuch.

casualty payable, and they have adjusted a special case in order to obtain a decision upon the question whether the appellant's liability is that of an heir or of a singular successor. The Second Division of the Court, by a majority of three Judges against one, have held that he is a singular successor, and must, therefore, pay composition, being a year's rent of the lands.

The true relation of the appellant to his superior, whether that of an heir of the standing investiture, or that of a stranger to it, can only be ascertained by reference to the titles under which these parcels of land were acquired and held by the predecessors in title whom the appellant represents until they became vested in his person. I shall therefore endeavour to describe, as briefly as may be consistent with accuracy, the state of possession and title since their acquisition during the last century by the appellant's ancestor, Sir John Pulteney, afterwards Earl of Bath.

In the year 1768, Dornock, which then belonged to James Douglas, and Woolcoats, which belonged to him in liferent and to his son Archibald in fee, both father and son being duly entered with the superior, were exposed for judicial sale, and were purchased by one William Alexander, who obtained a decree of sale in virtue of which he was base infest in Woolcoats. On the 7th April 1775 he conveyed both parcels, and assigned the decree of sale to Sir William Pulteney, who also took base infestment in Woolcoats. Upon his death the lands were possessed by his nephew, Sir John Lowther Johnstone without expeding a feudal title.

The third parcel—the lands of Torbeckhill—were in June 1765 disposed by Margaret Graham, who was fully entered with the superior, to David Armstrong of Kirtleton, whose personal right was brought to judicial sale by his creditors, and was purchased by Sir William Pulteney. He obtained a decree of sale on 27th January 1790, under which he possessed without taking infestment, and on his decease the lands passed into the possession of his daughter and heir of line, Henrietta Laura Pulteney, Countess of Bath, upon whose death they passed to her cousin-german Sir John Lowther Johnstone. Neither the Countess nor her successor made up a title or was infest.

On the 10th December 1810 Sir John Lowther Johnstone, being then in possession of all three parcels under his personal title, conveyed them, along with the rest of his Westerhall estates, to David Cathcart and Masterton Ure, but that in trust only for payment of his debts, and of annuities to himself and his wife, and the fulfilment of any provisions contained in deeds of settlement executed or to be executed by him. The power of the trust disponees to deal with the fee of the trust-estates was limited to selling such portions thereof as might be deemed necessary, with the consent of the truster expressed in writing. They were bound to reconvey—the debts being paid off—on or before the 11th November 1814, and after that date whenever required to do so, whether his debts were paid or not. In the event of the truster's death before reconveyance, and of his heir being then in minority, it was declared that the trust should subsist until his whole debts were paid off, the heir in the meantime receiving an allowance.

Sir John Lowther Johnstone, the truster, died in 1811, leaving a deed of settlement by which he conveyed his estates, including Dornock, Woolcoats, and Torbeckhill, to himself in liferent, and to the heirs-male of his body and certain heirs-substitute seriatim in fee, subject to family provisions which were implemented by his trustees.

The trustees appointed by the deed of 1810 appear to have entered at once upon the administration of the trust-estates, which they carried on jointly until the death of Mr Cathcart in 1829. After the death of the truster they proceeded to complete a title by adjudication to Dornock and Woolcoats, in which they were duly infeft, and on payment of a composition they obtained from the respondent's predecessor a charter of sale, adjudication, and confirmation dated 27th March 1815, which expressly confirms the base infeftments taken in Woolcoats by William Alexander and his disponee Sir William Pulteney. They next adjudged and were infeft in the lands of Torbeckhill, and then entered as singular successors with the late Duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry, obtaining from his Grace a charter of adjudication in implement dated 15th February 1828.

No. 6.

July 25, 1892.
Johnstone v.
Duke of Buccleuch.

It is proper to notice here that the special case contains express averments to the effect that Sir John Lowther Johnstone was duly infeft in Dornock and Woolcoats and also in Torbeckhill. These statements appeared to your Lordships to conflict with the tenor of documents of title which are incorporated with and form part of the case, and your Lordships therefore required the parties either to explain the discrepancy or to inform the House of the true state of the facts. The result was that the parties by their counsel concurred in stating to your Lordships that the statements in the case were inaccurate, and that with the single exception of Sir William Pulteney's infeftment in Woolcoats no sasine was taken in any of the three parcels either by Sir William Pulteney or by any ancestor and predecessor of the appellant.

At the death of the truster, Sir John Lowther Johnstone, in 1811 the heir entitled to succeed was his eldest son Sir Frederick George Johnstone, the appellant's father, who died in 1841 without having made up any title to the lands. Some years after his decease the appellant raised an action in the Court of Session for the purpose of compelling the surviving trustee of his grandfather to denude in his favour, and the conveyance upon which the appellant has been infeft and obtained a statutory entry with his superior was executed in obedience to a decree of the Court.

It thus appears that the appellant does not represent any predecessor in these three parcels of land who was during his lifetime an entered vassal. He is not the heir of the trustee from whom he derives his feudal title, and he is not the heir either of the Douglasses of Dornock or of Margaret Graham, who were or had been the last entered vassals at the dates when the trustees of Sir John Lowther Johnstone completed their titles to Dornock, Woolcoats, and Torbeckhill by obtaining charters of confirmation from the superior following upon decrees of adjudication in their favour. He is, however, the representative and heir of Sir William Pulteney and his daughter, as well as of his own father and grandfather. But not one of his predecessors was entered with the superior or was even infeft base in Dornock or Torbeckhill. The state of their title to Woolcoats differs in this respect only, that Sir William Pulteney took base infeftment in that parcel, a circumstance which gave rise to an argument for the appellant which I shall notice in due course.

The appellant's counsel strongly relied upon the recent case of Stuart v. Jackson, 15th November 1889, 17 R. 85, which was decided by the whole Court, and was followed by the Judges of the Second Division (Lord Rutherford Clark dissenting) in Duke of Athole v. Stewart, 20th March 1890, 17 R. 724, and Duke of Athole v. Menzies, 20th March 1890, 17 R. 733. In Stuart v.

No. 6.

July 25, 1892.
Johnstone v.
Duke of Buccleuch.

Jackson there was much and serious diversity of judicial opinion, but the majority of their Lordships held that the terms of a trust-disposition executed by an entered vassal were such that although the trustees took infeftment and were entered with the superior by force of the Statute of 1874, their right constituted a mere encumbrance upon the standing investiture, and consequently that the heir of the truster who expedited a title by taking a conveyance from the trustees was entitled to enter upon payment of relief-duty. I do not think it is necessary for your Lordships in disposing of this appeal to consider the merits of these decisions or the conflicting opinions expressed by the learned Judges who took part in them. Had Sir John Lowther Johnstone or his predecessors been duly infeft and entered, the case would have been different. But these decisions, assuming them to be sound, only go this length, that the heir of an entered vassal is not divested of that character by the fact that the ancestor whose heir he is has created a trust which does not extinguish but is a mere burden upon the investiture. Even if the trust created by Sir John Lowther Johnstone were held to be simply an encumbrance, the appellant's position would be no better now than if the trust had never been in existence, and in that case he would not have been in a position to enter as an heir. It cannot be said in this case, as was held in these decisions, that the appellant takes from an entered predecessor either non obstante the trust or through the medium of the trust.

Then it was argued that the superior's confirmation by the charter of March 1815 of Sir William Pulteney's infeftment in the lands of Woolcoats had the effect of making him an entered vassal, and of enfranchising his heirs in these lands. No authority was cited to us which bears out that proposition, which appears to me to be founded upon a misconception of the object of confirmation, which is to fortify and complete the investiture of the person obtaining the charter. Beyond what is necessary for that purpose confirmation of prior writs by the superior has, in my opinion, no operation whatever. My views upon this point are so fully and satisfactorily expressed in the judgment of Lord Trayner that I shall not discuss it further.

It was also urged on behalf of the appellant that his entry was enfranchised by the previous entry of his grandfather's trustees upon payment of a composition, and in support of that argument he mainly relied upon Advocate-General v. Campbell Swinton, 30th January 1854, 17 D. 21. That case was a very special one, and does not appear to me to have any material bearing upon the facts before us. The person from whom a composition was claimed was at the time the entered vassal of the Crown, and had already paid a composition, and the opportunity afforded to the superior of claiming a second composition was entirely due to the form of conveyancing which the parties had adopted with the object of subjecting him to entail fetters. The judgments of four out of the five learned Judges who constituted the Court of Exchequer proceeded on these specialities. That of Lord Deas went further, and contains many dicta which, so far as I know, are without authority, and with which I am not prepared to agree.

I am accordingly of opinion that the interlocutor appealed from ought to be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs, and I so move your Lordships.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I concur in the judgment which has been moved.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I have had an opportunity of reading the judgment of my noble and learned friend Lord Watson, and I entirely concur in it.

LORD HANNEN.—I also concur in the judgment which has been moved.

THEIR LORDSHIPS dismissed the appeal with costs.

HENRY S. SHERRY—WELSH & FORBES, S.S.C.—GRAHAMES, CURREY, & SPENS—STRATHERN & BLAIR, W.S.

No. 6.

July 25, 1892.
Johnstone v.
Duke of Buccleuch.

THE HERITABLE REVERSIONARY COMPANY, LIMITED, First Parties, Appellants.—Johnston—Goudy.

ROBERT COCKBURN MILLAR (M'Kay's Trustee), Respondent.—Lorimer
—Hunter.

No. 7.

Aug. 9, 1892.
Heritable
Reversionary
Co., Limited,
v. Millar.

Bankruptcy—Vesting of heritable property in trustee—Latent trust—Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), sec. 102.—The Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 102, enacts that the Act and warrant of confirmation in favour of the trustee in a sequestration shall vest in him "the whole property of the debtor."

Held (rev. judgment of First Division) that heritable property to which a bankrupt has an unqualified feudal title, but which does not belong to him, is not his property in the sense of the Act, and does not vest in his trustee.

Opinion (per Lord Watson) that a creditor adjudging heritage held by his debtor subject to a latent trust can be in no better position in a question with the cestui que trust than if he had obtained a conveyance without value from his debtor.

(In the Court of Session, July 14, 1891, 18 R. 1166.)

The Heritable Reversionary Company, Limited, appealed.

At delivering judgment,—

Ld. Herschell.
Lord Watson.
Lord Mac-
naghten.
Lord Field

LORD HERSCHELL.—The question which arises in this case is whether heritable property vested in a bankrupt, which is subject to a latent trust, passes to the trustee in his sequestration free of that latent trust, and is held for distribution amongst the bankrupt's creditors.

The facts may be shortly stated. Daniel Smith M'Kay, the bankrupt, was the manager of the appellant company. On the 17th of May 1882 he purchased certain tenements of houses in Edinburgh, which were exposed for sale by public roup, at the upset price. The subjects were conveyed to him by a disposition dated the 16th and 17th July 1882, and he was duly infeft by recording the disposition in the appropriate Register of Sasines on the 14th September 1882. The purchase was made by M'Kay for behoof of the appellants, and on the instruction of their directors, and the purchase-money, save in so far as it was raised by a bond and disposition in security over the subjects, was provided by the appellants. They were not, however, ex facie of the deeds, parties to the purchase, and although in May 1886 M'Kay executed a declaration of trust, it was not recorded in the Register of Sasines. On the 2d of December 1890 the estates of M'Kay were sequestrated in the Sheriff Court of Glasgow. In these circumstances, the question has arisen whether the property which became vested in M'Kay, as above stated, formed part of the sequestrated estate, and passed to the respondent as trustee for the bankrupt's creditors.

It seems beyond dispute that as between M'Kay and the appellants he was a bare trustee, and they were the true and beneficial owners of the property. I do not understand it to be questioned that the law of Scotland recognises such a relationship, or that, if it appeared ex facie of the dispositions, the beneficiary would be regarded as the true owner as against all persons and for all purposes. Although as regards third persons the case may be very different when the trust is latent, I do not see how this can affect the relation of the trustee and beneficiary inter se. If M'Kay had disposed of the property and

No. 7.

Aug. 9, 1892.
Heritable
Reversionary
Co., Limited,
v. Millar.

converted the proceeds to his own use, he would, I apprehend, have been guilty of a breach of trust, and rendered himself amenable to the criminal law. It is true that an onerous purchaser from him would have obtained an unimpeachable title, but this would not be because the property was his, but because the ~~true owners had permitted him to appear on the Register of Sasines as the owner,~~ and thus entitled anyone dealing with him for value to regard him as such. A register, whether of heritable or any other subjects, would obviously fail of its purpose unless this were the law. A person entrusted with the custody of a negotiable instrument, who has no property in it, may equally give a perfect title to an onerous purchaser.

I have thought it well to dwell on these considerations, because it appears to me that there has been some confusion between the case of heritable property held upon a latent trust of which the owner appearing on the register is a bare trustee, and that of heritable property as to which the owner has come under some contractual obligation. The latter was the case in Wyllie v. Duncan.¹ Archibald was there the owner of the property, not a mere trustee; he had bound himself on certain conditions to re-dispose to Wyllie, from whom he took the subjects. But this was a mere personal contract. If he had sold the property and disposed of the proceeds he might have rendered himself liable to legal proceedings on the ground that he had put it out of his power to fulfil his obligation, but he would not have been guilty of a breach of trust, or brought himself within the reach of the criminal law.

The section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act which relates to the vesting of the bankrupt's estate in his trustee is the 102d. The first part of that section enacts what is to vest in the trustee; the following subsections have in view the making that vesting effectual, and accordingly prescribe what is to be the nature and effect of the vesting. The section commences in these terms:—"The act and warrant of confirmation in favour of the trustee shall, ipso jure, transfer to and vest in him, or any succeeding trustee, for behoof of the creditors, absolutely and irredeemably, as at the date of the sequestration, with all right, title, and interest, the whole property of the debtor, to the effect following."

For some reason, which is not apparent, this part of the section was not alluded to in the Court below, the only words discussed being those which have reference to the effect of the vesting of the heritable estate. But unless any subject be within the words with which the section commences, the remaining provisions of the section become irrelevant. Wherever, therefore, it has to be determined whether heritable or any other estate vested in the trustee, the first question which arises is, was it the "property of the debtor"? The expression is not a technical one, but is obviously intended to comprehend all that would ordinarily be understood as covered by it. It cannot be doubted that it includes all beneficial interests possessed by the bankrupt, even though the property be vested in other persons as trustees for him. On the other hand, I cannot think, unless compelled by authority to take that view, that it includes, or was ever intended to include, estates of which the bankrupt was a bare trustee, and in which he had no beneficial interest.

The 2d subsection which was so much discussed in the Court below, and which only applies, as I have pointed out, to that which comes within the description "property of the debtor," itself commences with these words:—

¹ 1803, M. 10,269.

"The whole heritable estate belonging to the bankrupt in Scotland to the same effect," &c. The words "belonging to" are not technical, and I do not think that a heritable estate of which the bankrupt is a bare trustee, and in which he has no beneficial interest, can with any propriety be said to "belong" to him. No. 7.
Aug. 9, 1892.
Heritable
Reversionary
Co., Limited,
v. Millar.

It was indeed suggested, and the view found some favour in the Court below, that the trustee in the sequestration was to be regarded as an onerous and bona fide alienee from the bankrupt. I am unable to accede to this view. I do not think that he is an onerous alienee within the principle which renders the title of such a person valid even though it be obtained from a bare trustee in fraud of the beneficial owner. That he is not such an alienee appears to me to be well established in the law of Scotland as regards property other than heritable, and I fail to see any ground for a distinction in this respect between heritable and other descriptions of property.

It is to be observed that the Bankruptcy Act of 1783 required the bankrupt, under the penalty of imprisonment, to make over to the trustee "his whole real and personal estate wherever situated." There were corresponding provisions in the Acts of 1793 and 1814. I cannot think that it was the intention of the Legislature to compel a bankrupt to convey to his trustee for the benefit of his creditors property which he could not dispose of to any creditor at the time of sequestration without being guilty of a criminal breach of trust. The Act of 1839, which preceded the one now in force, vested in the trustee the heritable estates "belonging to the bankrupt in Scotland." I have already commented on these words in connection with their use in the present Act.

The only case which to my mind can even plausibly be said to be inconsistent with the view I take of the statutes is the case of *Jeffrey v. Paul*¹ in this House. Lord Brougham in pronouncing his decision assigned no reasons for the conclusion at which he arrived. It can therefore only be said to be an authority for the proposition contended for by the respondent if no other ground for the judgment is reasonably conceivable. The circumstances of that case were peculiar. It was a contest between two trustees and the representative of a third who had become bankrupt. All the trustees had made advances to the trust-estate, and one contention put forward on behalf of the trustee in the sequestration was, that the bond which was then in question had, by reason of the advances they had made, been held by the three trustees in equal shares in their own right, and not on behalf of their trust. Whether this was the ground of Lord Brougham's judgment it is impossible to say, but I think it much more likely that it was, than that he should have determined, without statement made or reason given, the important principle contended for, affecting as it does so seriously rights of property, and being applicable to every sequestration which should thereafter occur in Scotland.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the interlocutor appealed from should be reversed; that it should be declared that the subjects in question did not pass to the respondent; that the appellants as beneficial owners are entitled to the sum consigned in bank; and that the respondents do pay the costs of this appeal.

LORD WATSON.—The facts giving rise to the question of law involved in this appeal are fully set forth in a special case submitted by the parties for the ¹ May 15, 1835, 1 S. and M'L. 767.

No. 7.

Aug. 9, 1892.
Heritable
Reversionary
Co., Limited,
v. Millar.

opinion of the First Division of the Court of Session, and so far as material may be shortly stated.

The appellants in May 1882 purchased through Daniel Smith M'Kay, who was at that time their manager, certain heritable subjects in Edinburgh at the price of £2150. The disposition, which is absolute and unqualified in its terms, was taken to M'Kay as an individual, and was recorded by him in the appropriate Register of Sasines on the 14th September 1882. Part of the price was obtained by his granting a bond and disposition in security over the subjects for a loan of £1450, which was recorded in the Register of Sasines of the same date with the disposition, and the balance was provided by the appellants. M'Kay ceased to be their manager in February 1886, and on 17th May 1886 he executed in their favour a formal back-bond or declaration of trust by which he acknowledged that he was vested with the subjects in trust only for behoof of the appellants, and undertook that, whenever required to do so, he would subscribe and deliver a formal and valid conveyance in favour of any person or persons whom they might name.

The appellants neither recorded their back-bond nor required M'Kay to denude, and the feudal title to the subjects continued to stand in his name as absolute proprietor until the 2d December 1890, when his estates were sequestrated in terms of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79). The respondent was duly appointed trustee in the sequestration, and in that capacity he asserts his right to hold and realise the subjects as part of the bankrupt's heritable estate for behoof of his creditors, leaving the appellants to rank for a dividend as personal creditors in respect of their beneficial interest. The appellants, on the other hand, maintain that the subjects did not form part of the bankrupt's estate within the meaning of the Act, and did not pass to the respondent as trustee in the sequestration.

The subjects were sold in March 1891 with the consent of both parties, and under reservation of their respective claims. After paying the heritable bond with interest, and the expenses of sale, there remained a balance of £365 which was consigned in bank to abide the issue of this litigation.

By the interlocutor appealed from the majority of the First Division, consisting of the late Lord President (Inglis), with Lords Adam and Kinnear, declared that the respondent, as trustee on M'Kay's sequestrated estate, took the subjects in question, which were vested absolutely in the bankrupt, free of the latent trust in favour of the appellants, and that the appellants are only entitled to rank on the sequestrated estate for the value of the subjects, and are not entitled to recover the same from the respondent as their own property. In pursuance of that declaration their Lordships found that the consigned money belongs to the respondent. From that judgment Lord M'Laren, the only other member of the Court, strongly dissented.

It is sufficiently obvious that the controversy between these parties must depend upon the terms in which the right of the trustee in a sequestration is defined by the Act of 1856. Before adverting to the language of the statute I think it may be useful to consider the nature of the relations existing between a solvent trustee who is feudally vested in the heritable estate of the trust by a title ex facie absolute, and his cestui que trust, whose right rests upon a latent back-bond. As between them there can, in my opinion, be no doubt that according to the law of Scotland the one, though possessed of the legal title, and being the apparent owner, is in reality a bare trustee; and that the other, to whom the whole beneficial interest belongs, is the true owner. Upon that point the opinions expressed by noble and learned Lords in Union Bank of Scotland v. National Bank of Scotland, 12 App. Cases, 53,¹ and by those learned Judges of the Court of Session with whom their Lordships in that case agreed, appear to me to be conclusive. But in that state of the title the trustee, though his action may be in breach of duty, or even grossly fraudulent, can communicate a valid right to a purchaser or a lender on the security of the trust-estate, who transacts with him for value and without notice of the interest of the beneficiary. That rule, which alike applies to moveable and heritable estate, was finally settled in the law of Scotland by the judgment of this House in Redfearn v. Somervail, 1 Dow's App. 53, an authority which seems to have been regarded by the Lord President as practically decisive of the present case. It must, however, be kept in view that the validity of a right acquired in such circumstances by a bona fide disponee for value does not rest upon the recognition of any power in the trustee which he can lawfully exercise, because breach of trust duty and wilful fraud can never be in themselves lawful, but upon the well-known principle that a true owner who chooses to conceal his right from the public, and to clothe his trustee with all the indicia of ownership, is thereby barred from challenging rights acquired by innocent third parties for onerous considerations under contracts with his fraudulent trustee.

No. 7.
Aug. 9, 1892.
Heritable
Reversionary
Co., Limited,
v. Millar.

It is also necessary to keep in view that the rule of personal bar which thus protects transactions with the trustee from challenge by the cestui que trust only applies to transactions which affect and create an interest in the trust-estate. Personal creditors of the trustee who neither stipulate for nor obtain any conveyance to that estate do not, in the sense of law, transact on the faith of its being the property of the trustee. As Lord M'Laren observed in this case (18 R. 1175),—"Creditors in general do not give credit to a bankrupt in reliance upon any supposed presumption that property standing in his name is his private property. Unless they are going to advance money on heritable security they know nothing of his title-deeds and trust only to his personal credit." Accordingly, the contraction of debts by the trustee whilst the trust is latent creates no nexus over the trust-estate in favour of personal creditors. If they proceeded to attach the trust-estate on the footing of its belonging to their debtor, the beneficiary could defeat their diligence by appearing to vindicate his right. An adjudging creditor gives no new consideration for the interest in the estate which he secures by the process of adjudication, and, in my opinion, he can be in no better position in a question with the cestui que trust than if he had obtained a conveyance without value from the trustee. That appears to me to have been the ratio of the decision in Thomson v. Douglas, Heron & Company, which is reported in Morison's Dictionary (15th November 1784, Mor. Dict. 10,229), and also by Lord Hailes (Hailes' Decns. 1002). In that case Thomson disposed his lands to his agent Armstrong, "in order that he might sell the same and apply the proceeds for behoof of Thomson." In making up a title by charter of resignation Armstrong omitted these words from the procuratory, so that the qualification of his right did not appear on the record. He then, instead of selling, borrowed money for his own purposes from Douglas, Heron, & Company, and conveyed the lands to them in security of the debt, and subsequently some of his general creditors obtained decrees of

¹ Dec. 10, 1886, 14 R. (H. L.) 1.

No. 7.

Aug. 9, 1892.
Heritable
Reversionary
Co., Limited,
v. Millar.

adjudication, upon which they were not infest. Thomson brought a reduction of Armstrong's title, and of these rights flowing from him, upon the allegation of Armstrong's fraud, and the Court found "that the allegation of fraud was not relevant against the heritable securities and infestments, but that it was relevant as to the creditors adjudgers." The report in Morison, which is taken from the Faculty Collection, contains certain observations which are said to have been made by the bench, but Lord Hailes, who was himself a party to the decision, has noted the opinions delivered by the Lord Justice-Clark (Braxfield), and by Lord Monboddo, as containing what he at the time understood to be the grounds upon which it proceeded. Lord Braxfield, than whom there is no higher authority in this department of the law, said—"I think that Mr Armstrong might have sold for a price, and the purchaser would have been secured by his bona fide. The same is the case as to heritable creditors. The case is different as to adjudgers. They are not on the same footing with Mr Armstrong selling for a price." The same distinction, based upon the obvious fact that the heritable creditor does, and the adjudging creditor does not, give value for the interest which he takes in the land, is thus tersely stated by Lord Monboddo—"An heritable bond is good because it is the price of the estate; the adjudger seeks to mend his former security."

It was argued for the respondent, on the strength of some dicta by institutional writers, that Thomson v. Douglas, Heron, & Company was overruled in the subsequent case of Russell v. Ross' Creditors, January 31, 1791, Mor. Dict. 10,300, but the argument when examined is really destitute of foundation. Among the observations attributed to the bench in Morison's report of the earlier case is one to the effect that the adjudging creditors "must take the right of their debtor tantum et tale as it was in his person." A second and brief report of the same case in Morison (Dict. 10,299) bears that "the Court did not mean to lay down the rule in general that adjudgers must take tantum et tale," and the same remark was made by the Court in Russell v. Ross' Creditors. What appears to me to have been decided in Thomson v. Douglas, Heron, & Company was, that creditors who have given no value for the right cannot carry off from the true owner property standing in name of their debtor in which he has no beneficial interest—a decision perfectly sound in principle. In Russell v. Ross' Creditors there was no question of trust, and it was sought, unsuccessfully, to apply the doctrine of tantum et tale to creditors who had completed a feudal title by adjudication to lands of which their debtor was the beneficial owner, in competition with others who had prior but merely personal rights to demand a conveyance from him. I do not doubt that in such circumstances the doctrine of tantum et tale has no application. It was rejected by the Court of Session in Mitchells v. Ferguson, February 13, 1781, Mor. Dict. 10,296; Wylie v. Duncan, December 8, 1803, Mor. Dict. 10,269; and in Mansfield v. Walker's Trustees, 28th June 1833, 11 S. 813, which was appealed to this House, and there affirmed—1 W. and S. App. Cas. 203—upon the special ground that the bond of corroboration upon which the appellant relied was granted by the bankrupt after he had been divested of his estates through the operation of the Act 54 Geo. III. chap. 137. These authorities were brought fully under your Lordships' notice by counsel; but, in my opinion, they have little, if any, bearing upon the point which your Lordships have to decide, because in all of them the competition related, not to estate held by the bankrupt under a bare trust, but to estate of which he was the beneficial proprietor.

I agree with the late Lord President in thinking that the opinions expressed by Lord Westbury in Fleeming v. Howden, July 16, 1868, 6 Macph. (H. L.) 121, with reference to the nature of the interest which a trustee in sequestration takes in the heritable estate of the bankrupt, require considerable modification. They were strictly obiter, because in that case the clause of devolution upon which the successful claim of the heir-substitute depended, whether it be regarded as constituting a trust in the bankrupt or a qualification of his right, was apparent upon the face of his recorded title.

No. 7.

Aug. 9, 1892.
Heritable
Reversionary
Co., Limited,
v. Millar.

But these considerations as to preferences between the trustee and a creditor, and as to the doctrine of tantum et tale, when the subject of competition is the undoubted property of the bankrupt, are, in my opinion, of very secondary importance in this case. It does not admit of dispute that all property, whether heritable or moveable, in which the bankrupt has a beneficial interest, whether the title be in him or in a trustee for him, to the extent of that interest, passes to and vests in the trustee in his sequestration, under the Act of 1856, which also makes provision for the extent and effect to which it shall vest in the trustee, as in a question with creditors having claims upon it. What shall vest, and what shall be the effect of vesting, are two different things, and they are separately dealt with in the statute. In my opinion two questions arise in this case upon the Act of 1856,—First, do the subjects in question fall within the statutory definition of property which passes to the trustee for behoof of the bankrupt's creditors? Secondly, if they do, what is the right of the appellants as against the respondent? It is manifestly idle to consider what may be the effect of these subjects vesting in the respondent until it has been shewn that they did vest in him. Yet the learned Judges of the First Division seem to have confined their attention to the second of these questions. They all refer to and discuss the enactments relating to the effect of vesting, and they take no notice of the statutory definition of the property which is to vest.

Section 102 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act contains the whole of its provisions which deal expressly with the vesting of the bankrupt's estates in his trustee, and its effect. The structure of the clause is worthy of observation. It first of all prescribes what property is to vest in the trustee, and then goes on to define, in three subsections, to what effect (1) moveable estate and effects wherever situated, (2) heritable estate in Scotland, and (3) heritable estate in England, Ireland, or any of Her Majesty's dominions, are to become vested in him. Omitting the subsections, clause 102 is in these terms,—“The act and warrant of confirmation in favour of the trustee shall, ipso jure, transfer to and vest in him, or any succeeding trustee, for behoof of the creditors, absolutely and irredeemably, as at the date of the sequestration, with all right, title, and interest, the whole property of the debtor, to the effect following.”

Were the subjects in dispute the property of M'Kay, within the meaning of that enactment, at the date of his sequestration? Upon the language of the statute, that appears to me to be a very simple question, admitting only of a negative answer. An apparent title to land or personal estate, carrying no real right of property with it, does not, in the ordinary or in any true legal sense, make such land or personal estate the property of the person who holds the title. That which, in legal as well as in conventional language, is described as a man's property is estate, whether heritable or moveable, in which he has a beneficial interest which the law allows him to dispose of. It does not include estate in which he has no beneficial interest, and which he cannot dispose of without

No. 7.

Aug. 9, 1892.
Heritable
Reversionary
Co., Limited,
v. Millar.

committing a fraud. It is true that the law will sustain a right created by his fraudulent alienation in the person of a bona fide alienee for value, but not, as has been already pointed out, upon the ground that the thing alienated was the property of his author. The respondent, as representing creditors who had no dealings with the bankrupt in relation to the estate of which the appellants had the beneficial fee, and who have given no value for the interest which he claims on their behalf, does not stand in the position of an onerous and bona fide alienee, and cannot take benefit from the principle which validates the right of the latter.

I am confirmed in these views by a reference to previous statutes regulating the process of sequestration in Scotland, of which there were no less than five prior to the consolidating Act of 1856. The first of them (12 Geo. III. chap. 72), passed in 1772, only applied to the personal estate of the debtor; but the next and all subsequent Acts embrace his heritable as well as his personal estate, making them a common fund for distribution among his creditors, according to their respective rights and preferences. The object of the progressive legislation, which has culminated in the Act of 1856, has not been to alter or extend the definition of the bankrupt's property available for distribution, but to simplify procedure, and to put an end to the possibility of individual creditors obtaining preferable securities over the estate, after sequestration, by giving the trustee when appointed a complete and absolute title as at its date.

The Act 23 Geo. III. chap. 18, the first which brought real estate within the scope of the sequestration, by section 19, made it incumbent on the bankrupt, when ordered by the Court, to execute a disposition or dispositions making over to the trustee and his successors in that office, "his whole real and personal estate, wherever situated." In the event of his refusal to convey, the Court was authorised to punish the bankrupt by imprisonment: and, if necessary, to issue a decree finding "the property of the whole sequestrated estate and effects, real and personal," to be in the trustee, and adjudging to him the whole lands and heritable estate within its jurisdiction. These provisions were in substance re-enacted by the 23d section of 33 Geo. III. chap. 74, in which the property which the bankrupt was bound to convey, under pain of imprisonment, is described as "his whole estate and effects, heritable and moveable, real and personal, wherever situated." Similar provisions were made for vesting the sequestrated estate in the trustee by section 29 of the Act 54 Geo. III. chap. 137, which describes the property to be conveyed to him by the bankrupt in the same terms with the preceding statute of 1793. In 1839 the Act 2 and 3 Vict. cap. 41, the immediate predecessor of the Act of 1856, by section 79 vested directly in the trustee, by force of statute, and without the intervention either of the bankrupt himself or of the Court, the whole heritable estates "belonging to the bankrupt in Scotland."

I venture to think that the property described in these four Acts as falling within the sequestration includes no heritable or other estate of which the bankrupt was not the true owner. That construction gives effect to the literal meaning of their language; and it is to my mind hardly conceivable that the Legislature should have intended to confiscate the property of persons other than the bankrupt for the behoof of his creditors, by requiring him to execute a disposition in favour of their trustee, which but for the statute he could not have granted without being guilty of the crime of breach of trust and embezzlement. I can find nothing in these statutes which lends countenance to the suggestion that the Legislature meant to compel any such fraudulent proceeding. No. 7.

The principle which ought to govern the decision of this case was, in my opinion, rightly understood and applied by the Court of Session in Gordon v. Cheyne, Feb. 5, 1824, 1 S. (N. E.) 566, and a case of earlier date—Dingwall v. Maccombie. There is not a report of the opinions, if any, delivered in Gordon v. Cheyne, but Maccombie's case is reported in a footnote (1 S. (N. E.) 567, et seq.), together with the opinions of the Judges by whom it was decided. The same point was raised in each of these cases. In Dingwall v. Maccombie, the debtor was ex facie absolute proprietor of two shares of the Aberdeen Shipping Company, which he held in trust for Dingwall; and the trust being still latent, he being at the time insolvent, conveyed these shares to Maccombie for behoof of his creditors. In Gordon v. Cheyne the bankrupt, at the date of his sequestration, held one share in the same company as absolute proprietor under a latent trust for Gordon, the true owner. Accordingly, the competition, in both cases, lay between the true owner and a trustee for creditors, the only difference being that in the one the trustee had a legal, and in the other a voluntary disposition of the whole property belonging to the insolvent. The Court in both decided in favour of the cestui que trust; and their decisions have since been accepted as conclusively settling that incorporeal personal rights, affected by a latent trust, though vested in the bankrupt by a title ex facie absolute, do not pass to the trustee in his sequestration. Aug. 9, 1892.
Heritable
Reversionary
Co., Limited,
v. Millar.

The decision of this House in Redfearn v. Somervail, 1813, 1 Dow. App. Cas. 60, which appeared to one learned Judge to be conclusive against the appellant, related to an incorporeal moveable right, being a share in a private trading society. If that decision were adverse to the appellant's claim, it would a fortiori be fatal to the authority of Dingwall v. Maccombie and Gordon v. Cheyne. The rule followed by the House in Redfearn v. Somervail does not conflict with these cases, which decide, in my opinion rightly, that a trustee for general creditors, whether by voluntary conveyance from the bankrupt or taking right under the Sequestration Acts, cannot plead the equities competent to a person who has acquired an interest in the trust property from the bankrupt in bona fide, and for onerous cause. And so far as concerns the right of the trustee in sequestration, I am unable to discover any ground, either in common sense or in legal principle, for making a distinction between heritable and moveable rights vested in the bankrupt subject to a latent trust, and for holding that the heritable right is, and that the moveable right is not, carried by the sequestration.

Lord Adam and also Lord Kinnear appear to have held that the present question was concluded by the decision of the Court of Session in Wylie v. Duncan, 1803, Mor. Dict. 10,269, and of this House in Jeffrey v. Paul, May 15, 1835, 1 S. and M'L. App. Cas. 767, but I venture to think that their opinion is based upon a misapprehension of what was really decided in these cases.

I have already stated what I believe to have been the import of the judgment in Wylie v. Duncan and similar cases, and I have only to remark further, that a personal obligation to convey heritable estate, undertaken by one who is the beneficial as well as the feudal owner, does not, according to the law of Scotland, denude him of his beneficial interest, or confer upon the person to whom it was contracted either the character or the rights of a trust beneficiary.

The case of Jeffrey v. Paul was very special in its circumstances. Harley, an

No. 7.

Aug. 9, 1892.
Heritable
Reversionary
Co., Limited,
v. Millar.

insolvent, compounded with his creditors, and in order to secure the cautioners for his composition, conveyed certain heritable subjects belonging to him, to himself and them in trust, with power to sell or burden, for repayment of any advances made by them on his behalf, and for payment of any balance remaining to himself, his heirs, or disponees. The trustees sold part of the subjects, and took from the purchaser a heritable bond and disposition in security for £400, payable to three of their number, Cook, Cuthill, and Paul, as individuals. Cuthill became bankrupt, at the time when the sums advanced and liabilities incurred by the cautioners exceeded the value of the trust-estate. Jeffrey, as trustee in Cuthill's sequestration, claimed one-third of the sum contained in the bond as belonging to the bankrupt, and was opposed by the solvent cautioners, who maintained that the bond was trust property. The Court of Session rejected Jeffrey's claim, but on appeal to this House it was sustained. The report in the Court of Session, June 11, 1834 (12 S. 718), assigns no reasons for the judgment; and in this House, Lord Brougham, sitting alone, moved its reversal without explanation or comment. In these circumstances, I find it impossible to regard the judgment of that noble and learned lord as a decision upon the point raised in this appeal. The pleadings of the appellant in this House disclose that he claimed a third share of the bond on the footing that the bond by its terms was equivalent to a payment in cash by the trust to Cook, Paul, and the bankrupt, and in my opinion it is exceedingly probable that the case was decided in his favour upon that view. At all events, the decision cannot be regarded as establishing the rule that a trustee in sequestration takes, by force of statute, property vested in the bankrupt subject to a latent trust.

For these reasons I concur in the judgment which has been moved by the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords, if this House were compelled to uphold the decision under appeal, I rather think I should be inclined to doubt whether the law of bankruptcy in Scotland was in a condition altogether satisfactory.

One M'Kay, a bankrupt, at the time of his bankruptcy stood infeft in certain heritable estates consisting of houses in Edinburgh, on a title upon the face of it absolute and unqualified. M'Kay had been the manager of the appellant company. The houses in question had been bought by him for and on behalf of his employers; the purchase-money, so far as any money passed, was paid by them. But for the sake of convenience the company took the conveyance in the name of their manager. Some years afterwards M'Kay left the company's employment, and then he executed a declaration in writing in which he confessed and declared that he held the premises "in trust only for behoof of the company," and undertook on request to transfer the trust property according to their directions. No transfer however was executed, nor was the declaration of trust registered. So there was nothing in the public records at the time of the bankruptcy to shew that the bankrupt was not the real and true owner. In this state of things the First Division of the Court of Session (Lord M'Laren dissenting) has held that these houses form part of the bankrupt's sequestrated estate applicable to the payment of his debts, and that the company for whom he declared himself trustee can only claim in the bankruptcy for the value of the property.

Is that decision right? It was argued that the question depends upon the feudal law of Scotland and upon certain provisions of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856. I venture to think that it turns wholly upon the language of the Act, and that a decision in favour of the company would not in the slightest degree trench upon the principles of the feudal law. No. 7.

Aug. 9, 1892.
Heritable
Reversionary
Co., Limited,
v. Millar.

Under the Act of 1856, proceedings in bankruptcy are commenced by a petition for sequestration. If the case is within the Act, the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff is directed to issue a deliverance awarding "sequestration of the estates which then belong or shall thereafter belong" to the bankrupt before the date of his discharge, and declaring the estates "to belong to the creditors" for the purposes of the Act. A trustee is to be elected by the creditors. On the election being confirmed, the Sheriff-clerk is directed to issue "an act and warrant" in a prescribed form, and it is provided that such act and warrant shall be evidence of the trustee's right and title to the sequestrated estate for the purposes of the Act. The bankrupt is required to make up and deliver a state of his affairs specifying his whole property, and also "a rental of his heritable property." It is provided by section 102 that "the act and warrant of confirmation in favour of the trustee shall, ipso jure, transfer to and vest in him, or any succeeding trustee, for behoof of the creditors, absolutely and irredeemably, as at the date of the sequestration, with all right, title, and interest, the whole property of the debtor, to the effect following." Then follow three subsections. The last deals with the bankrupt's real estate out of Scotland, but within Her Majesty's dominions. The first is concerned with the effect of the vesting as regards the moveable estate and effects of the bankrupt wherever situated. It is admitted that with regard to moveable estate the only property which passes to the trustee is property of which the bankrupt was the true owner. The doctrine of reputed ownership, at least as regards moveable property, has no place in the bankruptcy law of Scotland. The second subsection on which the opinions of the First Division are founded deals with the effect of the vesting as regards "the whole heritable estate belonging to the bankrupt in Scotland." It declares that the vesting is to be "to the same effect as if a decree of adjudication in implement of sale, as well as a decree for adjudication for payment and in security of debt, subject to no legal reversion, had been pronounced in favour of the trustee, and recorded at the date of the sequestration."

Such being the main provisions of the Act of 1856, I cannot help thinking that the learned Judges who formed the majority of the First Division have dwelt too much upon the effect of the vesting, and that they have paid too little attention to the thing which is vested. The vesting is absolute. It strips the bankrupt of every shred of interest. But what is the thing which is vested? It is "~~the property~~" of the bankrupt. As regards his real estate in Scotland it is "the heritable estate belonging to him." The words "property" and "belonging to" are not technical words in the law of Scotland. They are to be understood, I think, in their ordinary signification. They are, in fact, convertible terms—you can hardly explain the one except by using the other. A man's property is that which is his own—that which belongs to him. What belongs to him is his property. No one in ordinary parlance would speak of land or funds held only in trust for another as the property of the trustee. Land or funds so held are not the trustee's property in any real sense any more than a bankrupt's sequestrated estate is the property of the trustee in bankruptcy. It is true that in the present case the complete feudal title was in the bankrupt. It is true that in a strict legal view the right of the beneficiaries was only a personal claim against their trustee. But for all that the bankrupt could not

No. 7.

Aug. 9, 1892.
Heritable
Reversionary
Co., Limited,
v. Millar.

have applied the property to his own purposes, or used it for his own benefit, without committing a fraud for which he might have been made criminally responsible. The beneficiaries were the true owners all along. The bankrupt, though he had the feudal title, though he might have given a perfectly good title to a person dealing with him on the faith of the register without notice of the trust, was in reality only nominal owner without any property or proprietary right. It seems to me that in bankruptcy, by the very terms of the Bankruptcy Act, the Court is bound to look not to the form of the feudal title, but to that which Lord Justice-Clerk Hope, in contrast to the feudal or "nominal" title, as he terms it, described in one case as "the substance and reality of the right of property"—Giles v. Lindsay, 1 Ross' L. C., 491.

My Lords, I think it would be idle for me to refer to the authorities which have been so fully explained by my noble and learned friend Lord Watson. I am satisfied that there is nothing in any one of the cases which conflicts with the view which has been presented to your Lordships. And I entirely concur in the motion that the interlocutor under appeal should be reversed with costs.

LORD FIELD.—My Lords, the only question in this appeal is, whether the nett proceeds of the heritable estate in question belong to the appellants or to the respondent, and the answer to the question depends upon the construction which your Lordships ought to place upon the 102d section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act of 1856.

By that section there is undoubtedly transferred to and vested in the respondent for and on behalf of the creditors of the bankrupt, amongst other subjects, his whole property, with all rights, title, and interest in his whole heritable estate in Scotland.

Now, the subjects in question are heritable estates in Scotland, and in one and a somewhat limited sense might be understood, as it was contended for the respondent they ought to be, as the property of the bankrupt. He was ex facie the donee of them—he was the only recorded owner of them known to the public, and he was so recorded as the absolute owner, and without mention of any trust or limitation—and they were feudally vested in him. His disposition of them, although fraudulent and dishonest on his part, would have passed the property to an onerous donee without notice.

In a larger and broader sense, however, they were not his. The consideration for the disposition to him was provided by the appellants, and the bankrupt only took and was recorded as owner for their convenience, for whom he has always held them as a trustee.

But it is clear from the authorities referred to by my noble and learned friends that the law of Scotland recognises as property the beneficial interest in the subject, so that if the two interests, the legal on the one hand, and the whole beneficial interest on the other, are vested in different persons, the apparent owner who has only the legal title is, as between him and the beneficial owner, the bare trustee, and the cestui que trust is the true and real owner.

In this state of the law, therefore, the language of the section is capable of two possible constructions, and it is a sound rule of construction of a statute that if there are two constructions, one of which will do great and unnecessary injustice, and the other will avoid that injustice and keep exactly within the purpose and objects for which the statute was passed, it is the bounden duty of a Court to adopt the second and not the first of those constructions—per Lord Chancellor Cairns in construing the analogous English Bankruptcy Act in the case of the East and West India Dock Company v. Hill, 1884 (9 App. Cas. 453), and adopted by the Judicial Committee in the case of an Insolvent Act of the Victoria Legislature in Railton v. Wood, 1890 (15 App. Cas. 363). This rule does not depend upon any principle or authority peculiar to the English law, but may safely be applied to the construction of an analogous statute forming part of the law of Scotland.

No. 7.
Aug. 9, 1892.
Heritable
Reversionary
Co., Limited,
v. Millar.

Now, in which of these two senses is the language of the Act now in question to be understood? It is like all bankruptcy or insolvent statutes a “special law having for its object the distribution of the debtor’s estate equitably amongst his creditors”—per Lord Justice James in Ex parte Walton, 1881, 17 Chan. Div. 756. It is the debtor’s estate, and not the estate of any third person. The purpose and object of the statute is to distribute amongst the creditors of the bankrupt in satisfaction of his debts his estate and property, and not that of anybody else who is not within the purview of the statute.

The effect of the construction contended for by the respondent, and adopted by the majority of the Court below, would be the distribution, not of the bankrupt’s estate, which his creditors might have rendered liable to the payment of their debts, or which he might honestly and without fraud have parted with to them in satisfaction, but of the property of the cestui que trust to which the trustee could only have created a title in a third person by fraud, and which his personal creditors could not have in any way attached or rendered liable to the payment of their debts.

This construction would involve the great injustice of applying one man’s property in satisfaction of another man’s debt. Whereas the other construction is free from any such injustice and is quite consistent with the fair object of the Act, which is to free the bankrupt upon taking from him and giving to his creditors everything which might have been rendered available for the payment of their debts.

The only possible injustice which such a construction might give rise to would be in the case of any creditor who had given credit to the bankrupt upon the faith of the apparent title vested ex facie in the bankrupt; but as my noble and learned friends Lord Watson and Lord M’Laren in the Court of Session have both dealt with that point, I will only add that in other Bankruptcy Statutes reputed ownership clauses have been expressly included in the scheme of distribution in order to deal with that possible evil in the case of moveables, but have not, that I am aware of, extended the provision to heritable estate. It seems to me, therefore, that heritable subjects of which the bankrupt is a bare trustee do not pass by the warrant of confirmation.

I have thus far dealt with the case solely upon general principles of construction, and have not adverted to the numerous authorities cited at the bar and commented upon by the Lords of Session in their various judgments. It has been my duty to examine them, but my noble and learned friends have so fully placed them before your Lordships and commented upon them so exhaustively, that it is quite unnecessary for me to say more than that I concur in the view taken of them by them, and by Lord M’Laren, who dissented from the interlocutor appealed from.

I concur in the motion proposed by your Lordship.

No. 7.

Aug. 9, 1892.
Heritable
Reversionary
Co., Limited,
v. Millar.

THEIR LORDSHIPS decided that the interlocutor appealed from be reversed, and that it be declared that the subjects in question did not pass to the respondent, and that the appellants, as beneficial owners, are entitled to the sum consigned in bank; and that the respondent do pay the costs of this appeal.

A. BEVERIDGE—WATT & ANDERSON, S.S.C.—KEEPING & GLOAG—MORTON, SMART, & MACDONALD, W.S.

No. 8.

Mar. 11, 1892.
Pickard &
Curry v. Prescott.

PICKARD & CURRY (Complainers), Appellants.—Moulton, Q.C.—John Boyd—A. Statham.

GEORGE PRESCOTT (Respondent), Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Murray—W. C. Smith.

Patent—Proof of prior publication.—In an action for interdict against the infringement of a patent, dated 24th July 1885, the respondent pleaded that the patent was invalid by reason of prior publication of the invention. It was proved that in a foreign review, dated 30th June 1885, there was a description of an article admittedly indistinguishable from the subject of the patent. Evidence which held sufficient to instruct that the review had been published in this country prior to the date of the patent.

Ld. Chancellor
(Halsbury).
Lord Watson.
Lord Morris.
Lord Field.

(IN the Court of Session, July 9, 1890, 17 R. 1102.)

The complainers appealed.

The question raised in this case was whether the appellants' patent, "for improvements in the bridges of pince-nez or double eye-glasses," dated 24th July 1885, was invalid in respect that the invention had been previously published in this country in the Revue Générale d'Ophthalmologie of 30th June 1885. It was not disputed that the invention disclosed in the review was the same as that set forth in the patent, and the question raised upon the proof was whether there had been publication in this country before the date of the patent.

The substance of the proof (led in November 1889) upon this point was as follows:—

Otto Schulze, manager in Edinburgh for Messrs Williams & Norgate, foreign booksellers, deponed,—“We have a house in London as well as in Edinburgh. We are agents in Great Britain for the sale of the Revue Générale d'Ophthalmologie, which is published monthly in Paris. We are mentioned as agents for it in the catalogues published to the trade. We supply it to various individuals, and also to institutions. We supply it to the Ophthalmic Hospital, London, and to the Medico-Chirurgical Society, London. These copies are supplied from the London house. In Edinburgh, we supply it to Dr George Berry. I exhibit our Periodical Book,* from which it would appear that Dr Berry was supplied with the sixth month's issue of 1885 on 10th July of the same year. That would be the number of 30th June. . . . Cross.—Besides Dr Berry and the institutions I have mentioned, we supplied copies of the Revue Générale d'Ophthalmologie, in 1885, to Dr Nettleship, and to Bell & Taylor, or Mr Bell Taylor. To the best of my belief these were the only copies that were coming into this country at that time. The interval between the

* The following is a copy of the entry in the periodical book of Williams & Norgate relating to Dr Berry.

Revue D'Ophthalmologie.

G. Berry, 1885.

28/2	22/3	16/4	20/5	20/6	10/7	27/6	2/10	30/10	3/12	3/12	22/2
1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12

date of publication and the time when such foreign publications come into the hands of booksellers or agents here for distribution is very uncertain. I cannot say whether we had copies of the Revue Générale d'Ophthalmologie for sale in our shops in 1885; we may or we may not. The copies I have mentioned were all supplied to order. In supplying them, we acted as agents. Our periodical book shews the date of delivery of the various papers. The numbers running from one to twelve are the months of the year. The number above the figure six I take to be ten, not twenty. . . . The figures shewing the July delivery of the June periodical are not very clear. I cannot explain how it came that the June delivery was on the 20th, and the July delivery on 10th. The irregularity of the Paris house sending out the numbers would quite account for a difference of ten days in the delivery. The figures record the delivery made in the month under which they occur. The record of the seventh month, July, is 27/6. (Q.) Does not that record that the delivery in fact made in July of the number of the seventh month was on 27th June? (A.) Yes. . . . Re-examined.—It is our practice to send the Revue out on the day we received it if possible. By the Court.—(Q.) Is the result of your reading of the book that this June number of the Revue Générale was delivered to Dr Berry on 10th July? (A.) Yes. Re-examined.—It is the custom of our London house to send out the Revue as soon as it is received. We never get it before the date that is upon it; that is not a continental system at all.”

No. 8.

Mar. 11, 1892.
Pickard &
Curry v. Prescott.

Dr George Berry deponed,—“I am a doctor of medicine in Edinburgh, and a specialist in ophthalmology. I know the Revue Générale d'Ophthalmologie. I have taken it in since it began in 1882. . . . I have no particular recollection of getting the part of 30th June 1885. . . . The pencil writing upon my copy of 30th June 1885 is in my handwriting. The writing is, ‘If you think well of this, please make me one to shew patients.’ I must have written that at the time. I remember of writing something and sending it to Pickard & Curry. To the best of my recollection I sent them the June number of the Revue with the note I have just read upon it. . . . Cross.—I have no copy of any letter sending the paper to complainers. It came back with a letter. I have not got the letter that came back with it. . . . I am not prepared to say anything about the date of the letter. The Revue may have lain in my possession some time unopened. (Shewn copy letter by complainers to witness, dated 4th September 1885)—That is the letter I received from complainers in reply to my communication. It must have been shortly before that that I sent the Revue to them. I would receive the reply probably in the course of a week, I should think. (Q.) Are you satisfied now that you had not read the Revue or seen this drawing until the latter part of August? (A.) No, I cannot be sure. I may have been away on a holiday at the time.” In his subsequent examination on the merits, Dr Berry deponed that he sent the June number to Pickard & Curry in the first few days of September or the last few days of August 1885.

The complainer Curry deponed,—“My late partner, Joseph Fidoe Pickard, and I were the sole inventors of the pince-nez described in our provisional specification of 24th July 1885. We made the drawings about the middle of March, and sent them to a house in London to be forwarded to Paris for execution, because we were afraid, if we carried them out in our own shop, the design would be divulged and copied before it was protected. . . . (Shewn copy letter by complainers to Dr Berry, Edinburgh, dated 4th September 1885)—That letter was written in reply to one by Dr Berry to us asking if we had seen the article in the Revue.

No. 8.

Mar. 11, 1892.
Pickard &
Curry v. Prescott.

. . . I wrote in reply to Dr Berry the same day as we received his communication ; I always write in course of post, or I make an apology for not doing it. I am satisfied that it was in the month of September that I received the communication from him."

George Prescott, the respondent, deponed,—“I first saw that issue of the Revue and the illustration on page 11 at the time of publication immediately after 30th June 1885. It was brought to me at my own house (in Dublin) by a Dublin oculist, Dr Storey. I afterwards saw another copy in the possession of Dr Fitzgerald, surgeon-oculist to the Queen in Ireland. This was a day or two after Dr Storey had brought me the copy. (Q.) Was it before the end of July 1885? Certainly. These were the only copies I saw at that time, but since then I have seen another in the possession of Dr Berry, Edinburgh. Cross.—I fix the date when I saw the copy of the Revue to which I have spoken by the date of that particular number, 30th June. That is the date when the Revue was printed in Paris. When Dr Storey brought the copy to me, he said,—‘Here is something new,’ or ‘I have just got this,’ or words to that effect. I have no distinct recollection of the date when he brought it. I have no note or record to enable me to fix the date. It was not in June 1885. (Q.) May it have been in August? (A.) The matter was not impressed on my mind at the time, but I don’t think so. (Q.) But as to any date in July or any other month you are not prepared to speak? (A.) No, I can only say I saw it when it was published in Ireland. (Q.) When did it first occur to your mind or to anybody else’s mind who communicated it to you, that you could set up this as having been published in this country before 24th July 1885? (A.) A few days ago, when Dr Berry suggested it.”

After hearing counsel for the appellants,—

LORD CHANCELLOR.—In the opinion to which I am about to give utterance in this case, I desire not to be understood as attempting to lay down any general principles of law. I cannot help thinking that occasional observations made by a learned Judge upon the subject of the facts in a particular case have been from time to time misunderstood as conveying some opinion upon the subject of the general law, and have given rise to confusion. Now, I protest against being supposed in this case to do more than apply my observations to the particular case with which your Lordships have to deal. I do not think that the question of publication in this country of the invention which is the subject-matter of the claim is anything but a question of fact ; and inasmuch as it is a question of fact to be determined in the particular case upon the facts, it is very idle to lay down any general canon of what will be the result of this or of that particular case. Each case must depend upon its own circumstances ; and the effect, extent, and operation of the document by which the invention is supposed to be communicated to the public in this country, so as to anticipate the invention of the person who first took out letters-patent for the invention, vary infinitely as the facts must vary. For example, there are a great variety of instances in which it might very well be that the mere fact of an invention being completely disclosed on a written paper, and that written paper brought into this country would, notwithstanding those circumstances, not in the smallest degree amount to publication, and would not interfere with a patent afterwards taken out. On the other hand, such a case as is now before your Lordships raises to my mind, and simply as a question of fact, the irresistible inference that this invention was communicated in the strictest sense to the public, in such a way as to prevent the operation of the letters-patent taken out after the date of that publication. No. 8.

Now, my Lords, the first point which I have to consider is, what is the thing itself? I think that Lord Lee has very justly observed (though there is a misprint in his judgment) "This is not the case of depositing a private document" (as it ought to be printed) "as distinguished from a published journal in a public library," and I think it is most important in this case to bear that in mind. What is the thing about which we are disputing? It is a magazine published monthly, and addressed to persons interested in ophthalmic surgery, presumably persons who would give their attention to such a subject, and desire to be informed upon that subject as soon as the new discoveries or accounts of scientific meetings, or what not, could be communicated to them. Therefore, starting with the nature of the thing in one's mind, it is to me almost impossible to resist the conclusion that assuming that this thing which was published in Paris was circulated in the United Kingdom (I will not for the moment assume at what date it was published, but whenever it was published, and whenever it was distributed to the subscribers, or the persons who took an interest in those subjects), I say that I should think it would be the most natural inference in the world to hold that it was within a reasonable time at all events after its publication in Paris brought to the notice of those persons who took an interest in such subjects, if the magazine circulated in England or in the United Kingdom at all. Starting with that proposition, what is the evidence? I am bound to say that I am wholly unable to follow the commentary of the Lord Ordinary upon the evidence of the respondent himself. The respondent says,—“I first saw that issue of the Revue and the illustration at the time of publication, immediately after 30th June 1885. It was brought to me at my own house by a Dublin oculist, Dr Storey. I afterwards saw another copy in the possession of Dr Fitzgerald, surgeon-oculist to the Queen in Ireland. This was a day or two after Dr Storey had brought me the copy.” Now, there, is positive proof of publication very shortly after, he says, the 30th of June. If that was the only evidence as to the date, and if he was not corroborated,—not by the two medical gentlemen who, the Lord Ordinary seems to think, ought to have been called to corroborate him,—but if there had been independent proof that, although this publication was dated the 30th of June, it was not in circulation in this country until the month of July or some later date, it might be said that his recollection and the words which he uses, “at the time of publication, immediately after the 30th June 1885,” ought not to be sufficiently relied upon to justify the Courts in acting upon them. And I am not prepared to say that had there been only the evidence of a witness speaking vaguely and with unrefreshed memory, some three or four years afterwards, I should have been entirely satisfied with evidence of that character.

But the evidence does not stop there. Leaving out again the date for the moment (for reasons which I have already indicated), I find that the complainers themselves have given evidence that on the 25th of August (I note first the date) there was a copy in the hands of a gentleman who was connected with the Middlesex Hospital. And then I find that Mr Makins proves that he saw three copies of that issue of the Revue, besides the particular one which he held in his hand, one at the Royal Ophthalmic Hospital, London, one at the Ophthalmological Society, and one in the possession of Dr Nettleship, Wimpole Street, Cavendish Square, London. I say nothing about the Medico-Chirur-

Mar. 11, 1892.
Pickard &
Curry v. Prescott.

No. 8.
 Mar. 11, 1892.
 Pickard &
 Curry v. Prescott.

gical Society, because he was only informed that there was one there, and I think that would not be evidence upon which one could rely. But there we have evidence that in Dublin, and in London, those institutions which were likely to take an interest in such questions as these had copies of this particular document.

Then it is said, and truly said, but this was within a week of the time at which the witness was being examined, and that of course that is no proof that on the 30th, or shortly after the 30th of June 1885, the copies were in the possession of those three institutions. In the sense of its being direct proof, I agree that it is not; but I should certainly infer (and regard it as a reasonable inference) that they had them within a reasonable time. What is a reasonable time depends of course upon the particular subject-matter with which one is dealing, but I should certainly infer that within a reasonable time after the publication of these documents they would have been received by the persons for whom they were designed, and who took an interest in such questions.

Now, then, my Lords, we come to the question, what was the date of publication? I observe that the respondent broadly alleges that the publication of the number was on the 30th of June. Possibly he did not know that. But he ought to have been cross-examined to shew whether he did or did not know it; and there is certainly legal evidence, because there it is; he says that it was on the 30th of June, and he is not cross-examined upon it. There again, however, I think it is very likely that it was allowed to pass, and that what was really referred to was the date on the document itself, and, therefore, I do not rely upon this statement.

But, then there comes the evidence of the publication having reached the hands of the agent of Messrs Williams & Norgate in Edinburgh. That depends to some extent of course upon the accuracy of the entry in the book. Well, I think that if one assumes it to be accurate, it proves two things, not only the publication to Dr Berry, with which I will deal in a moment, but also that this publication was being distributed to subscribers to it, and persons interested in it, on the 10th of July. And why am I to assume that the respondent is not accurate when he says that he saw it shortly after its publication in Dublin? And why am I to assume that these different institutions interested in ophthalmic surgery did not receive their copies in London? And why am I to assume that the medical gentlemen in Dublin did not receive their copies in Dublin as soon as that copy which was intended for distribution in Edinburgh was received there, that is, on the 10th of July?

My Lords, I am hardly able to compass the argument which suggests that I ought not to draw the inference that this thing, which was intended for publication, and was undoubtedly in circulation in this country at some time or another, and was sent at some time or another to these different institutions, was sent as soon as it might reasonably be expected to be sent. A reasonable time was certainly, I should have thought, within less than ten or twelve days of the date of publication, considering the distance and the mode of communication between Edinburgh and Paris. But, at all events, I am not left to that speculation of what is reasonable, because, as I say, apart altogether from what Dr Berry says, there is the fact that it is traced to the publishing house of Williams & Norgate in Edinburgh on the 10th of July. Therefore, my Lords, dealing with it as a question of fact, I assume that that was about the period of publication to the other persons interested in having this publication; and therefore, apart altogether from a single word uttered by Dr Berry, and if the proof had simply stopped at the fact that there it was at Messrs Williams & Norgate's, and if Dr Berry had not seen it at all, I should have drawn the same inference that there was sufficient evidence to establish the period of its distribution; and if it was distributed to others at that time, then the consequence is too obvious to require statement.

No. 8.

Mar. 11, 1892.
Pickard &
Curry v. Prescott.

Then, my Lords, with reference to Dr Berry, I do not know in what way I am to assume that Dr Berry did not pursue what would be the ordinary course of any person interested in such subjects. I do not at all deny that what Mr Moulton and his learned junior have very forcibly argued is true, that sometimes people allow their books to remain on their tables and do not open them, and do not even cut them. That is very true. But the question is, what am I to assume and what am I to infer to be proved upon the evidence as it stands in the absence of evidence on the other side? A person presumably wants to read and desires to read that which he pays for; and having become a subscriber for this thing, I suppose a gentleman who required ophthalmic studies to be added to his stores of knowledge would be likely to read that which would and did assist him in those studies. But then it is said that Dr Berry cannot tell us that he did read it. Of course he cannot; and as Mr Moulton's junior very candidly said in his short but very able and terse argument, "I would not believe him if he did." No, of course not. Nobody, unless it is a very exceptional man, can bring his memory back after the lapse of years sufficiently to be able to say,—“At that particular time I read such and such a thing.” The ordinary common sense of mankind naturally leads one to the conclusion, I should say, that taking the fact that this is a monthly publication intended to give information on the subject in which its subscribers and readers are interested at the time when it is published, and taking the fact that it is published, not merely once every year, but once every month, because it is intended to give people the current information upon the subject, Dr Berry probably did read it within a reasonably short time after he received it, and if so, it seems to me that having received it on the 10th or 11th of July (giving an extra day for it to reach him) he probably read it about that time, and if so, the same result would follow as I have before indicated.

Then it is said that Dr Berry cannot say whether he was in Edinburgh or not. That he cannot say that positively is true, but I should have thought that dealing with an Edinburgh man who was receiving books in Edinburgh and reading them there, the reasonable inference would be that he was at home unless the contrary appeared. At least I should be sorry to suppose that it was not a reasonable inference that a man was at home unless he remembered that he was away.

That, my Lords, seems to me to dispose of this case. Hitherto I have, of course, assumed the accuracy of the particular date in the book. Now, upon that I am not at this moment quite certain that I quite followed Mr Moulton's argument. He says that an entry does not prove its own accuracy. I will deal with it now as if it was offered in this country and not subject to the laws of evidence in Scotland. I think in strictness if it had been offered in this country the learned counsel against whose interest it was offered would have been entitled to interpose and say,—“Did you write it yourself?” If the witness had declared that he did not write it, then for that purpose he would have been compelled to retire and give place to somebody else who would have

No. 7.

Aug. 9, 1892.
Heritable
Reversionary
Co., Limited,
v. Millar.

insolvent, compounded with his creditors, and in order to secure the cautioners for his composition, conveyed certain heritable subjects belonging to him, to himself and them in trust, with power to sell or burden, for repayment of any advances made by them on his behalf, and for payment of any balance remaining to himself, his heirs, or disponees. The trustees sold part of the subjects, and took from the purchaser a heritable bond and disposition in security for £400, payable to three of their number, Cook, Cuthill, and Paul, as individuals. Cuthill became bankrupt, at the time when the sums advanced and liabilities incurred by the cautioners exceeded the value of the trust-estate. Jeffrey, as trustee in Cuthill's sequestration, claimed one-third of the sum contained in the bond as belonging to the bankrupt, and was opposed by the solvent cautioners, who maintained that the bond was trust property. The Court of Session rejected Jeffrey's claim, but on appeal to this House it was sustained. The report in the Court of Session, June 11, 1834 (12 S. 718), assigns no reasons for the judgment; and in this House, Lord Brougham, sitting alone, moved its reversal without explanation or comment. In these circumstances, I find it impossible to regard the judgment of that noble and learned lord as a decision upon the point raised in this appeal. The pleadings of the appellant in this House disclose that he claimed a third share of the bond on the footing that the bond by its terms was equivalent to a payment in cash by the trust to Cook, Paul, and the bankrupt, and in my opinion it is exceedingly probable that the case was decided in his favour upon that view. At all events, the decision cannot be regarded as establishing the rule that a trustee in sequestration takes, by force of statute, property vested in the bankrupt subject to a latent trust.

For these reasons I concur in the judgment which has been moved by the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords, if this House were compelled to uphold the decision under appeal, I rather think I should be inclined to doubt whether the law of bankruptcy in Scotland was in a condition altogether satisfactory.

One M'Kay, a bankrupt, at the time of his bankruptcy stood infeft in certain heritable estates consisting of houses in Edinburgh, on a title upon the face of it absolute and unqualified. M'Kay had been the manager of the appellant company. The houses in question had been bought by him for and on behalf of his employers; the purchase-money, so far as any money passed, was paid by them. But for the sake of convenience the company took the conveyance in the name of their manager. Some years afterwards M'Kay left the company's employment, and then he executed a declaration in writing in which he confessed and declared that he held the premises "in trust only for behoof of the company," and undertook on request to transfer the trust property according to their directions. No transfer however was executed, nor was the declaration of trust registered. So there was nothing in the public records at the time of the bankruptcy to shew that the bankrupt was not the real and true owner. In this state of things the First Division of the Court of Session (Lord M'Laren dissenting) has held that these houses form part of the bankrupt's sequestered estate applicable to the payment of his debts, and that the company for whom he declared himself trustee can only claim in the bankruptcy for the value of the property.

Is that decision right? It was argued that the question depends upon the feudal law of Scotland and upon certain provisions of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856. I venture to think that it turns wholly upon the language of the Act, and that a decision in favour of the company would not in the slightest degree trench upon the principles of the feudal law. No. 7.

Aug. 9, 1892.
Heritable
Reversionary
Co., Limited,
v. Millar.

Under the Act of 1856, proceedings in bankruptcy are commenced by a petition for sequestration. If the case is within the Act, the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff is directed to issue a deliverance awarding "sequestration of the estates which then belong or shall thereafter belong" to the bankrupt before the date of his discharge, and declaring the estates "to belong to the creditors" for the purposes of the Act. A trustee is to be elected by the creditors. On the election being confirmed, the Sheriff-clerk is directed to issue "an act and warrant" in a prescribed form, and it is provided that such act and warrant shall be evidence of the trustee's right and title to the sequestered estate for the purposes of the Act. The bankrupt is required to make up and deliver a state of his affairs specifying his whole property, and also "a rental of his heritable property." It is provided by section 102 that "the act and warrant of confirmation in favour of the trustee shall, ipso jure, transfer to and vest in him, or any succeeding trustee, for behoof of the creditors, absolutely and irredeemably, as at the date of the sequestration, with all right, title, and interest, the whole property of the debtor, to the effect following." Then follow three subsections. The last deals with the bankrupt's real estate out of Scotland, but within Her Majesty's dominions. The first is concerned with the effect of the vesting as regards the moveable estate and effects of the bankrupt wherever situated. It is admitted that with regard to moveable estate the only property which passes to the trustee is property of which the bankrupt was the true owner. The doctrine of reputed ownership, at least as regards moveable property, has no place in the bankruptcy law of Scotland. The second subsection on which the opinions of the First Division are founded deals with the effect of the vesting as regards "the whole heritable estate belonging to the bankrupt in Scotland." It declares that the vesting is to be "to the same effect as if a decree of adjudication in implement of sale, as well as a decree for adjudication for payment and in security of debt, subject to no legal reversion, had been pronounced in favour of the trustee, and recorded at the date of the sequestration."

Such being the main provisions of the Act of 1856, I cannot help thinking that the learned Judges who formed the majority of the First Division have dwelt too much upon the effect of the vesting, and that they have paid too little attention to the thing which is vested. The vesting is absolute. It strips the bankrupt of every shred of interest. But what is the thing which is vested? It is "~~the property~~" of the bankrupt. As regards his real estate in Scotland it is "the heritable estate belonging to him." The words "property" and "belonging to" are not technical words in the law of Scotland. They are to be understood, I think, in their ordinary signification. They are, in fact, convertible terms—you can hardly explain the one except by using the other. A man's property is that which is his own—that which belongs to him. What belongs to him is his property. No one in ordinary parlance would speak of land or funds held only in trust for another as the property of the trustee. Land or funds so held are not the trustee's property in any real sense any more than a bankrupt's sequestered estate is the property of the trustee in bankruptcy. It is true that in the present case the complete feudal title was in the bankrupt. It is true that in a strict legal view the right of the beneficiaries was only a personal claim against their trustee. But for all that the bankrupt could not

No. 7.

Aug. 9, 1892.
Heritable
Reversionary
Co., Limited,
v. Millar.

have applied the property to his own purposes, or used it for his own benefit, without committing a fraud for which he might have been made criminally responsible. The beneficiaries were the true owners all along. The bankrupt, though he had the feudal title, though he might have given a perfectly good title to a person dealing with him on the faith of the register without notice of the trust, was in reality only nominal owner without any property or proprietary right. It seems to me that in bankruptcy, by the very terms of the Bankruptcy Act, the Court is bound to look not to the form of the feudal title, but to that which Lord Justice-Clerk Hope, in contrast to the feudal or "nominal" title, as he terms it, described in one case as "the substance and reality of the right of property"—Giles v. Lindsay, 1 Ross' L. C., 491.

My Lords, I think it would be idle for me to refer to the authorities which have been so fully explained by my noble and learned friend Lord Watson. I am satisfied that there is nothing in any one of the cases which conflicts with the view which has been presented to your Lordships. And I entirely concur in the motion that the interlocutor under appeal should be reversed with costs.

LORD FIELD.—My Lords, the only question in this appeal is, whether the nett proceeds of the heritable estate in question belong to the appellants or to the respondent, and the answer to the question depends upon the construction which your Lordships ought to place upon the 102d section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act of 1856.

By that section there is undoubtedly transferred to and vested in the respondent for and on behalf of the creditors of the bankrupt, amongst other subjects, his whole property, with all rights, title, and interest in his whole heritable estate in Scotland.

Now, the subjects in question are heritable estates in Scotland, and in one and a somewhat limited sense might be understood, as it was contended for the respondent they ought to be, as the property of the bankrupt. He was ex facie the disponee of them—he was the only recorded owner of them known to the public, and he was so recorded as the absolute owner, and without mention of any trust or limitation—and they were feudally vested in him. His disposition of them, although fraudulent and dishonest on his part, would have passed the property to an onerous disponee without notice.

In a larger and broader sense, however, they were not his. The consideration for the disposition to him was provided by the appellants, and the bankrupt only took and was recorded as owner for their convenience, for whom he has always held them as a trustee.

But it is clear from the authorities referred to by my noble and learned friends that the law of Scotland recognises as property the beneficial interest in the subject, so that if the two interests, the legal on the one hand, and the whole beneficial interest on the other, are vested in different persons, the apparent owner who has only the legal title is, as between him and the beneficial owner, the bare trustee, and the cestui que trust is the true and real owner.

In this state of the law, therefore, the language of the section is capable of two possible constructions, and it is a sound rule of construction of a statute that if there are two constructions, one of which will do great and unnecessary injustice, and the other will avoid that injustice and keep exactly within the

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF JUSTICIARY

1891-92.

JOHN M'DONALD, Appellant.—Strachan.
GEORGE DUFF, Respondent.—Craigie—Anderson.

No. 1.

Nov. 2, 1891.
M'Donald v.
Duff.

Sentence—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. c. 62), sec. 70
—Education (Scotland) Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. c. 56), sec. 9.—A parent was charged under a complaint with having contravened the Education (Scotland) Acts, 1872 to 1883, in so far as he had, "without reasonable excuse, failed to discharge the duty of providing, as required by said Acts, efficient elementary education . . . for his child," aged thirteen years, and penalties were prayed for under the 70th section of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872.* The Sheriff-substitute found that the accused had "failed to secure the regular attendance" of the child "at some public or inspected school after due warning," and pronounced an attendance order under the Act of 1883.†

The Court held that under a complaint alleging a contravention under sec. 70 of the Education Act, 1872, it was incompetent for the Sheriff-substitute to find that the accused had failed to secure the regular attendance of his child at some public or inspected school after due warning, in terms of sec. 9 of the Education Act, 1883.

* The Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. c. 62), sec. 70, enacted that on a report by their officer that a parent has failed to provide elementary education for his or her children the school board may summon the defaulting parent, and if not satisfied with the explanations or undertaking given, "it shall be lawful to and shall be the duty of the school board to certify in writing that he has been and is grossly, and without reasonable excuse, failing to discharge the duty of providing elementary education for his child or children, and on such certificate being transmitted to the procurator-fiscal of the county or district of the county in which the parent resides, or other person appointed by the school board, he shall prosecute such parent before the Sheriff of the county for such failure of duty as is in the certificate specified, and on conviction the parent shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings, or to imprisonment not exceeding fourteen days. . . ."

† The Education (Scotland) Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. c. 56), sec. 9, enacted,—"If the parent of any child, without reasonable excuse, neglects to provide efficient elementary education as aforesaid for his child, or fails to secure the regular attendance of his child at some public or inspected school, it shall be lawful for the school board, after due warning to the parent of such child, to complain to a Court of summary jurisdiction, and such Court may, if satisfied of the truth of such complaint, order that the child do attend some public or inspected school willing to receive him and named in the order, being either such as the parent may select, or if he do not select any, then such as the Court may think expedient, and the child shall attend the school every time the school is open. . . ."

No. 1.

Nov. 2, 1891.
M'Donald v.
Duff.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Adam.
Lord Kin-
cairney.
Justiciary
Clerk.

JOHN M'DONALD, appointed by the School Board of the parish of Tain to prosecute in terms of the Education (Scotland) Acts, 1872 to 1883, prosecuted George Duff, farm-servant, Tain, before the Sheriff of Ross and Cromarty and Sutherland on a complaint which charged Duff with having "contravened the Education (Scotland) Acts, 1872 to 1883, . . . in so far as the said George Duff has for a period of at least one month immediately preceding the date hereof, without reasonable excuse, failed to discharge the duty of providing, as required by said Acts, efficient elementary education in reading, writing, and arithmetic for Margaret Duff, aged thirteen years, his child, and residing with him, whereby the said George Duff is liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings, or to imprisonment not exceeding fourteen days, in terms of the 70th section of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872."

The accused pleaded guilty, and the Sheriff-substitute (Crawfurd Hill) refused to fine or to imprison him in terms of the 70th section of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, but pronounced an "attendance order" in terms of the 9th section of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1883, finding that the accused "has failed to secure the regular attendance of . . . his child, at some public or inspected school after due warning, and therefore ordains the said child to attend the Tain Public School every time the said school is open, and during the whole time the same is open for the instruction of children of similar age . . ."

M'Donald appealed to the High Court upon a case stated by the Sheriff-substitute, from which the above narrative is taken.

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were,—“(1) Is it competent for a School Board, in a complaint under the Education (Scotland) Acts, 1872 to 1883, to conclude only for the penalties under the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872? (2) If it is, is it in the power of the Sheriff under such a complaint to pronounce an attendance order in terms of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1883?”

Argued for the appellant;—Under the 15th section of the Education Act of 1883 the School Board had power to proceed under one or other of the Acts, but not under both. The complaint here contained a charge under section 70 of the Act of 1872, and concluded for penalties under that section. The attendance order under the 1883 Act was thus incompetently pronounced.¹

Argued for the respondent;—The complaint was brought under the Education Acts, 1872 to 1883, and the Sheriff-substitute was quite entitled to consider whether he would impose a penalty under the one Act or the other.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The fatal objection to what has been done in this case is, that while the complaint charges the accused with having, "without reasonable excuse, failed to discharge the duty of providing, as required by said Acts, efficient elementary education" for his child, the Sheriff-substitute has given no finding on the matter. He has found that the accused "failed to secure the regular attendance" of his child "at some public or inspected school after due warning"; but, then, that is not what the accused was charged with. If he had been so charged, for aught we know to the contrary, he might have had a perfectly good defence to the effect that he never had been duly warned to do that which he was charged with neglecting. A judgment which only finds that the accused has failed to secure attendance at school after due warning is a finding upon a matter of which there was no notice in the complaint. The complainer pleaded guilty not to having failed to send his child to school after due warning, but it is this of which the Sheriff-substitute convicts him. I think, then, that the Sheriff-substitute's decision was bad and must be set aside.

¹ Macaulay v. Macdonald, June 3, 1887, 1 White, 376, 14 R. (Just. Cases) 43.

No. 1.

Nov. 2, 1891.
M'Donald v.
Duff.

As regards the first question, I entertain no doubt that the School Board, in a complaint under the Education (Scotland) Acts, 1872 to 1883, was quite entitled to conclude for the penalties only under the Act of 1872.

The other question I should answer by saying that it is not in the power of the Sheriff, under a complaint which only charges failure to provide efficient elementary education, to convict the person so charged of having failed to secure regular attendance at an inspected school after due warning.

LORD ADAM.—I do not understand the counsel for the respondent to maintain that the School Board were not entitled to proceed under the 70th section of the Act of 1872 alone, or the 9th section of the Act of 1883 alone.

The only objection to the conclusion in the complaint for penalties under the Act of 1872 only is, that the complaint charges contravention of the Education (Scotland) Acts, 1872 to 1883.

I do not think that affects the matter, and that being so, there is really no dispute that the first question must be answered in the affirmative.

I confess I also think that, assuming such a complaint to be competent, it is not in the power of the Sheriff under such a complaint to pronounce an attendance order under the Act of 1883.

Where a complaint is laid under a special Act and under a special clause, to say that a Sheriff can award another penalty for a different ground of complaint would be against all practice and principle. I therefore think that the second question must be answered in the negative.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I concur with your Lordships upon the first question, and have nothing to add. Nor have I any difficulty as to the answer to the second question, but as the person charged, instead of objecting to the order, appears in support of it, I have difficulty in setting it aside.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the first question in the case in the affirmative: With reference to the second question, find that it was not competent for the Sheriff, under a complaint alleging a contravention under section 70 of the Education Act of 1872, to find that the party complained against had failed to secure the regular attendance of his child at some public or inspected school after due warning, in terms of section 9 of the Education Act, 1883: Remit to the Sheriff, and decern."

MORTON, SMART, & MACDONALD, W.S.—DAVID A. ROSS, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN HALLIDAY, Complainer.—Lorimer.

No. 2.

ROBERT WILSON (Procurator-Fiscal for Lanarkshire, at Hamilton), Respondent.—Maconochie.

Nov. 3, 1891.
Halliday v.
Wilson.

Instance—Change of Lord Advocate—Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 35), sec. 3.—Sec. 3 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, enacts that "the Lord Advocate and his Deputies shall not demit office on the resignation of the Lord Advocate, but shall continue in office until their successors respectively receive their appointments, and the Lord Advocate shall enter on the duties of his office immediately on receiving his appointment."

An indictment was served on 3d October in name of Lord Advocate Robert-

No. 2.

Nov. 3, 1891.
Halliday v.
Wilson.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Ruther-
furd Clark.
Lord Trayner.
Justiciary
Clerk.

son. It was objected that a new Lord Advocate had been appointed by 2d October, on which day notice of his appointment appeared in the Gazette. His commission was not issued till 13th October.

Objection repelled.

ON 3d October 1891 John Halliday, police-constable, Hallside Village, Cambuslang, was served with an indictment on a charge of theft. The indictment bore to be "at the instance of the Right Honourable James Patrick Bannerman Robertson, Her Majesty's Advocate," and Halliday was indicted before the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, with a jury. At the diet for trial, which took place at Hamilton, on 28th October, Halliday objected to the instance in the indictment, in respect that, on 1st October, two days before the indictment was served upon him, Sir Charles Pearson had been appointed Lord Advocate, and therefore he maintained that the indictment was inept. This objection was repelled by the Sheriff-substitute (Davidson). After evidence had been led, the jury returned a verdict of guilty, and Halliday was sentenced to three months' imprisonment.

Halliday then brought a suspension of the conviction and sentence, pleading,—“The said indictment is inept, in regard that it proceeds in the name and at the instance of the said Right Honourable James Patrick Bannerman Robertson, as Her Majesty's Advocate, while at the time the said indictment was raised and served the said Sir Charles John Pearson was Her Majesty's Advocate, and the said conviction and sentence, and all following on said indictment, ought to be suspended and quashed, and the complainer liberated.”

The facts as to the appointment of the Lord Advocate were ascertained to be as follows:—In the Edinburgh Gazette of 2d October 1891 the following notice appeared:—“Office of the Secretary for Scotland, Whitehall, S.W., October 1, 1891.—The Queen has been pleased to appoint Sir Charles John Pearson, Knight, Q.C., Solicitor-General for Scotland, to be Her Majesty's Advocate for Scotland, in the room of the Right Honourable James Patrick Bannerman Robertson, Q.C., appointed Lord Justice-General and President of the Court of Session in Scotland.” On 6th October a warrant under the royal sign manual was received at the Crown Office for issuing Sir Charles Pearson's commission, and on 13th October a commission in favour of Sir Charles Pearson was issued under the Great Seal.*

Argued for the suspender;—The date of the service must be taken as the date of the indictment. It was not served till 3d October, while Sir Charles Pearson's appointment was made on the 1st and gazetted on the 2d October. The warrant which arrived on 6th October was merely evidence of the appointment.

Argued for the respondent;—On a sound construction of the statute, the date of the appointment of the Lord Advocate was the date on which he received his commission, or at all events of the royal warrant on which the commission follows. Till then his predecessor was to be regarded as Lord Advocate, and indictments were properly framed at his instance.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts here are beyond all doubt. The warrant for issuing the present Lord Advocate's commission under the Great Seal is dated the 1st October, and parties are agreed that it did not reach the Crown Office till the 5th or 6th October.

* The Criminal Procedure Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 35), enacts, by sec. 3,—“The Lord Advocate and his Deputies shall not demit office on the resignation of the Lord Advocate, but shall continue in office until their successors respectively receive their appointments, and the Lord Advocate shall enter on the duties of his office immediately on receiving his appointment.”

The 3d section of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, is,—“The Lord Advocate and his Deputes shall not demit office on the resignation of the Lord Advocate, but shall continue in office until their successors respectively receive their appointments, and the Lord Advocate shall enter upon the duties of his office immediately on receiving his appointment.” Taking then this latter clause first, I have no doubt that, till the warrant reached the Crown Office, the present Lord Advocate, Sir Charles Pearson, could not “enter upon the duties of his office,” because he had not received his appointment. And not having received his appointment, his predecessor continued in office. Therefore the indictment which was served on the 3d October is perfectly good, for it was served in name of the Lord Advocate who by statute remains in office till his successor has received his appointment.

No. 2.

Nov. 3, 1891.
Halliday v.
Wilson.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree. The only question is, what do the words “receive appointment” mean? They occur twice. “The Lord Advocate and his Deputes shall not demit office on the resignation of the Lord Advocate, but shall continue in office until their successors respectively receive their appointments”; and again, “the Lord Advocate shall enter upon the duties of his office immediately on receiving his appointment.” The expression “receiving appointment” must therefore mean that something has occurred which enables the new Lord Advocate to act. And it is quite out of the question that that something could be the mere appearance of a notice in the Gazette.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur.

THE COURT refused the bill of suspension.

JOHN LATTI, S.S.C.—CROWN AGENT—Agents.

JOSEPH YOUNG HUTTON AND ANOTHER, Appellants.—Salvesen.
ALEXANDER MAIN (Procurator-Fiscal of Leith Police Court), Respondent.—Dickson.

No. 3.

Nov. 5, 1891.
Hutton v.
Main.

Breach of the peace—Relevancy—Complaint—Specification—Street preaching—Annoyance or disturbance of residents.—A police complaint charged that on a particular evening and on a street in Leith the accused persons “did loudly read, sing, pray, and preach, and did continue to do so for half-an-hour, by which a large crowd was collected, and the residents and others in the neighbourhood were annoyed and disturbed.”

Held that this did not constitute a relevant charge of any offence at common law, and conviction following thereon set aside.

JOSEPH YOUNG HUTTON and Malcolm M'Donald were on 16th September 1891 charged at the instance of Alexander Main, Procurator-fiscal before the Leith Police Court, the charge being, that “on the evening of 7th September 1891, on the public street in the Kirkgate or Duke Street, near the foot of Leith Walk, all in Leith, they did loudly read, sing, pray, and preach, and did continue to do so for half-an-hour, by which a large crowd was collected, and the residents and others in the neighbourhood were annoyed and disturbed.”

The accused objected to the relevancy of the complaint. The objections were repelled.

The accused pleaded not guilty, and evidence was led. The magistrate convicted the accused and dismissed them with an admonition. The accused obtained a case for the High Court, putting, inter alia, this question, viz., Is the complaint relevant?

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Ruther-
furd Clark.
Lord Trayner.
Justiciary
Clerk.

No. 3.

Nov. 5, 1891.
Hutton v.
Main.

Argued for the appellants ;—The complaint was irrelevant, because it set forth no statutory offence and no common law offence. For two persons loudly to read or sing or pray on the street was not, at least was not necessarily, any offence, and no facts sufficient to shew that in the special case it amounted to a breach of the peace were libelled.¹ The case was distinguishable from Deakin v. Milne,² where an order by the magistrates was founded on in the complaint.

Argued for the respondent ;—There was a relevant charge of breach of the peace. To use these words was unnecessary, for statement of a nomen juris was unnecessary.* A person might by loud shouting and bawling, to the annoyance of residents in a district, commit a breach of the peace.³

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There is no doubt that people who have the best intentions, and whose sole desire is to do good, may commit a breach of the peace by forming a procession, or even, it may be, by standing upon the street doing nothing further than these appellants are said to have done. And plainly in the Arbroath case² to which we were referred there was a relevant charge. The members of the Salvation Army, in defiance of a proclamation by the magistrates, who in their discretion considered that a continuance of the conduct in which the members of the army engaged was likely to cause a breach of the peace and ought to be stopped, persisted in that conduct and continued their processions. A conviction obtained against certain of them was most properly upheld.

On the other hand, it is equally plain that a prosecutor who libels a breach of the peace is not ordinarily bound to use the words "breach of the peace," if he states facts which amount to that crime.

Now, street-preaching is a familiar thing. Respectable persons gather, sing in order to attract the attention of those near, and thereafter preach to them. It is matter of common knowledge that such things are done without anyone having an idea of these persons committing a breach of the peace. Accordingly it is a delicate matter to charge persons who have so acted as to gather people together to hear the Gospel preached on the street, and such cases require careful libelling. It is just one of the cases in which a mere bald statement that the accused did sing, preach, and pray, whereby a crowd was collected and persons were disturbed is insufficient, indeed utterly inadequate to suggest a breach of the peace. There must be more specification, and it is easy to give more if the acts done were truly in breach of the peace. In this particular case I am not surprised that the prosecutor did not add to what he has said, that a breach of the peace was committed. I am satisfied that if he had done so it would not have made the complaint relevant. The expression "breach of the peace" would not have been more than a summing up of the acts

¹ Marr v. M'Arthur, May 28, 1878, 5 R. (Just. Cases) 38, 4 C. 53; Ritchie v. M'Phee, Oct. 25, 1882, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 9, 5 C. 147.

² Deakin v. Milne, Oct. 27, 1882, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 22, 5 C. 174; Beatty v. Gillbanks, 1882, L. R., 9 Q. B. D. 308.

* The Criminal Procedure Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 35), enacts (sec. 5) that "it shall not be necessary in any indictment to specify by any nomen juris the crime which is charged, but it shall be sufficient that the indictment sets forth facts relevant and sufficient to constitute an indictable crime."

³ Deakin v. Milne, supra; Hendry v. Ferguson, June 13, 1883, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 63, 5 C. 278; Bewglass v. Blair, Feb. 10, 1888, 15 R. (Just. Cases) 45, 1 White, 574.

charged. It is necessary in such a case to set forth the acts said to be done, No. 3.
 and these acts must amount to an offence. Now, the words here, "did loudly read, sing, pray, and preach," do not seem to import more than that these things Nov. 5, 1891.
 were done aloud. Then we come to the words, "did continue to do so for half- Hutton v. Main.
 an-hour, whereby a large crowd was collected," and persons were disturbed.
 These do not at all suggest the gathering of a riotous and disorderly crowd, such that it would have been the duty of the police to disperse it.

As has been remarked in previous cases, such matters require to be dealt with in a reasonable way. What on one day may be quite legitimate may at another time, and under other circumstances, be illegitimate even at the same place.
 As I read the complaint, it does not import that the assembly of the crowd was to the annoyance and disturbance of the lieges.

I think, on these grounds, that this complaint should not have been sent to trial, but ought to have been dismissed as irrelevant.

I am therefore for setting aside the conviction.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think the only question to be determined is whether this was a relevant complaint at common law. I am of opinion that it was not.

LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT set aside the conviction.

BEVERIDGE, SUTHERLAND, & SMITH, S.S.C.—J. CAMPBELL IRONS, S.S.C.—Agents.

MRS MARY GRAHAM OR IRVING AND OTHERS, Appellants.—D.-F. Balfour No. 4.
—Macfarlane.

CHARLES STEUART PHYN (Procurator-Fiscal of Sheriff Court of Dumfries Dec. 14, 1891. and Galloway), Respondent.—Asher—Dundas. Irving v. Phyn.

Fishing—Salmon-fishing—Weekly close time, calculation of—Salmon Fisheries Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 97), sec. 7—Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 123), sec. 24, and Schedule D, bye-law secs. 1 and 2.—The Salmon Fisheries Act, 1862, sec. 7, makes provision for a weekly close time for salmon-fishing, other than by rod and line, "from the hour of six of the clock on Saturday night to the hour of six of the clock on Monday morning," but gives power to the Salmon-Fishery Commissioners to vary the commencement of the period in any salmon-fishery district or part of a district, in so far as they may think reasonable or expedient, provided that such weekly close time shall in no case be less than thirty-six hours. The Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868, sec. 24, enacts that the proprietor or occupier of every fishery at which, inter alia, stake-nets or fly-nets are used shall, in regard to such nets, do all such acts required by any bye-law in force within the district in which such fishery is situated for the due observance of the weekly close time.

Schedule D, bye-law secs. 1 and 2, annexed to the last-mentioned Act (being one of the regulations with respect to the due observance of the weekly close time in, inter alia, the Annan district), provides that fly-nets and stake-nets shall be thrown out of fishing order in a certain way specified so as effectually to prevent the capture or obstruction of salmon.

The occupiers of a fishery in the Solway were charged with a contravention of the 24th section of the Act of 1868 and the above bye-laws, in so far as, during the weekly close time on a particular Saturday, they had failed to have two stake-nets and seven fly-nets thrown out of fishing order in terms of the bye-law. It was proved that at 5.30 on the evening in question the tide was at high water; that at 6 P.M. it was impossible to throw the nets out of fishing order so as to comply with the bye-law; that the earliest hour thereafter at which this could be done was about 8 P.M.; that the nets were then thrown out

No. 4. of fishing order; that this state of the tide occurred once every fourteen days; that when it occurred on a Saturday it would be necessary to throw the nets out of order about 8 A.M. of that day after fishing the previous tide, so that they might be out of fishing order at 6 P.M.; that being thrown out of fishing order at 8 P.M. the nets could at soonest have been and were put in fishing order again at the same state of the tide, i.e., about 11 A.M. on Monday following, and thus were out of fishing order for upwards of thirty-six hours.

Dec. 14, 1891.
Irving v.
Phyn.

Held that the Act of 1862 was unambiguous and imperative, and that therefore the accused must be held to have contravened it.

Observations upon Osborne v. Anderson, Nov. 4, 1887, 15 R. (Just. Cases) 12, 1 White, 497.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Adam.
Ld. M'Laren.
Lord Trayner.
Ld. Wellwood.
Ld. Stormonth
Darling.
Lord Low.
Justiciary
Clerk.

MRS MARY GRAHAM OR IRVING, William Graham Irving, and John Irving, residing in Gretna Parish, Dumfriesshire, tenants of the Loch Salmon-Fishings in the Solway Firth, were charged before the Sheriff-substitute (Campion) at Dumfries, at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Court, upon a complaint which charged them "with having on the evening of Saturday, 13th June 1891, and within or during the weekly close time for the district of the River Annan, first, omitted to have a clear opening of at least four feet in width from top to bottom made and kept free from obstruction in the pouches, traps, or chambers of two stake-nets placed in the Solway Firth, at a part thereof in the parish of Dornock, Dumfriesshire, opposite the farm of Wyllies, in the parish and shire last mentioned, and within the said district of the River Annan; and, second, omitted or failed to have raised and tied to the upper ropes, or lowered and tied to the lower ropes, the pouches, traps, or chambers of seven fly-nets placed in the Solway Firth aforesaid, three of them at that part thereof in the said parish of Dornock opposite the said farm of Wyllies, and the remaining four of said nets at that part of the said firth in the parish of Gretna and said shire opposite the farm of Baurch in the said parish of Gretna, and all within the said district of the River Annan, so as effectually to prevent the capture or obstruction of salmon by said nets," contrary to the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 24, and secs. 1 and 2 of the bye-law, Schedule D, annexed to that Act.*

* The Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 123), sec. 24, enacted,—“The proprietor or, when let, the occupier of every fishery at which stake, weir, or stake-nets, fly-nets, or bag-nets are used, shall, in regard to such nets, do all acts required by any bye-law in force within the district in which such fishery is situated for the due observance of the weekly close time.” Then followed a provision as to penalties.

Sections 1 and 2 of the bye-law, Schedule D (being “regulations with respect to the due observance of the weekly close time” in, inter alia, the Annan district), were as follows:—“(1) That in each and every stake, weir, or stake-net a clear opening of at least four feet in width from top to bottom shall be made and kept free from obstruction in each and every pouch, trap, or chamber of the same. (2) That the pouches, traps, or chambers of each and every fly-net shall be either raised and tied up to the upper ropes of same, or lowered and tied to the lower ropes, so as effectually to prevent the capture or obstruction of salmon.”

The Salmon Fisheries Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 97), sec. 7, enacted,—“The annual close time for every district shall continue for 168 days; and the weekly close time, except for rod and line, shall continue from the hour of six of the clock on Saturday night to the hour of six of the clock on Monday morning; but the Commissioners shall have power, on the application of the district board, or of any two proprietors of fisheries in any district, to vary the period at which the weekly close time shall commence in any district, or any part thereof, in so far as they may think reasonable or expedient, provided that such weekly close time shall in no case be less than thirty-six hours.”

After evidence led, the Sheriff-substitute convicted the accused of the contravention charged in the complaint, and they craved a case, in which the Sheriff-substitute set forth as follows:—"The facts proved in evidence (which were not denied) were, that on the date libelled the tide was at high water about 5.30 P.M.; that this state of the tide occurs about the hour mentioned on a Saturday in each fortnight; that at 6 P.M. on said day the appellants could not fish and open the nets, so as to comply with the provisions of the bye-law to said Act; that the soonest time at which they could fish and put the nets out of fishing order was about eight o'clock of said night, at which time the said nets were opened, as provided by said bye-law; that the earliest time at which they could have been and were put into fishing order on the following Monday morning was about 11 A.M.; that the space of time during which the nets were thus out of fishing order was upwards of thirty-six hours; that in order to have ensured the nets in question not being in fishing order after 6 P.M., when such a state of the tide occurs on a Saturday, they should have been put out of fishing order about 8 A.M. of that day, after fishing the previous tide."

No. 4.

Dec. 14, 1891.
Irving v.
Phyn.

The question of law for the opinion of the High Court was,—“Whether, on the evidence adduced, the appellants were rightly convicted of the contravention charged; or whether, under the circumstances proved, the appellants sufficiently complied with the requirements of the statute in regard to the observance of the weekly close time, and so could not be legally convicted of said contravention?”

The case was heard in October, and continued to be reheard before a full bench.

Argued for the appellants;—The Sheriff-substitute had disregarded the case of Osborne v. Anderson,¹ which was on all-fours with the present case. But assuming that that case was ill decided, (1) looking to the strict letter of the complaint, there was no contravention of sec. 7 of the Act of 1862, but only of sec. 24 of the Act of 1868 and the relative bye-law, and in neither of them was any mention made of a time within which the operation enjoined was to be performed. The prosecution was not one for neglect to perform an operation in connection with the weekly close time, but for violating the close time itself. It was an implied condition that the operations should be performed at such a time as should not interfere with the weekly close time, but there was nothing to shew that they must be performed by 6 P.M., if in point of fact no practical injury resulted, i.e., no fish were caught (as was the case), by prolonging the operation to a later period. But (2) the construction placed upon the Act by the Sheriff-substitute was not reasonable. The laws of nature operated once a fortnight to make it impossible to put the nets out of fishing order during the particular thirty-six hours specified in the statute. It was not reasonable to suppose that when this state of tide occurred, the Legislature meant that the fishermen should keep their nets out of order for fifty-one hours. The state of the tide, which made it impossible for them to comply with the statute, was vis major. The fairest way of construing the statute was to hold that there was sufficient compliance with its terms if an uninterrupted passage was left for the fish once a-week for thirty-six hours.

Argued for the respondent;—The provisions of section 7 of the Act of 1862 were unambiguous and imperative. If the Legislature had intended that there should be a different close time in districts where the tide varied, it would have said so. This was no case of vis major,² or of an occurrence

¹ Osborne v. Anderson, Nov. 4, 1887, 15 R. (Just. Cases) 12.

² Cooper v. Tough, April 22, 1874, 2 Couper, 547; Parr v. Mitchell, Feb. 24, 1890, 2 White, 434.

No. 4.

Dec. 14, 1891.
Irving v.
Phyn.

which could not be foreseen or provided for. The appellants were aware of the state of the tide on the occasion libelled, and deliberately risked being detected in evading the statute. The case of Osborne was badly decided. The judgment was pronounced in face of a strong dissent by Lord Rutherford Clark, and in any case it could not be authoritative in the present case, for it was decided on the ground (1) that there had been a long period of local practice, which the respondents in that case had been following, and (2) that the Court were unwilling in the circumstances to disturb a verdict of acquittal.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—This is an appeal against a judgment pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute of Dumfries and Galloway, by which he convicted the appellant of a contravention of the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868, section 24, and 1 and 2 of the bye-laws annexed to it in Schedule D.

The clause of the Act of Parliament is very clear. It provides that “the proprietor, or, when let, the occupier, of every fishery at which stake, weir, or stake-nets, fly-nets, or bag-nets are used shall, in regard to such nets, do all acts required by any bye-law in force within the district,” and “for the due observance of the weekly close time”; and the bye-laws provide (1) “that in each and every stake, weir, or stake-net a clear opening of at least four feet in width from top to bottom shall be made and kept free from obstruction in each and every pouch, trap, or chamber of the same. (2) That the pouches, traps, or chambers of each and every fly-net shall be either raised and tied up to the upper ropes of same, or lowered and tied to the lower ropes, so as effectually to prevent the capture or obstruction of salmon.”

The weekly close time is provided for by section 7 of the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1862. It provides that the weekly close time shall, except for rod and line, continue from the hour of six o'clock on Saturday night to the hour of six o'clock on Monday morning. Now, the charge against the appellants is that they had contravened these statutes by failing to put their nets out of fishing order at six o'clock on Saturday night in observance of the weekly close time, and that is the offence of which they have been found guilty.

Now, the facts proved as stated in the case are that the nets were put out of fishing order at eight o'clock on Saturday night and not at six o'clock, and that they were not again put into fishing order until eleven o'clock on Monday forenoon. That being so, I think there has been a clear contravention of the statute. The answer that is made by the appellants to this charge is that the state of the tide was such that it was impossible to put the nets out of fishing order at six o'clock, that the soonest time they could put them out of fishing order was about eight o'clock, and that to have them out of fishing order at six o'clock they must have been put out of fishing order about eight in the morning, and so the fishermen would lose a tide. They further say that the fact that they were put into fishing order about eleven on Monday morning shews that the space of time they were out of fishing order was upwards of thirty-six hours.

It is contended that that is an unreasonable construction to put on the statute to insist that the nets should be out of fishing order at the fixed hour of six in the evening, entailing great loss upon the fishermen, and that all that is required is that there should be a weekly close time of thirty-six hours, beginning as near as possible to six o'clock on Saturday evening. The question is whether that is a good answer to the very clear and unambiguous words of the statute. I do not think that the construction of the statutes is doubtful.

The Act of 1862 provides for an annual and weekly close time. The annual close time is to extend to 168 days—no beginning is named, and no end. The weekly close time is much more precise. The Act says it shall continue from six o'clock on Saturday night to six o'clock on Monday morning. I think these words are too clear for construction. How they could be read as meaning any other hour I cannot understand. To come to any other conclusion than that it shall continue from that time is to read into the section words that are not there, such as, "or as near thereto as the tide will permit." It may well be, and I have no doubt it must be, the fact that it often happens that to have the nets out of fishing order at six o'clock on Saturday night they require to be put out of fishing order a tide beforehand. This is not a case of vis major, such as a sudden storm, or a case which could not have been foreseen and provided for, but one of which the occurrence was certain and might easily have been provided for. We must assume that the Legislature had this in view, and notwithstanding decided that they would make no alteration in the close time.

No. 4.

Dec. 14, 1891.

Irving v.
Phyn.

The appellants have founded here very strongly on the case of Osborne v. Anderson. But the facts in that case were very special, and holding as I do that the words of the statute are too clear for construction, I think that this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD M'LAREN.—This case illustrates one of the advantages of the elastic constitution of the Court of Justiciary, which enables us, in cases where there is an apparent conflict of opinion on the construction of a statute, to have the subject reconsidered by a larger number of Judges. I am not satisfied that in previous cases there was a real difference of opinion on the construction of the Salmon Fishing Acts, because the case of Osborne v. Anderson was an appeal against a sentence of absolvitor, and the Court were there considering whether they would interfere with the sentence of the Sheriff-substitute, who held that the respondent had not intentionally infringed the Act of Parliament. In deciding this question the Judges constituting the majority of the Court were, I think, chiefly influenced by the consideration that the question of the proper commencement of the weekly close time was a question calling for the intervention of the Commissioners, and the Sheriff-substitute having held that there was no intention to evade the Act, that the Court ought not to interfere with his judgment of acquittal.

I need hardly say that there is always a strong leaning against interfering with a judgment of acquittal. But the question is now raised as a pure question of construction, and it is argued that in place of the positive words contained in this section enacting a close time, which is to begin at six o'clock, we are to substitute a time of closing depending on the state of the tide. Now, it is perfectly obvious that the possibility of establishing a tidal close time was a consideration which could not have escaped the attention of those who were responsible for the preparation of the Act, and that if the Legislature had intended anything of the kind it would have been so enacted.

The establishment of a tidal close time would not have been an easy matter, because separate tables would have been required for the different rivers and districts, extending over the full period of ordinary variation of the tides, which is about eighteen years. Unless such tables were provided, every fisherman would choose his own time for putting his nets out of fishing order, with the result that there would not have been the period of free run for the fish which

No. 4.
Dec. 14, 1891.
Irving v.
Phyn.

was intended, and that it would have been very difficult to obtain a conviction. Therefore, I do not doubt that what the Legislature intended was to establish a definite number of hours when the nets were to be open and out of fishing order. It follows that in certain states of the tides four tides will be lost to the fishermen instead of three, but this cannot be helped. It is the necessary result of the condition of net-fishing, and of the provisions of the statute.

LORD TRAYNER.—The conviction in this case is of a contravention of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868, section 24, and sections 1 and 2 of bye-law Schedule D annexed to the Act, the charge against the appellants being, to put it shortly, that they had failed to observe the weekly close time. Now, the weekly close time is fixed by the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1862, in these terms—“The weekly close time, except for rod and line, shall continue from the hour of six of the clock on Saturday night to the hour of six of the clock on Monday morning”—and it would not have occurred to me that the Legislature when fixing a close-time could have fixed it in language more absolute or unambiguous than the language of that section. It is said, however, that that language is open to construction, and that in effect it meant, or may mean, not six o'clock on Saturday night to six o'clock on Monday morning, but any thirty-six hours convenient to the tides between Saturday afternoon and Monday forenoon. I cannot put that construction upon the section; the words mean precisely what they say. They do not say that the close time is to extend for thirty-six hours, but for certain specific hours, and if these hours are not observed, then a breach of the statute is committed. The words are precise and unambiguous, and I must hold that the Legislature in using them knew and had in view that in certain districts the tides would vary, but nevertheless provided that the weekly close time was to be everywhere the same. I am the more persuaded that this view is sound by the fact that there is a provision in the statute enabling a person who thinks he is injured by the existing close time to go to the District Commissioners and have the hours changed. As long, however, as it stands, the words of the section are clear and must be obeyed. With regard to the case of Osborne v. Anderson, I am not sure that the Judges who decided that case were of opinion that the section of the Act of 1862 was open to construction, as now contended for by the appellants. I think the Judges there were moved by the special circumstances (1) that there had been a long period of local practice which the respondents in that case had been following, and (2) that they were dealing with a verdict of acquittal, which they thought in the circumstances they were not called upon to disturb. But if that case is to be held as settling (and we were told by the appellants that it had been so regarded) that the section of the Act of 1862 is open to the construction and bears the meaning now contended for by the appellants, I cannot agree with it. I concur in the opinion of Lord Rutherford Clark in that case.

LORD WELLWOOD, LORD STORMONTH DARLING, and LORD LOW concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As your Lordships are agreed upon your judgment, I have no vote, but I may be allowed to express my view, which is in accordance with the opinions expressed by your Lordships. It seems to me that the clause of the statute means that all fishing within the hours of the weekly close time shall be illegal. No words could be more distinct and definite than those used in the statute. Any construction of the Act which would permit a fisherman to stop his fishing when he thought it a suitable time to put his nets out of fishing order would lead to confusion, and to there practically being no close time at all, or at least a much shorter close time than the thirty-six hours required by the Act. For a close time means a free passage throughout for the fish. But if the thirty-six hours are to be such hours as the fishermen may hold to be the most suitable, then one fisherman may put his nets out of fishing order before six on Saturday, and make that an excuse for commencing fishing before six on Monday morning. Another may count his close time from a later hour than six P.M. on Saturday. Thus there would be no fixed range of thirty-six hours of slap, and the intention of the statute would be defeated. I think the Act is quite clearly expressed, and is so unambiguous in its terms that it is not open to construction, and it is, I think, plain that any construction which would sanction nets being in fishing order at any time between the hours prescribed in the statute would in a greater or less degree defeat its plain purpose, which is that the water shall be absolutely free to the fish for thirty-six continuous hours.

No. 4.

Dec. 14, 1891.
Irving v.
Phyn.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Justice-Clerk and Lords Commissioners of Justiciary having considered the case and heard counsel for the parties, find that the appellants were rightly convicted of the contravention charged: Dismiss the appeal: Find no expenses due, and decern."

JOHN CLERK BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—STRATHERN & BLAIR, W.S.—Agents.

WILLIAM BOYCE, Appellant.—Aitken—Wilton.

No. 5.

WILLIAM SHAW (Procurator-Fiscal of Glasgow Police Court), Respondent.
—Lees—A. S. D. Thomson.

Dec. 15, 1891.
Boyce v.
Shaw.

Oppression—Severity of sentence—Right of accused to adjournment of trial—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. c. 53), sec. 11—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), secs. 132 and 135, art. 5.—In an appeal the following statements were made by the appellant: The appellant, a lad of nineteen, was apprehended in the streets of Glasgow shortly after midnight and taken to prison. Next morning he was brought before the magistrate, and asked to plead to a charge of riotous and disorderly behaviour under sec. 135 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, under which section (art. 5) the penalty for conviction of the offence was ten pounds, or alternatively without payment, imprisonment for sixty days. He pleaded not guilty, and, after evidence led, he was convicted, and sentenced by the magistrate to fourteen days' imprisonment. This was his first offence. He appealed under sec. 132 of the Glasgow Police Act, on the grounds (1) that the sentence was oppressively severe, and (2) that the magistrate had failed, in terms of section 11 of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864,* to inform him of his right to an adjournment for the purpose of preparing for his defence.

Held (1) that the sentence was in the discretion of the magistrate, and could not be reviewed by the High Court on a mere statement that it was severe; (2)

* The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. c. 53), sec. 11,—“Any respondent brought before the Court by a warrant of apprehension under the authority of this Act shall be entitled to require a copy of the complaint, and also to require that the hearing shall be adjourned for a period of not less than forty-eight hours; and such requisitions shall be complied with, if made before the examination of any witness on the merits shall have commenced. . . .”

No. 5.

Dec. 15, 1891.
 Boyce v.
 Shaw.

that there was nothing in the case to suggest to the magistrate that it was necessary as a matter of justice to inform the appellant of his right to an adjournment, and that the conviction could not be set aside on the ground that he had not done so.

Observed that while there was no legal obligation on a magistrate to inform an accused of his right to an adjournment for forty-eight hours, there might be circumstances in particular cases which might render it proper that he should do so, and that his not having done so might be a material circumstance in considering whether a conviction should be set aside.

Per Lord Justice-Clerk,—"In the case of a first offence, it would be very advisable" to inform the accused of his right to an adjournment.

HIGH COURT.
 Lord Justice-
 Clerk.
 Lord Adam.
 Lord Kin-
 cairney.
 Justiciary
 Clerk.

THIS was an appeal by William Boyce, machineman, Glasgow, under the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sec. 132, to the Circuit Court of Justiciary, at Glasgow, and certified by Lord Adam to the High Court.

The appeal was against a conviction and sentence of fourteen days' imprisonment pronounced by the Stipendiary Police Magistrate (Gem-mell), upon a complaint at the instance of William Shaw, Procurator-fiscal of Court, charging the appellant and William Semple with having, "contrary to the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sec. 135 (art. 5), thereof, on 10th June 1891, in Wilson Street, Glasgow, been riotous and disorderly in their behaviour by quarrelling and fighting with each other, whereby the lieges were annoyed and disturbed."

The penalty craved was a fine not exceeding £10 each, and, alternatively without payment, imprisonment for a period not exceeding sixty days each, in terms of article 5 of section 135 of the Act of 1866.

The following statements were made by the appellant :—The appellant (who had never been charged with an offence before) was returning home from a neighbour's house, with a man called Semple, shortly after midnight on 9th June, when they were both arrested by two police-officers and lodged in the police-cells. About eleven o'clock on the morning of the 10th they were brought before the magistrate, the charge was read over to them, and they were asked to plead in the usual way. They pleaded not guilty, and, after evidence led, the magistrate convicted them, and pronounced the sentence upon them above set forth, without opportunity afforded to them of being dealt with under the Probation of First Offenders Act, 1887, in the event of the charge being proved against them. The complainer was not prior to the trial informed that he was entitled to have the hearing adjourned for forty-eight hours, of which it was the duty of the magistrate to inform him, and in order that he might prepare for his defence. The sentence was in itself grossly severe. The police-officers were actuated by malice against him.

The reasons for the appeal were, inter alia;—"Third, The magistrate failed in his duty to inform the complainer of his right to an adjournment. Fourth, In any case, the sentence of fourteen days' imprisonment, without the option of a fine, was oppressive, and contrary to natural justice for a first offence of the trivial nature alleged; and the complainer was, in any event, also entitled to be dealt with under the provisions of the Probation of First Offenders Act, 1887, for which his relations or law-agent could have instructed circumstances had he had the opportunity of consulting them."

Argued for the appellant;—Under the 11th section of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864 (quoted p. 13, note), there was an obligation upon the magistrate to inform an accused person of his right to obtain an adjournment in order that he might prepare for his trial.¹ The magistrate's neglect to perform this very reasonable duty invalidated the proceedings. It was said that, as this complaint was not brought under the Act of 1864, its provisions could not be pleaded. But whether a complaint was brought under that Act, or as here under a local Act, the same procedure applied.¹ No. 5.

¹ H.M. Advocate v. Goodall, May 3, 1888, 2 White, p. 1, 15 R. (Just. Cases) 82; Pyper v. Walker, July 10, 1885, 5 Couper, 631, 12 R. (Just. Cases) 47;

Dec. 15, 1891.
Boyce v. Shaw.

(2) The sentence was in the circumstances oppressively severe.²

Argued for the respondent;—The Summary Procedure Act, 1864, did not apply to this case. The case was brought under the Glasgow Police Act, 1866. But assuming that the former Act applied, and that its provisions could be pleaded, the 11th section merely provided that the accused should be entitled to “require” an adjournment. There was thus no obligation whatever laid upon the magistrate by the section to inform the prisoner that he was entitled to this privilege. At most it could only be said that the magistrate had abstained from doing something which he was not required by the statute to do. The case of *Pyper*³ was distinguishable from the present case. There there was a serious charge of theft, and the Court held that the accused ought to have had notice of it. Lastly, the punishment inflicted was a matter for the discretion of the magistrate, and could not be considered by the High Court.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The complainer who raises this appeal is a lad nineteen years of age, and he appeals against the conviction on the ground that he was oppressively treated, as the appeal states, “in being apprehended, charged, and sentenced for the trifling offence alleged, all within a few hours of one and the same day, and that without having the opportunity of advising with his relations and a law-agent, or citing witnesses, and otherwise preparing for his defence.”

Now, the offence is no doubt not of a very serious nature, but it is an offence for which a sentence of imprisonment without the option of a fine, and a sentence in certain cases very much in excess of what was awarded here, may be passed.

It certainly, however, does at first sight strike one as a somewhat strong and severe sentence in the case of a person who has not been in the hands of the police before; but I feel bound to say that the question whether a sentence of fourteen days’ imprisonment is a suitable and proper sentence to be pronounced in a certain case is a matter which is in the discretion of the magistrate, and I do not think that it is for the Appeal Court to judge at all in such a matter, and to decide that such a sentence was oppressive merely because of the character of the offence as stated in the complaint. The Appeal Court does not sit for the review of the severity of sentences. It can only consider whether it was a competent one for the magistrate to pronounce. If a magistrate were to take it into his head always to pronounce the highest sentence within his power in all cases, that would not be a ground for our interference, but it would be a public question suitable to be dealt with by the Crown through the Minister having the duty of advising the Sovereign in matters relating to the royal prerogative. I, however, desire to express no opinion definitely on the matter. I Gardner v. Jones, March 4, 1890, 2 White, 474, 17 R. (Just. Cases) 44; Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. c. 53), sec. 11.

¹ Wilson v. Sherry, June 29, 1887, 14 R. (Just. Cases) 46, 1 White, 410; Gray v. Dewar, July 18, 1889, 2 White, 290; M’Kenzies v. M’Phee, Jan. 28, 1889, 2 White, 188, 16 R. (Just. Cases), 53.

² Stevenson v. Lang, Sept. 7, 1878, 4 Couper, 76.

³ Pyper v. Walker, 5 Couper, 631, 12 R. (Just. Cases) 47.

No. 5.

Dec. 15, 1891.
Boyce v.
Shaw.

only say that, in an isolated case where a magistrate has pronounced what is called a severe sentence, it is not for the Appeal Court to interfere with that sentence on the ground of its severity.

It was said that the trial took place without opportunity afforded to the accused of citing witnesses, but I am afraid that that is just the course of proceeding in every summary case where there is no adjournment asked for.

Every prisoner apprehended by the police over night is brought up for trial next day before the Police Court, unless there is a rule in that Court to adjourn every case if no plea of guilty is tendered, or unless by statute there must be an adjournment.

The appellant here was tried at once without an opportunity being afforded him of communicating with his friends or citing witnesses.

I therefore think the real and crucial question comes to be whether or not the conviction is to be set aside on the ground that the magistrate failed in his duty to inform the appellant of his right to an adjournment.

I am dealing with the case of a person able to take care of himself—a young man of nineteen.

There is no doubt that a person accused is entitled to ask for and obtain an adjournment. Is it the duty of the magistrate in every case to inform a person accused that this is so? I have looked into the matter with great care, and after considering the decisions which have been pronounced in previous cases, I am not prepared to say that in the case of an adult there is any duty upon the magistrate to inform him of his right to an adjournment, although I cannot help saying in passing that in the case of a first offence it would, I think, be very advisable to do so.

Here, however, the only question we have to consider is whether it is a ground for setting aside the conviction that the magistrate did not inform the accused that if he chose he could have an adjournment of forty-eight hours. I have come to be of opinion that that question must be answered in the negative. I therefore move your Lordships to dismiss this appeal.

LORD ADAM.—This case came before me at Glasgow Circuit. I thought then that the appeal was not well founded, but at the request of the appellant, and because I considered it a case of importance, I certified it to the High Court.

The appellant was convicted under the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, particularly section 135, which provides for punishment of persons who had been "riotous and disorderly in their behaviour by quarrelling and fighting with each other whereby the lieges were annoyed and disturbed." He was sentenced to fourteen days' imprisonment without the option of a fine. There is no question here of the competency of the magistrate to inflict the punishment. This appeal is brought under the 132d section of that Act, upon the ground, and, as was admitted, the only competent ground, of legal oppression, and the question we have to consider is, whether the circumstances shew there was oppression.

Now, the facts to be gathered from the complaint seem to be these,—This appellant and another lad were apprehended in the streets of Glasgow after midnight. They were lodged in the police cells for the night, and the next day about eleven o'clock they were brought before the magistrate. The complaint was read over to them, and they were asked to plead in the usual way. They pleaded not guilty, evidence was led, the magistrate convicted them, and sentenced them to fourteen days' imprisonment. Now, so far as I can see, everything was done in the regular manner, but it is said there was oppression because they were not informed that they could have demanded an adjournment for forty-eight hours.

No. 5.

Dec. 15, 1891.
Boyce v.
Shaw.

A question was raised whether the 11th section of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, applies to such a case as the complainers'. It is not material to decide that question, because even if it does, that Act imposes no duty upon the magistrate to inform any prisoner of his right to have an adjournment.

The Act imposes no duty upon the magistrate, but it puts it in the power of the prisoner to require the magistrate to adjourn, and it is his duty to do so if required, but the duty is upon the accused, not upon the magistrate. If there is no legal obligation upon the magistrate to inform the prisoner of his power to ask for an adjournment, the fact that he did not do so cannot be held a reason for setting a conviction aside.

Although, however, there may be no legal obligation on the magistrate to inform the accused of his rights, it may be right and proper in the circumstances of a particular case that he should do so. The character and gravity of the offence, the age of the accused, the nature of the defence, and other circumstances, are what a magistrate might very well consider in exercising his discretion in the matter, and his not having done so may be a very material circumstance in considering whether a conviction should be set aside or not. But I agree with your Lordship in the chair that there is nothing in this case to suggest to the magistrate that as a matter of justice it was necessary to inform the accused of their right to an adjournment. The offence charged was trivial, and the accused was of an age at which he was quite capable of looking after himself.

The only other question raised by this complaint is on account of certain averments that the witnesses upon whose evidence the appellant was convicted were actuated by malice towards him and his companion. If that statement had been made to the magistrate at the trial I have no doubt it would have had weight with him in the question of adjournment, but it is not even said that such a statement was made to the magistrate at the time. I think it is altogether impossible to set aside a conviction obtained after a regularly conducted trial because the accused now come forward and say that if the magistrate had adjourned for forty-eight hours they could have shewn that the witnesses were actuated by malice.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I concur. I do not think that the 11th section of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act imposes on the magistrate any absolute obligation to inform an accused person that he has a right to ask for an adjournment, and therefore I cannot say that the magistrate has in this case violated any statutory duty. I do not, however, say that cases may not arise in which a conviction would be set aside because the magistrate had not given an adjournment or has not informed the accused of his right. In this case where it is said that the accused had never been tried at a Police Court before, I certainly think that it would have been better if his right to demand an adjournment had been explained to him.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

SCOTT & LOGAN, W.S.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 6.

Dec. 15, 1891.
Robertson v.
Malcolm.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Ruther-
furd Clark.
Lord Trayner.
Justiciary
Clerk.

JOHN ROBERTSON, Applicant.—Lees—Hunter.

JOHN MALCOLM (Procurator-Fiscal of Burgh Court of Dumfries), Respondent.—A. J. Young.

Appeal—Conditions of—Payment of fees—38 and 39 Vict. c. 62 (Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875), sec. 3 (1) (2).—The 3d section of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, provides, (1) "The appellant shall not be entitled to have a case stated and delivered to him unless within . . . three days he shall . . . (2) pay the Clerk of Court his fees for preparing the case."

Held that the condition was absolute, and that the Court had no power to dispense with implement of it.¹

ALEXANDER WYLIE, S.S.C.—WHIGHAM & COWAN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 7.

Dec. 15, 1891.
Ross v.
M'Leod.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Ruther-
furd Clark.
Lord Trayner.
Justiciary
Clerk.

ROBERT ROSS, Applicant.—Glegg.

NEIL M'LEOD, Respondent.—Maclaren.

ALEXANDER FRASER (Sheriff-substitute of Inverness), Respondent.—
Maclaren.

Procedure—Statement of case—"Frivolous"—38 and 39 Vict. c. 62 (Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875), sec. 4.—The Court will be slow to interfere with the discretion of the inferior Judge who refuses to state a case on the ground that the application to him to do so is frivolous,* if it appears that the facts of the case raise no question of law.

NEIL MACLEOD was charged at the instance of Robert Ross, a private prosecutor, before the Sheriff-substitute (Fraser) at Portree, with an offence under the "Act for the more effectual preservation of the game in that part of Great Britain called Scotland" (13 Geo. III. c. 54), in respect he had in his possession on a day libelled certain game, he not being a person qualified to kill game or to have game in his possession, and being without leave or orders from any person so qualified to have it in his possession.

The Sheriff-substitute, on 10th November 1891, after evidence led, found the charge not proven. Ross' agent required the Sheriff-substitute to state a case. He refused, because he thought the application was "frivolous," and stated in his certificate of refusal,—"No objection to the relevancy or to the competency or admissibility of evidence was stated or taken at the trial. No documentary evidence was produced or tendered, and no question of law arose."

Ross thereupon presented a note under the 5th section of the statute asking for an order on the "inferior Judge and the said Neil Macleod to shew cause why a case should not be stated in terms of" the statute. In the note it was stated that "at the trial . . . it was proved that" Macleod, "on the day libelled, pointed out to Donald Macdonald, a clerk in the office of the" railway company, on whose premises the game was, "a box . . . which he said was his, and which he directed the clerk to send off by steamer; that later on the same day he returned to the railway office and asked the officials there to hide the said box. The said box, on being opened, was found to contain a number of grouse and partridges. The Sheriff-substitute found that the box not having been ¹ Authorities cited by applicant.—Thom v. Caledonian Railway Co., Nov. 12, 1886, 14 R. (Just. Cases) 5, 1 White, 248, and M'Gregor v. Rose, Nov. 3, 1887, 15 R. (Just. Cases) 10, 1 White, 477.

* 38 and 39 Vict. c. 62, sec. 4,—“It shall be lawful for an inferior Judge to refuse any application made to him under this Act to state and sign a case, should he consider such application to be frivolous.”

proved to have been actually in the hands and physical possession of the accused, the charge was not proven." No. 7.

At the hearing on this note the applicant argued;—The statement in the note must in the meantime be taken pro veritate, and it indicated plainly a question of law, viz., must possession under the statute be actual, or might it be constructive? Such a question had been treated as a question of law.¹ Dec. 15, 1891.
Ross v.
Macleod.

Argued for the respondents;—If the Sheriff-substitute could not state a point of law the application to him was frivolous. Now, his judgment simply found the charge not proven. He now desired to state that this question of constructive possession had never entered into his mind. He found it not proven that there was any connection between Macleod and the box.

LORD TRAYNER—Under the statute the inferior Judge has a discretion whether he shall state or refuse to state a case, and that is a discretion with which this Court should not be forward to interfere. At the same time I should be jealous of the exercise of that discretion in any case where a question of law might arise out of the facts. But the Sheriff-substitute states through his counsel that on the facts which were proved here no question of law arose or could arise.

That being so, I am of opinion that we should not interfere.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT refused the application.

A. B. C. WOOD, W.S.—DUNCAN SMITH & MACLAREN, S.S.C.—Agents.

MARTIN LANGSTON HOWMAN (Procurator-Fiscal for Orkney), Appellant.— No. 8

Lord-Adv. Pearson—Wallace, A.-D.

ALEXANDER ROSS, Respondent.—Watt.

Dec. 15, 1891.
Howman v.
Ross.

Procedure—Alibi—Notice of—Summary procedure.—A person tried before a Court of summary jurisdiction is not required to give notice of a defence of alibi.

ALEXANDER ROSS, master of the steam trawler "North Coast," was tried summarily before Sheriff-substitute Armour at Kirkwall for a contravention of the Herring Fishery Act, 1889, and the amending Act of 1890, by trawling within three miles of low water-mark at a certain place. After the case for the prosecution was closed, in which the witnesses deponed to the offence having taken place at the place libelled, about 5 P.M. on the day libelled, the panel proceeded to call witnesses. On the first of these being sworn the panel intimated that he intended to prove that the "North Coast" left the place libelled at 6 A.M. on the day libelled, and had not since returned to it. HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Ruther-
furd Clark.
Lord Trayner.
Justiciary
Clerk.

The procurator-fiscal objected to this evidence being allowed, in respect it was a defence of alibi, of which no notice had been given.

The panel answered that it was not such a defence of alibi as in any case to require notice or to admit of it, and that, even if it was, notice was not required in a summary proceeding.

The Sheriff-substitute repelled the objection, and admitted the evidence. He afterwards found the charge not proven.

A case was stated at the request of the procurator-fiscal, submitting to ¹ Wood v. Collins, June 2, 1890, 17 R. (Just. Cases) 55, 2 White, 497; Mackenzie v. Lockhart, Oct. 27, 1890, 18 R. (Just. Cases) 1, 2 White, 534; Young v. Jamieson, Jan. 26, 1891, 18 R. (Just. Cases) 20, 2 White, 581.

No. 8. the Court for opinion these questions, viz. :—“(1) Does written notice, or any notice, of an alibi require to be given to a prosecutor prosecuting under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887? (2) In the circumstances stated, was the evidence for the respondent competently admitted without written notice of the defence he was to state having been lodged with the procurator-fiscal?”

Dec. 15, 1891.
Howman v.
Ronn.

The appellant argued ;—(1) There was, it was admitted, no practice requiring notice, and, again, it was true that the statute did not require notice, and that in the Justiciary Court it was required by statute,¹ and in Sheriff and Burgh Courts by Act of Adjournal.² But the same considerations as applied in the former classes of cases³ applied in summary cases, and this High Court had power to regulate procedure in all inferior judicatories. The summary nature of the proceedings made it impossible, it was true, to give long notice, but the panel should give notice at least before the prosecutor's case was closed. (2) The defence here was in truth an alibi, and whenever such a defence was set up as a substantive defence notice of it must be given. [LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Take the case of a man charged with robbing another of his watch in a room in a public-house. The Crown does not examine the keeper of the house, but the panel calls him, and he depones that the panel passed out just before the person robbed came in. Must notice be given of that?] Not if the witness was on the Crown list; for there the Lord Advocate could not say that he was taken by surprise. If he was not on the list, notice was necessary, and the prisoner's protection was the well-known fairness of the Crown in such matters.

Argued for the respondent ;—(1) The appellant by his admissions had made his appeal hopeless. He admitted that there was no practice, no statute, and no Act of Adjournal to require notice; how could he, then, maintain that it was required by law? Besides, it was impossible to give notice, for the proceedings might take place within forty-eight hours of the offence. Besides, of what use would notice be to the prosecutor? It was not proposed to order the panel to give in a list of witnesses. Why then ask him to give notice,—the object of the notice being to give the prosecutor time to test the witnesses who were to be adduced?⁴ It was noticeable that the Act of 1887⁵ in its 71st section, declaring what should be the conditions of summary procedure, did not mention this as one of them. (2) But this was not such an alibi as to require notice. No one was required to give notice of an alibi unless it was of such a character as made it impossible that he could commit the offence.⁶ Now, the panel was at the place libelled on the day libelled, and, till he knew what hour of the day was to be named as the hour of his crime, he had not a defence of alibi to offer.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There is a general latitude allowed to the prosecutor in charges of crime, so that he shall not be too closely tied up as regards time in proving his charge, on the general assumption that it is not of any great consequence on what exact day of the week or hour of the day the act charged was done. Exactitude of time is not generally necessary, unless a special defence applicable to time is raised. For example, in a case of theft the prosecutor may

¹ 20 Geo. II. c. 43 (Heritable Jurisdictions Abolition Act), sec. 41.

² 17th March 1827.

⁴ Alison, ii., p. 48.

³ See Hume, ii., p. 399.

⁵ 50 and 51 Vict. c. 35.

⁶ Alison, ii., p. 625.

take a latitude of three months, and nothing requires to be stated or established in evidence about the minute or even the hour of the theft to justify conviction, unless the accused makes such allegations as necessarily give importance to the question of exact time.

No. 8.

Dec. 15, 1891.

Howman v. Ross.

The prosecutor in a case which is to be tried by a jury is entitled to have notice of a defence of alibi, viz., a defence to this effect,—“At the time you allege I was in such and such a place, I was not there, but at some other place.” In such a case the prosecutor is thus put upon his inquiry as to the exact time when the act charged was committed, and he is not entitled to skip about from one time to another. Take the case, e.g., of the theft of a watch, it is not necessary to prove at what hour of the day this was done, but if the panel says that he was not at the place of the theft at the particular time when it took place, the prosecutor must be exact.

But that is the law on cases tried on indictment, and was applicable to the High Court alone; and when it was necessary to extend that to the Sheriff or Burgh Courts this was done by Act of Adjournal.

Here we are dealing with summary procedure. In the case of trial on indictment the panel is entitled to have notice of witnesses and documents, by having lists of both furnished to him. If upon that notice he finds that he can prove that he was not at the place at the time to which the witnesses or other evidence point as the time of the offence, he then must give notice of his intention to prove that he was not there but at another place.

It is suggested now, that in a case where there is no such privilege, where no such notice is given, where there are no induciae for inquiry by the prosecutor and accused, and where the panel is not entitled to know what evidence is to be led, still, if the panel is going to prove an alibi, he must give notice of his intention.

It is not said that there is any practice to this effect; there is certainly no statute requiring such procedure, and there is nothing of the kind suggested by the institutional writers. We cannot introduce any practice by a decision, and, if we could, we should require to lay down a great deal more, and to require a list of witnesses and of productions to be furnished to the panel.

But a summary prosecution must be conducted in a prompt manner, and many things that are required in more important cases cannot be required in summary procedure.

I have no doubt therefore that the Sheriff-substitute was right in not excluding the evidence here. There is therefore no ground for sustaining this appeal.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—We have to determine a general question, viz., whether a person tried before a Court of summary jurisdiction is required to give notice of a defence of alibi. I therefore disregard the special circumstances of the case.

It is certain that there is such a rule in the Court of Justiciary, but it is as certain that that depends on statute. Again, it is certain that the same rule obtains in prosecution in the Sheriff Court in cases tried there with a jury, but the rule there obtains in virtue of an Act of Adjournal. There is no other law requiring such notice.

In my opinion it follows that for trials in Courts of summary jurisdiction the accused is not bound to give notice of the defence of alibi. I see no such statutory or common law obligation.

No. 4.

Dec. 14, 1891.
Irving v.
Phyn.

was intended, and that it would have been very difficult to obtain a conviction. Therefore, I do not doubt that what the Legislature intended was to establish a definite number of hours when the nets were to be open and out of fishing order. It follows that in certain states of the tides four tides will be lost to the fishermen instead of three, but this cannot be helped. It is the necessary result of the condition of net-fishing, and of the provisions of the statute.

LORD TRAYNER.—The conviction in this case is of a contravention of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868, section 24, and sections 1 and 2 of by-law Schedule D annexed to the Act, the charge against the appellants being, to put it shortly, that they had failed to observe the weekly close time. Now, the weekly close time is fixed by the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1862, in these terms—“The weekly close time, except for rod and line, shall continue from the hour of six of the clock on Saturday night to the hour of six of the clock on Monday morning”—and it would not have occurred to me that the Legislature when fixing a close-time could have fixed it in language more absolute or unambiguous than the language of that section. It is said, however, that that language is open to construction, and that in effect it meant, or may mean, not six o'clock on Saturday night to six o'clock on Monday morning, but any thirty-six hours convenient to the tides between Saturday afternoon and Monday forenoon. I cannot put that construction upon the section; the words mean precisely what they say. They do not say that the close time is to extend for thirty-six hours, but for certain specific hours, and if these hours are not observed, then a breach of the statute is committed. The words are precise and unambiguous, and I must hold that the Legislature in using them knew and had in view that in certain districts the tides would vary, but nevertheless provided that the weekly close time was to be everywhere the same. I am the more persuaded that this view is sound by the fact that there is a provision in the statute enabling a person who thinks he is injured by the existing close time to go to the District Commissioners and have the hours changed. As long, however, as it stands, the words of the section are clear and must be obeyed. With regard to the case of Osborne v. Anderson, I am not sure that the Judges who decided that case were of opinion that the section of the Act of 1862 was open to construction, as now contended for by the appellants. I think the Judges there were moved by the special circumstances (1) that there had been a long period of local practice which the respondents in that case had been following, and (2) that they were dealing with a verdict of acquittal, which they thought in the circumstances they were not called upon to disturb. But if that case is to be held as settling (and we were told by the appellants that it had been so regarded) that the section of the Act of 1862 is open to the construction and bears the meaning now contended for by the appellants, I cannot agree with it. I concur in the opinion of Lord Rutherford Clark in that case.

LORD WELLWOOD, LORD STORMONTH DARLING, and LORD LOW concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As your Lordships are agreed upon your judgment, I have no vote, but I may be allowed to express my view, which is in accordance with the opinions expressed by your Lordships. It seems to me that the clause of the statute means that all fishing within the hours of the weekly close time shall be illegal. No words could be more distinct and the chase, would offend against its provisions. This, the only reasonable interpretation, was the interpretation which had been put on the English and Irish Statute (12 and 13 Vict. c. 92), expressed in the same words, by the English and Irish Judges.¹

No. 9.

Dec. 18, 1891.
Brown v.
Renton.

Argued for the respondent;—It was true that the Scots statute was in the same terms as the English one, but the English and Irish decisions were not binding upon this Court. The words “as aforesaid” in the statute were joined to the words “other animal,” and were obviously meant to refer to the words in the beginning of the section, “whether of domestic or wild nature.”

LORD YOUNG.—This case presents to us exactly the same question as was presented to the Queen’s Bench in the case of Clark v. Hague. The question is in no way different although that case depended on an English, and this depends on a Scots statute, because the two statutes were passed for the same purpose by the same Parliament, and are expressed in the same language. Mr Wallace admitted at the outset of his speech that, if we were to construe the statute in the same way as it was construed in England, he could not maintain the conviction. I am of opinion that we should construe it in the same way as the English Judges did, not only in the case to which I have referred, but in another case in 1863, and as the Irish Judges did in a case in their Courts.

It would not be seemly for us to put a different construction on the language of a statute passed by the same Parliament for the same purpose, the language being identical. The argument against the decision which has been reached is quite intelligible, and I can fancy lawyers arriving at different results on the point, but I am of opinion that it is fitting we should adhere to the interpretation which has been put upon the statute in these decisions.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT quashed the conviction.

JAMES SKINNER, S.S.C.—CROWN AGENT—Agents.

GEORGE ROBERTSON RATTRAY, Complainer.—A. S. D. Thomson.

JOHN WHITE, Respondent.—A. J. Young.

No. 10.

Dec. 18, 1891.
Ratray v.
White.

Review—Suspension—Public-Houses Act Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35).—A person who had been convicted of an offence against the Public Houses Acts by trafficking in spirits without a certificate, brought a suspension of the conviction, alleging that the holder of a licence for the premises in question had executed a trust for creditors, that the licence was in force, that the trustee had put him (the complainer) in charge of the business till a purchaser for it should be obtained, and that he was simply acting as the trustee’s servant. He pleaded that the facts involved no contravention, and that the proceedings were oppressive. The Court refused the suspension, on the ground that by the Public-Houses Act Amendment Act, 1862, the judgment of the magistrate was final on the facts, and that if the magistrate thought the facts warranted a conviction, there was no oppression.

Observed that if the complainer wished to raise the legal question whether the facts proved warranted the charge of contravention he should have asked the magistrate to state a case.

Opinion that if the facts set forth by the complainer had been found as the ¹ See Clark v. Hague, 1859, 2 Ellis & Ellis, 281; Morley v. Greenhalgh, 1863, 3 B. & S. 374; Budge v. Parsons, ibid., p. 379; Coyne v. Brady, 1862, 12 Ir. C. L. Reps. (N. S.) 577.

No. 5.

Dec. 15, 1891.
Boyce v.
Shaw.

that there was nothing in the case to suggest to the magistrate that it was necessary as a matter of justice to inform the appellant of his right to an adjournment, and that the conviction could not be set aside on the ground that he had not done so.

Observed that while there was no legal obligation on a magistrate to inform an accused of his right to an adjournment for forty-eight hours, there might be circumstances in particular cases which might render it proper that he should do so, and that his not having done so might be a material circumstance in considering whether a conviction should be set aside.

Per Lord Justice-Clerk,—"In the case of a first offence, it would be very advisable" to inform the accused of his right to an adjournment.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Adam.
Lord Kin-
cairney.
Justiciary
Clerk.

THIS was an appeal by William Boyce, machineman, Glasgow, under the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sec. 132, to the Circuit Court of Justiciary, at Glasgow, and certified by Lord Adam to the High Court.

The appeal was against a conviction and sentence of fourteen days' imprisonment pronounced by the Stipendiary Police Magistrate (Gem-mell), upon a complaint at the instance of William Shaw, Procurator-fiscal of Court, charging the appellant and William Semple with having, "contrary to the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sec. 135 (art. 5), thereof, on 10th June 1891, in Wilson Street, Glasgow, been riotous and disorderly in their behaviour by quarrelling and fighting with each other, whereby the lieges were annoyed and disturbed."

The penalty craved was a fine not exceeding £10 each, and, alternatively without payment, imprisonment for a period not exceeding sixty days each, in terms of article 5 of section 135 of the Act of 1866.

The following statements were made by the appellant:—The appellant (who had never been charged with an offence before) was returning home from a neighbour's house, with a man called Semple, shortly after midnight on 9th June, when they were both arrested by two police-officers and lodged in the police-cells. About eleven o'clock on the morning of the 10th they were brought before the magistrate, the charge was read over to them, and they were asked to plead in the usual way. They pleaded not guilty, and, after evidence led, the magistrate convicted them, and pronounced the sentence upon them above set forth, without opportunity afforded to them of being dealt with under the Probation of First Offenders Act, 1887, in the event of the charge being proved against them. The complainer was not prior to the trial informed that he was entitled to have the hearing adjourned for forty-eight hours, of which it was the duty of the magistrate to inform him, and in order that he might prepare for his defence. The sentence was in itself grossly severe. The police-officers were actuated by malice against him.

The reasons for the appeal were, inter alia;—"Third, The magistrate failed in his duty to inform the complainer of his right to an adjournment. Fourth, In any case, the sentence of fourteen days' imprisonment, without the option of a fine, was oppressive, and contrary to natural justice for a first offence of the trivial nature alleged; and the complainer was, in any event, also entitled to be dealt with under the provisions of the Probation of First Offenders Act, 1887, for which his relations or law-agent could have instructed circumstances had he had the opportunity of consulting them."

Argued for the appellant;—Under the 11th section of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864 (quoted p. 13, note), there was an obligation upon the magistrate to inform an accused person of his right to obtain an adjournment in order that he might prepare for his trial.¹ The magistrate's neg-

¹ H.M. Advocate v. Goodall, May 3, 1888, 2 White, p. 1, 15 R. (Just. Cases) 82; Pyper v. Walker, July 10, 1885, 5 Couper, 631, 12 R. (Just. Cases) 47;

were nimious and oppressive, and I am of opinion that these are grounds on which this bill of suspension cannot be sustained. It is not open to us to review the sentence of the magistrate on the first of these grounds, such review being expressly excluded by the Public-Houses Amendment Act, 1862, by the terms of which the judgment of the magistrate is made final on the facts. And it follows that we cannot suspend the conviction on the second ground, for if the magistrate thought the facts proved warranted a conviction, the proceedings were neither nimious nor oppressive. The complainer has, I think, unfortunately mistaken the form of his remedy. Under a bill of suspension the objections which can be pleaded against a conviction are those which appear on the face of the proceedings. No such objections appear here, or are said to appear. I fancy the real question which the suspender wished to raise was the legal question whether the facts proved amounted in law to the contravention charged. But this question should have been raised in a case stated by the magistrate. It cannot be raised under a suspension.

I desire, however, to say, to prevent it being supposed that I differ from the observations made by the Court in the decision of the case of Wylie v. Thom, July 4, 1889, 2 White, 269, that if the facts proved before the magistrate amounted to no more than what is stated by the complainer in the present suspension, the conviction now in question was not warranted, and that the complainer should have been acquitted of the charge. In the circumstances of this case I think no expenses should be allowed.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT refused the suspension.

MARCUS J. BROWN, S.S.C.—R. P. STEVENSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

PETER BATCHEN, Complainer.—Salvesen.
ALEXANDER MORRISON (Procurator-Fiscal of Burgh Court at Elgin), Respondent.—C. J. Guthrie.

No. 11.

Jan. 9, 1892.
Batchen v.
Morrison.

Public-Houses Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 20—Illegal trafficking in exciseable liquors—Relevancy.—The Public-Houses Act Amendment Act, 1862, enacts, section 20, that “it shall be lawful for a magistrate upon being satisfied by the personal examination on oath of a credible witness that there is reasonable ground for believing that exciseable liquors are trafficked in” within any “premises not licensed for the sale thereof or by any person not having a licence to sell exciseable liquors in or at such house or premises, or that such liquors are illegally kept for sale or for the purpose of being trafficked in at such house or premises,” to grant warrant to the police to enter such premises, to search for exciseable liquors, “and if the same be found in such house or premises exceeding one gallon, to seize such exciseable liquors, . . . and the person occupying or using the premises where such liquors shall be found, as aforesaid, shall thereby be guilty of an offence. . . .”

Held that to make a relevant charge under section 20 it was not sufficient to set forth that a magistrate, upon being satisfied by the personal examination on oath of a credible witness that there was reasonable ground for believing that exciseable liquors were trafficked in within unlicensed premises occupied by the accused, had granted a warrant to search the premises, and that upon its execution exciseable liquor had been found therein exceeding one gallon, but that it was necessary to set forth in addition that the liquors found were trafficked in or were kept for the purpose of traffic.

No. 5.

Dec. 15, 1891.
 Boyce v.
 Shaw.

only say that, in an isolated case where a magistrate has pronounced what is called a severe sentence, it is not for the Appeal Court to interfere with that sentence on the ground of its severity.

It was said that the trial took place without opportunity afforded to the accused of citing witnesses, but I am afraid that that is just the course of proceeding in every summary case where there is no adjournment asked for.

Every prisoner apprehended by the police over night is brought up for trial next day before the Police Court, unless there is a rule in that Court to adjourn every case if no plea of guilty is tendered, or unless by statute there must be an adjournment.

The appellant here was tried at once without an opportunity being afforded him of communicating with his friends or citing witnesses.

I therefore think the real and crucial question comes to be whether or not the conviction is to be set aside on the ground that the magistrate failed in his duty to inform the appellant of his right to an adjournment.

I am dealing with the case of a person able to take care of himself—a young man of nineteen.

There is no doubt that a person accused is entitled to ask for and obtain an adjournment. Is it the duty of the magistrate in every case to inform a person accused that this is so? I have looked into the matter with great care, and after considering the decisions which have been pronounced in previous cases, I am not prepared to say that in the case of an adult there is any duty upon the magistrate to inform him of his right to an adjournment, although I cannot help saying in passing that in the case of a first offence it would, I think, be very advisable to do so.

Here, however, the only question we have to consider is whether it is a ground for setting aside the conviction that the magistrate did not inform the accused that if he chose he could have an adjournment of forty-eight hours. I have come to be of opinion that that question must be answered in the negative. I therefore move your Lordships to dismiss this appeal.

LORD ADAM.—This case came before me at Glasgow Circuit. I thought then that the appeal was not well founded, but at the request of the appellant, and because I considered it a case of importance, I certified it to the High Court.

The appellant was convicted under the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, particularly section 135, which provides for punishment of persons who had been “riotous and disorderly in their behaviour by quarrelling and fighting with each other whereby the lieges were annoyed and disturbed.” He was sentenced to fourteen days’ imprisonment without the option of a fine. There is no question here of the competency of the magistrate to inflict the punishment. This appeal is brought under the 132d section of that Act, upon the ground, and, as was admitted, the only competent ground, of legal oppression, and the question we have to consider is, whether the circumstances shew there was oppression.

Now, the facts to be gathered from the complaint seem to be these,—This appellant and another lad were apprehended in the streets of Glasgow after midnight. They were lodged in the police cells for the night, and the next day about eleven o’clock they were brought before the magistrate. The complaint was read over to them, and they were asked to plead in the usual way. They pleaded not guilty, evidence was led, the magistrate convicted them, and sentenced them to fourteen days’ imprisonment. Now, so far as I can see, every-proved that the liquor was kept there for an illegal purpose. Section 20 No. 11.

could not be so construed as to simply mean that anyone might be convicted provided he had more than a gallon of liquor in his house, if only he was suspected of selling it. Jan. 9, 1892.
Batchen v.
Morrison.

Argued for respondent;—The terms of section 20 were quite plain, and amounted to this, that if a man had an information sworn against him that there was reasonable ground for believing that he was carrying on an illegal traffic in exciseable liquors, and if a constable with a warrant entered the house and found there more than a gallon of such liquors these facts averred and proved were enough for a conviction.

At advising,—

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The complaint is laid on the 20th section of the Public-Houses Act, 1862. It sets out (1) that the defender had no licence for the sale of exciseable liquors at his dwelling-house; (2) that more than a gallon of such liquors were found in it; and (3) that they were seized by virtue of a warrant issued by a magistrate on being satisfied by the personal examination on oath of a credible witness that there was reasonable ground for believing that exciseable liquors were being trafficked in within the said dwelling-house. On the allegation of these facts it prays that the defender shall be found guilty of an offence under the Act.

If the charge is relevant, it follows that on the facts alleged being proved the magistrate must convict. It would be inadmissible to enter on any other or further inquiry. The accused might shew that he had a licence; that a gallon of liquor was not found on his premises; that no warrant was issued; that no witness was examined on oath, or that the person who was examined was not a credible witness. He would have no other defence. He would not be allowed to prove that he did not traffic in the liquors which he possessed, and that he had no purpose of such traffic. Such an offer of proof would be set aside as impertinent to the inquiry. Nay more, it was conceded by the counsel for the respondent that if the witness on whose oath the warrant was issued appeared at the trial, and deposed that he had made an entire mistake, it would not avail the accused. Perhaps the more logical legal view is that the magistrate would be obliged to reject such evidence as inadmissible.

It follows that a conviction obtained under such a complaint is based on the reasonable belief of one credible witness examined outwith the presence of the accused. It is based on a mere probability, to the exclusion of all inquiry into the truth, and the accused would be convicted though he had the means of proving with certainty that he had no guilty purpose.

A construction of the statute which enables a conviction to be obtained on such grounds as these is repugnant to every principle of justice. I admit that if it be the true construction we must enforce it. We have no choice but to obey. But I think that I am entitled to say that I shall not adopt a construction so manifestly unjust, unless no other is possible.

The purpose of the statute is to require that only licensed persons shall traffic in exciseable liquors, and to put down the traffic in such liquors by unlicensed persons. Trafficking in such liquors by unlicensed persons is an offence. The possession of such liquors by such persons for the purpose of traffic may reasonably be supposed to come within the purview of the statute. But the mere possession of such liquors is not a contravention of the Act. If it were, most of Her Majesty's subjects would be offenders.

No. 11.

Jan. 9, 1892.
Batchen v.
Morrison.

By the 13th section a certain class of premises are subject to the supervision of the police, and these include licensed hotels, inns, and public-houses, and also the premises of grocers and provision-dealers trading in exciseable liquors. But dwelling-houses are not subject to this supervision, nor any other premises than those enumerated in the section to which I have referred. It is obvious that an illegal traffic might be carried on in such premises without any means of detection unless some remedy were provided. In consequence the 20th section provides for the issue of a search warrant applicable to all premises whatever, when there is reasonable ground for believing that an illegal traffic is carried on. The purpose of the search warrant is to enable the authorities to detect an offence which they believe to have been committed. But, unless there be a plain declaration to the contrary, the offence must consist in the actual truth of those facts which, on the issue of the search warrant, were suspected to exist.

The section proceeds to declare that if on the execution of the search warrant more than a gallon of exciseable liquors is found, "the person occupying or using the premises where such liquors shall be found as aforesaid" shall be guilty of an offence. What is this offence? It cannot consist in the mere possession of the liquor. If we look at the intendment of the Act, it must, I think, consist in the possession of the liquor for the purpose of traffic, for its intendment was to put down unlicensed traffic. On a very literal construction of the words, it is possible to hold that it consists in the liquors being found on the execution of the statutory search warrant. But such a construction is not only repugnant to justice and legal principle, but is also, I think, inconsistent with the purpose of the statute. I cannot therefore adopt it. I cannot hold that the Legislature intended such a manifest injustice. Nor in refusing to adopt this construction do I in any way limit the beneficial operation of the statute. For I hold that the statute was not intended to stop illegal traffic which any witness however credible believed to exist, but such illegal traffic as did in fact exist. Some words may be omitted which were necessary to make the statute clear. But they may, I think, be legitimately supplied by construction. I construe the words "where such liquors shall be found as aforesaid" as involving the truth of the fact, on a reasonable belief of which the search warrant was issued. I can hold no complaint to be relevant which does not allege that the liquors which were seized were trafficked in or were kept for the purpose of traffic. The magistrate may proceed on any presumptions which may arise from the seizure, but it must also be open to the accused to prove that he never trafficked in the liquors, and that he did not keep them for the purpose of traffic.

LORD TRAYNER and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT passed the bill, and suspended the conviction and sentence complained of.

ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—GIBSON & PATERSON, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN STEWART PHILLIPS, Appellant.—M'Lennan.
 JAMES AULD (Procurator-Fiscal of Burgh Court of Greenock), Respondent.—Guthrie.

No. 12.

Jan. 9, 1892.
 Phillips v.
 Auld.

Public Health—Public Health Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 101), sec. 26—Possession of fish unfit for human food.—The Public Health Act, 1867, enacts, sec. 26, that a sanitary inspector may “enter any premises to inspect . . . any carcase, meat, . . . fish . . . exposed for sale, or which there is probable cause for believing to be intended for human food, and in case any such carcase, meat, . . . fish . . . appear to him to be unfit for such food, the same may be seized, . . . and the person to whom such carcase, meat, . . . fish . . . belong, or in whose custody the same are found shall be liable to a penalty. . . .”

Held that to make a relevant charge of an offence under the section it was necessary to allege that the carcase, &c. was in fact exposed for sale, or was in fact intended to be used as human food, and that it was not sufficient to allege that there was probable cause for believing it to be intended for human food.

A complaint against a fish-merchant under this section set forth that on a certain day “he had” in his shop “exposed for sale, or which there was probable cause for believing to be intended for human food,” certain fish “which were unfit for human food, which fish were seized . . . by the sanitary inspector . . . whereby” the accused “has become liable to a penalty . . .” The accused was convicted “of the contravention charged.” Held that the complaint was irrelevant, as it did not state that the fish were exposed for sale, or were, in fact, intended for human food.

Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk) that the conviction was bad as a general conviction on an alternative complaint.

JOHN STEWART PHILLIPS, fish-merchant in Greenock, was charged in HIGH COURT. the Sheriff Court there at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of the Lord Justice-Clerk. burgh, acting on behalf of the Local Authority, under the Public Health Lord Rutherford Clark. (Scotland) Act, 1867, with having contravened section 26 of that Act,* Lord Trayner. “in so far as on the 12th day of September 1891 he had, within or near Justiciary Clerk. the shops or premises occupied or used by him at Nos. 32 and 26 Charles Street in Greenock, exposed for sale, or which there was probable cause for believing to be intended for human food, 156 lb. weight or thereby of fish, namely, 102 lb. weight in two boxes at his shop No. 32 Charles Street, and 54 lb. weight on a slab or table within the shop at No. 26 Charles Street, which were unfit for human food; which fish were seized on said date by the sanitary inspector of the burgh of Greenock; whereby the said John Stewart Phillips has become liable, in terms of sections 26th and 105th of said Act, to a penalty not exceeding £10 sterling, and

* The Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, sec. 26, enacts,—“The sanitary inspector may at all reasonable times enter any premises to inspect and examine any carcase, meat, poultry, game, flesh, fish, fruit, or vegetables exposed for sale, or which there is probable cause for believing to be intended for human food, and in case any such carcase, meat, poultry, game, flesh, fish, fruit, or vegetables appear to him to be unfit for such food, the same may be seized without any warrant; and if it appear to the Sheriff or any two Magistrates or Justices that any such carcase, meat, poultry, game, flesh, fish, fruit, or vegetables are unfit for the food of man, he or they shall, by a writing under his or their hand or hands, order the same to be destroyed, or to be so disposed of as to prevent the same being exposed for sale or used for such food; and the person to whom such carcase, meat, poultry, game, flesh, fish, fruit, or vegetables belong, or in whose custody the same are found, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £10 for such carcase, piece of meat or flesh, or for any quantity of fish, poultry, game, fruit, or vegetables, or any refuse thereof, and also to pay all expenses caused by the seizure, detention, or disposal thereof.”

No. 12.

Jan. 9, 1892.
Phillips v.
Auld.

also to pay all expenses caused by the seizure, detention, or disposal of said fish."

The accused stated no objections to relevancy, and pleaded not guilty.

On 21st September 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Black) convicted him of the offence in the following terms:—"In respect of the evidence adduced, finds the said John Stewart Phillips guilty of the contravention charged, and therefore decerns and adjudges him to pay the sum of £1 of penalty."

Phillips obtained a case.

The questions of law were, inter alia,—"(1) Whether a relevant offence under the statute has been libelled? (2) Whether there are alternative charges in the complaint while the conviction is general?"

Argued for the appellant;—(1) There was no relevant charge. Under section 26 of the statute the sanitary inspector had power to seize fish which there was probable cause for believing to be intended for human food. But the Sheriff had concluded that because a seizure was proper the person in whose premises the fish were lying must be liable to a penalty. Something more was required in order to convict than a belief on the part of someone that the fish were intended for human food.¹ (2) The complaint charged more than one offence, while the conviction was general. There was a marked difference between exposing for sale fish unfit for human food and having in one's possession fish which there was probable cause for believing to be intended for human food. The Sheriff should have stated in the conviction on which charge he convicted the appellant.²

Argued for the respondent;—(1) Personal intent on the part of the accused to sell fish unfit for human food was not required to be proved in order to get a conviction; all that was required to be shewn was that he had in his premises fish which there was probable cause for believing were intended for human food.³ The word "such" in the latter part of section 26 of the statute referred to the qualifying words in the first part of the clause. (2) The charge did not contain proper alternative but only different modes of committing the same offence. The offence consisted in the appellant having in his premises the fish described, and it did not matter whether he intended to sell them or not.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case is similar to the case of Batchen (supra, p. 25), already decided by us this morning. The complaint bears that John Stewart Phillips contravened section 26 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, in so far as he had in his shops "exposed for sale, or which there was probable cause for believing to be intended for human food," fish which were unfit for human food. On that complaint the Sheriff-substitute pronounced a general finding of guilty.

One of the questions raised before the Court was whether the conviction was a good one in respect that the charge was alternative, whereas the Sheriff's finding was general. I think there is a great deal to be said for that contention. This is not a case in which there is charged a number of different modes of committing the same offence, but two things are stated in the clause, and sharply distinguished. There might either, on the one hand, be exposed for sale fish unfit for human food, or, on the other hand, there might be possession of fish which were supposed or believed to be intended for human food. That looks like an alternative charge, and if it was necessary for the decision of the case to proceed upon that plea, my inclination would be to hold that the conviction was not a good one.

¹ Kennedy v. Cadenhead, Dec. 24, 1867, 6 Macph. 179, 5 Irvine, 539; Nelson v. M'Phee, Oct. 17, 1889, 17 R. (Just. Cases) 1, 2 White, 307.

² De Banzie v. Peebles, March 16, 1875, 2 R. (Just. Cases) 22, 3 Couper, 89; Arthur v. Peebles, June 1, 1876, 3 R. (Just. Cases) 38, 3 Couper, 300; Murray v. M'Dougall, Feb. 7, 1883, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 42, 5 Couper, 215; Scott v. Alexander, Feb. 27, 1890, 17 R. (Just. Cases) 35, 2 White, 471; opinion of Lord Justice-Clerk in Couper v. Lang, Dec. 12, 1889, 17 R. (Just. Cases) 15, 2 White, 398.

³ Dickson v. Linton, June 1, 1888, 15 R. (Just. Cases) 76, 2 White, 51; opinion of Lord Justice-General Inglis in Kennedy, supra, 6 Macph., p. 183.

No. 12.

Jan. 9, 1892.

Phillips v. Auld.

It is, however, not necessary to go into that, because I think that there is another ground on which the conviction must be quashed, in accordance with the decision already pronounced in the case of Batchen. This is a complaint which, if relevant, amounts to this, that a man may be convicted of a crime, and punished therefor, if there is a probable cause for the belief that he intended to do something. Here also, as in the case of Batchen, seizure accompanied the proceedings. It is plainly one of the objects of the statute that such seizure shall be made by the sanitary inspector, in order not only to preserve evidence, but also to prevent injury to the community by the sale of unwholesome food. Accordingly, the probable cause for believing the fish to be intended for human food is a very good ground for those who are in authority and undertake the responsibility of seizing the fish, but I am not able to hold that any person can be convicted of a crime on evidence that somebody thinks that something is likely to be done, unless the statute makes it absolutely plain that he is to be convicted on such evidence. In the present case, as in the case of Batchen, the prosecutor is only bound to prove, under the second alternative of the complaint, that somebody who is a credible witness believes that the fish were intended for human food. That is not a good charge. Before a person can be convicted under this clause of the statute, it must be proved to the satisfaction of the Court that the fish were in fact exposed or in fact intended for human food. If that had been averred, and relevantly charged in this complaint, it is probable, on the evidence stated, that the magistrate would have convicted, and justly convicted, but as it had not been relevantly averred in the complaint, I think we must hold the conviction to be bad, and quash it.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree in the conclusion at which your Lordship has arrived. Upon the question whether this is an alternative charge or the statement of an alternative modus, I express no opinion.

To the first question, viz, whether there has been libelled here a relevant offence, I think our answer should be "there has not," and that for the reason stated by your Lordship. The words of the complaint are no doubt taken from the 26th section of the Act, but I think the prosecutor has failed to observe that the provisions in the earlier part of the section—where the words are used which he has adopted in the complaint—as to articles of the character described being "exposed for sale," or "which there is probable cause for believing to be intended for human food," refer only to the conditions on which the sanitary inspector may seize the suspected article.

But for anyone to be convicted of an offence under this section of the Act it must be proved, and therefore must first be averred in the charge, that he had

No. 12.

Jan. 9, 1892.
Phillips v.
Auld.

the article in his premises exposed for sale, or that he had it there intended for human food. That is not averred in the complaint before us, and I therefore think the complaint is irrelevant.

THE COURT quashed the conviction.

MILLER & MURRAY, S.S.C.—R. R. SIMPSON & LAWSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 13.

Jan. 9, 1892.
Hutcheon v.
Cadenhead.

ALEXANDER HUTCHEON AND OTHERS, Complainers.—Crabb Watt.
GEORGE CADENHEAD (Procurator-Fiscal of Justice of Peace Court of Aberdeenshire), Respondent.—J. A. Reid.

Public-Houses Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35), sec. 17, and secs. 6, 8, 16—Traffic in liquor in any "place or premises" without certificate—"Place."—The Public-Houses Act, 1862, enacts by sec. 17 that every person trafficking in exciseable liquors "in any place or premises without having obtained a certificate in that behalf" shall be guilty of an offence. A complaint under this section stated that the accused did on a certain date "at a tent in a grass field on the farm of M. traffic in exciseable liquors without a certificate." The accused having been convicted, maintained in a suspension that the complaint was not relevant, because a field was not "a place" capable of being certificated, and therefore sec. 17 of the Act did not apply.

Held (diss. Lord Trayner) that the complaint was relevant, because a particular field was a place for which, under the statute (sec. 6), a special certificate might be granted for a particular occasion, and therefore that sec. 17 applied to the case.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Ruther-
furd Clerk.
Lord Trayner.
Justiciary
Clerk.

ALEXANDER HUTCHEON and three other persons, all residing in Aberdeen, were charged before the Justice of Peace Court of Aberdeenshire at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal with an offence against the Public Houses Act, 1862, sec 17,* in so far as they "did, on the 4th July 1891, at a tent in a grass field on the farm of Meadowhead, parish of Newmachar, Aberdeenshire, occupied by Andrew Mackenzie, farmer, traffic in exciseable liquors, namely, beer and porter, or other exciseable liquors, with William Rae, plater, 2 Yeats Lane, Aberdeen, and James Dempster, boilermaker, 6 Upperkirkgate, Aberdeen, and others to the complainer unknown, without having obtained a certificate in that behalf in terms of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862."

An objection to relevancy—that a field was not a "place" for which a certificate under the Act could be obtained—was repelled. The accused were convicted on evidence. They raised a suspension of the conviction, pleading, inter alia,—(1) The sentence is illegal and unwarrantable, and ought to be suspended, with expenses, in respect—(a) the charge on which it proceeded was irrelevant; (b) no offence under the 17th section could be committed in an open field.

In their statement of facts the complainers stated that they were the "pic-nic committee" of a trade society which was holding a pic-nic at Meadowhead on the day libelled, that the committee had purchased a certain quantity of beer and stout which was sent to the ground and could be obtained by members of the society who were at the pic-nic on their taking a ticket in addition to the pic-nic ticket, and that there was no trafficking in liquor, but only the division of their own property among the members of the society. No. 13;

* The Public-Houses Act Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35), enacts by sec. 17,—“Every person trafficking in any spirits or other exciseable liquors in any place or premises, without having obtained a certificate in that behalf in terms of this Act, shall be guilty of an offence, and on being convicted shall, for each of said offences, forfeit and pay a certain penalty.”

Argued for the complainers;—An open field was not a place or premises which could be certificated. "Place" was to be interpreted as ejusdem generis with premises. "At a tent" was not equivalent to "in a tent," assuming that the pic-nic tent could have been certificated. It had been decided that in order to a conviction under sec. 17, the "place" of the offence must be a place capable of being certificated.¹ A "grass field" or a street was not. If there was any offence at all, it was "hawking" * liquors. That was provided for under sec. 16.†

Argued for the respondent;—A field was a "place." Even if it were held that a particular field was not a sufficient description, the offence was said to be "at a tent" in the field. A field could be certificated for a special occasion such as this pic-nic if the magistrates were applied to and consented.‡ Section 16† did not apply. It applied to hawking in public places, which were admittedly incapable of being certificated.

At advising,—

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—A question of importance was raised by the complainers. They said that on the occasion libelled the liquors were not sold, but were supplied by a club or a society to its members when they were having a pic-nic and games. But that is a question of fact, and we have no jurisdiction to inquire into facts. The magistrate has held that the complainers trafficked in exciseable liquors without a licence, and we cannot review his judgment. If the complainers desired to raise any question of law, they should have applied for a case. They have neglected their opportunity, and we cannot give them any remedy.

¹ Hamilton v. Inglis, May 22, 1879, 6 R. (Just. Cases) 45, 4 C. 244.

* "Hawking" is defined by the 37th section of the Act to "mean and include trafficking in or about the streets, highways, or other places, or in or from any boat or other vessel upon the water."

† Sec. 16.—"Every person hawking spirits or other exciseable liquors shall thereby be guilty of an offence."

‡ Sec. 6.—"On a representation being made to . . . two Justices of Peace of any county . . . by any person holding a certificate for keeping an inn or hotel or public-house, and duly licensed to sell exciseable liquors to be consumed on the premises, that it is intended that any public or special entertainment shall take place therein or in any other place or premises situated within the respective jurisdictions of such . . . Justices during any particular time such . . . Justices . . . may, if he or they shall think fit, and on being satisfied that such inn and hotel or public-house, place or premises, possesses the necessary accommodation, and that the entertainment is for a public or special occasion of a legitimate and proper character . . . grant such person a special permission in writing to keep such inn and hotel or public-house, place, or premises, open and to sell therein on such public or special occasion, and for that purpose only, such exciseable liquors as he may be duly licensed to sell as aforesaid during such time . . . and under such regulations as such . . . Justices of the Peace shall think fit to appoint."

Sec. 8.—"If any person shall be desirous of keeping an inn and hotel, public-house, shop, or premises, for the sale therein of spirits, wines, beer, or other exciseable liquors, whether to be consumed on the premises or not, he shall, previous to the granting to him of a certificate for that purpose, make and duly lodge a certain application."

No. 13.

Jan. 9, 1892.
Hutchinson v.
Caldenhead.

The libel is laid on the 17th section of the Act, and the locus is thus described,—“At a tent in a grass field on the farm of Andrew Mackenzie.” The complainers contend that no offence under that section can be committed in an open grass field. It is matter of serious doubt whether we are bound to read the libel so strictly as to hold that the offence was committed outside the tent. But I do not desire to enter on this question, as I think that the case can be decided on other grounds.

The statute provides that every person who traffics in exciseable liquors in any place or premises without having obtained a certificate in that behalf shall be guilty of an offence. I accept the judgment of the Court in the case of Hamilton, and in accordance with it I hold that “no offence could be committed unless in a place capable of being so certificated.” The question is, whether a certificate cannot be issued for selling liquors on a field of a farm if the magistrate thinks proper to grant it?

Such a certificate would be a special certificate under the 6th section of the Act. It provides that on the representation of any person holding a certificate for keeping an inn and hotel or public-house that it is intended that any public or special entertainment shall take place therein, or in any other place or premises, the magistrate, on being satisfied that such inn and hotel or public-house or place or premises possess the necessary accommodation, may grant such person a special permission to keep such inn and hotel or public-house, place, or premises open and to sell therein. It is argued that the special certificate must be granted in respect of a house or building, and that it cannot be granted for a field.

I confess that I cannot see any sufficient ground for putting so limited a construction on the Act. Its purpose was to enable liquors to be sold by a licensed person on the occasion of a special entertainment. The words are not limited to houses or buildings, but extend to any place or premises within the jurisdiction of the magistrate—that is to say, to any place or premises wherein a special entertainment may take place. According to their natural meaning, they apply to open fields as much as to houses. It is true that the magistrate must be satisfied that the premises possess the necessary accommodation. But that is a direction for his guidance with the view of due provision being made for safety and order. The word “accommodation” does not to my mind imply that there must be buildings and that buildings can be alone certificated. On the contrary, all that is required of the magistrate is that he shall see that such accommodation shall be supplied as is necessary for the place in which the entertainment is to be held. I cannot hold it to be the meaning of the Act that no entertainment can take place in the open air at which it shall be lawful to sell liquors.

But in this case there was a tent in the field, and it was admitted that a certificate could have been granted for the tent. The argument is that the certificate must be so worded as to permit the sale of liquors within the tent, but not outside of it. I see no reason for holding that the certificate must be so limited. It is a certificate granted on the occasion of a special entertainment, and if there must be some building in order to justify the granting of the certificate, I think that it may be granted for the outside as well as the inside of the building.

It is said that this question is decided in favour of the complainers by the case of Hutchinson v. Caldhead. I do not think so. That case related to a sale of liquor on a public street. It may very well be that a magistrate is not entitled to grant a certificate for the sale of liquors on an open street, but that is a very different matter from the granting of a certificate for the sale of liquors in a private place. It is not easy to conceive that an entertainment of the kind contemplated by the Act could be held in an open street. No. 13.

Jan. 9, 1892.
Hutcheon v. Cadenhead.

Again, it is urged that if any offence was committed by the complainers it was the offence of hawking under the 16th section. But hawking is a trade carried on irrespective of trade premises. A hawker is an itinerant trader who brings the goods to his customers wherever they may be. The interpretation clause is appealed to. It is in these terms:—"The word 'hawking' shall mean and include trafficking in or about the streets, highways, or other places, or in or from any boat or other vessel upon the water." I doubt if the language of this clause can be construed apart altogether from the ordinary meaning of the word which it is intended to define, and I am disposed to think that it means nothing more than that a single act of sale shall be held to be hawking, though that word in its ordinary sense signifies a trade or practice. But the sales which fall within the definition are not the less sales irrespective of trade premises. When sales are made in private premises of any kind, taken among other things for the purpose of sale, I do not think that they are hawking within the meaning of the Act.

But whatever may be the true interpretation of the 16th section there is an offence under the 17th if a certificate could be granted for the place in which the sale was made. As I am of opinion such a certificate could legally be granted, I think that the conviction should be sustained.

LORD TRAYNER.—The suspenders were charged in a complaint brought at the instance of the respondent with having on 4th July 1891, "at a tent in a grass field on the farm of Meadowhead," trafficked in exciseable liquors "without having obtained a certificate in that behalf in terms of the Public-Houses (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1862, contrary to section 17" of that Act. The suspenders were convicted of the offence so charged, and they now seek to have the conviction suspended on the ground, among others, that the charge was irrelevant. I think the suspender's contention is right, and that therefore the conviction should be quashed.

The 17th section of the Act, which the suspenders are said to have contravened, enacts that "every person trafficking in any spirits or exciseable liquors in any place or premises without having obtained a certificate on that behalf in terms of this Act" shall be guilty of an offence. This enactment is not presented now, for the first time, for judicial construction or interpretation. It was settled by the case of Hamilton (4 Couper, 244) that trafficking in exciseable liquors "in any place or premises without having a certificate in that behalf," means trafficking in a place or premises capable of being, but which are not, certificated. Now, could any magistrate under the Act before us grant a certificate for selling exciseable liquors "in a grass field"? I think he could not. The two sections of the Act which shew the kind of premises which may be certificated—either by the ordinary or a special certificate—are the 6th and 8th, and the premises there specified—inn and hotel, public-house, shop, &c.—are the premises of some construction, and possessed of some accommodation for the purposes of trafficking in exciseable liquors. In short, the "premises" of the statute are just what are so termed in ordinary popular language, namely, a

No. 13.

Jan. 9, 1892.
Hutcheon v.
Cadenhead.

house or building, or something having the character of a house or building. The form of certificate authorised by the statute supports the same view. The certificate is granted in the case of a hotel or public-house for the sale of exciseable liquors "in the said house, but not elsewhere," and in the case of a licensed grocer he is authorised to "keep premises" for the sale therein of spirits, &c. No other kind of premises can the magistrates licence. But it was said that the 17th section covers more than premises—it prohibits the sale of exciseable liquors "in any place or premises," and it was suggested that this would include a "place" not premises. Even if this were an admissible reading of the word "place," I do not think it would avail the respondent. For read "place" in the widest sense, it must still be a place (according to the decision in Hamilton's case) capable of being certificated, which a grass field is not. This extended reading of the word is, however, in my opinion, not admissible. I think the words in section 17 must be read as meaning the same thing as the same words "place or premises" in section 6, where they plainly mean, and only mean, place or premises of the character and description there given. If I am right thus far in my view of the statute, the offence charged was not a contravention of the 17th section of the Act, having been committed in a place which was not capable of being certificated.

The charge, however, sets forth the locus of the offence as "at a tent in a grass field." Now, I do not mean to say that magistrates cannot licence such a tent. I will assume that they can. But on that assumption the offence, to contravene section 17, must be committed in the tent; that is, within the place or premises capable of being certificated. That is not charged, and the offence here charged is no more relevant than the charge held irrelevant in the case of Hamilton, which was of selling exciseable liquors "at or near the door" of a certain shop which was certainly capable of being certificated. I think the case of Hamilton is conclusive of the present, but I would have reached the same result on the construction of the statute even if that decision had not been pronounced. It is unnecessary, in the view I have taken of the case, to offer any opinion on the question whether the charge made against the suspenders could have been maintained as a relevant charge under the 16th section of the Act.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur with Lord Rutherford Clark, and but for the difference of opinion upon the bench I would not have expressed my views upon the case at further length.

Under section 8 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, places which can be licensed for a distinct period of a year must plainly be places which are buildings, "inn, hotel, public-house, shop, or premises." There is therefore no doubt that no yearly licence can be granted except for a place which is really a building. The Legislature, however, very properly took into consideration the fact that occasions may occur in which it is desirable or convenient that exciseable liquor should be sold in a place other than a building licensed for a year, and different in character from those specified in section 8. So, under section 6 statutory authority is given to the magistrates to grant a licence to a person who already holds a certificate for an inn, &c., for a special entertainment to be held within any "place or premises" situated within their jurisdiction.

Now, the first thing that strikes one is the distinct change in the mode of a public street. It may very well be that a magistrate is not entitled to grant a certificate for the sale of liquors on an open street, but that is a very different matter from the granting of a certificate for the sale of liquors in a private place. It is not easy to conceive that an entertainment of the kind contemplated by the Act could be held in an open street. No. 13.

Jan. 9, 1892.
Hutcheon v.
Cadenhead.

Again, it is urged that if any offence was committed by the complainers it was the offence of hawking under the 16th section. But hawking is a trade carried on irrespective of trade premises. A hawker is an itinerant trader who brings the goods to his customers wherever they may be. The interpretation clause is appealed to. It is in these terms:—"The word 'hawking' shall mean and include trafficking in or about the streets, highways, or other places, or in or from any boat or other vessel upon the water." I doubt if the language of this clause can be construed apart altogether from the ordinary meaning of the word which it is intended to define, and I am disposed to think that it means nothing more than that a single act of sale shall be held to be hawking, though that word in its ordinary sense signifies a trade or practice. But the sales which fall within the definition are not the less sales irrespective of trade premises. When sales are made in private premises of any kind, taken among other things for the purpose of sale, I do not think that they are hawking within the meaning of the Act.

But whatever may be the true interpretation of the 16th section there is an offence under the 17th if a certificate could be granted for the place in which the sale was made. As I am of opinion such a certificate could legally be granted, I think that the conviction should be sustained.

LORD TRAYNER.—The suspenders were charged in a complaint brought at the instance of the respondent with having on 4th July 1891, "at a tent in a grass field on the farm of Meadowhead," trafficked in exciseable liquors "without having obtained a certificate in that behalf in terms of the Public-Houses (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1862, contrary to section 17" of that Act. The suspenders were convicted of the offence so charged, and they now seek to have the conviction suspended on the ground, among others, that the charge was irrelevant. I think the suspender's contention is right, and that therefore the conviction should be quashed.

The 17th section of the Act, which the suspenders are said to have contravened, enacts that "every person trafficking in any spirits or exciseable liquors in any place or premises without having obtained a certificate on that behalf in terms of this Act" shall be guilty of an offence. This enactment is not presented now, for the first time, for judicial construction or interpretation. It was settled by the case of Hamilton (4 Couper, 244) that trafficking in exciseable liquors "in any place or premises without having a certificate in that behalf," means trafficking in a place or premises capable of being, but which are not, certificated. Now, could any magistrate under the Act before us grant a certificate for selling exciseable liquors "in a grass field"? I think he could not. The two sections of the Act which shew the kind of premises which may be certificated—either by the ordinary or a special certificate—are the 6th and 8th, and the premises there specified—inn and hotel, public-house, shop, &c.—are the premises of some construction, and possessed of some accommodation for the purposes of trafficking in exciseable liquors. In short, the "premises" of the statute are just what are so termed in ordinary popular language, namely, a

No. 13.

Jan. 9, 1892.
Hutcheon v.
Cadenhead.

house or building, or something having the character of a house or building. The form of certificate authorised by the statute supports the same view. The certificate is granted in the case of a hotel or public-house for the sale of exciseable liquors "in the said house, but not elsewhere," and in the case of a licensed grocer he is authorised to "keep premises" for the sale therein of spirits, &c. No other kind of premises can the magistrates licence. But it was said that the 17th section covers more than premises—it prohibits the sale of exciseable liquors "in any place or premises," and it was suggested that this would include a "place" not premises. Even if this were an admissible reading of the word "place," I do not think it would avail the respondent. For read "place" in the widest sense, it must still be a place (according to the decision in Hamilton's case) capable of being certificated, which a grass field is not. This extended reading of the word is, however, in my opinion, not admissible. I think the words in section 17 must be read as meaning the same thing as the same words "place or premises" in section 6, where they plainly mean, and only mean, place or premises of the character and description there given. If I am right thus far in my view of the statute, the offence charged was not a contravention of the 17th section of the Act, having been committed in a place which was not capable of being certificated.

The charge, however, sets forth the locus of the offence as "at a tent in a grass field." Now, I do not mean to say that magistrates cannot licence such a tent. I will assume that they can. But on that assumption the offence, to contravene section 17, must be committed in the tent; that is, within the place or premises capable of being certificated. That is not charged, and the offence here charged is no more relevant than the charge held irrelevant in the case of Hamilton, which was of selling exciseable liquors "at or near the door" of a certain shop which was certainly capable of being certificated. I think the case of Hamilton is conclusive of the present, but I would have reached the same result on the construction of the statute even if that decision had not been pronounced. It is unnecessary, in the view I have taken of the case, to offer any opinion on the question whether the charge made against the suspenders could have been maintained as a relevant charge under the 16th section of the Act.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur with Lord Rutherford Clark, and but for the difference of opinion upon the bench I would not have expressed my views upon the case at further length.

Under section 8 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, places which can be licensed for a distinct period of a year must plainly be places which are buildings, "inn, hotel, public-house, shop, or premises." There is therefore no doubt that no yearly licence can be granted except for a place which is really a building. The Legislature, however, very properly took into consideration the fact that occasions may occur in which it is desirable or convenient that exciseable liquor should be sold in a place other than a building licensed for a year, and different in character from those specified in section 8. So, under section 6 statutory authority is given to the magistrates to grant a licence to a person who already holds a certificate for an inn, &c., for a special entertainment to be held within any "place or premises" situated within their jurisdiction.

Now, the first thing that strikes one is the distinct change in the mode of expression. The words "place or premises" are used instead of the words "inn, hotel, public-house, shop, or premises" mentioned in section 8. Now, place is a very broad expression indeed, and if there was no limitation in the statute there would be nothing to prevent a person receiving a licence under section 6 for a table put down in the public street on a particular day. But the statute, for the purpose of preventing the clause being carried out in an extravagant manner, further prescribes that the magistrates must be satisfied that the accommodation provided is satisfactory. I take that as meaning that the accommodation must be suitable in the circumstances of the particular case, the question of suitability being left to the discretion of the magistrate. I have no doubt that the word "place" must be taken in the fullest sense of the term, and that the only restriction upon it is that the magistrates must be satisfied that the place possesses suitable accommodation in the circumstances. That being so, the question in the present case is this, Is a tent in a grass field not just such a place as is contemplated by the Act? I have no doubt that it is. The whole field might be such a place; it is entirely a question of circumstances to be determined by the magistrates according to their good sense and judgment. In most cases a whole field would not be a proper place to be licensed, the licence might be restricted to a spot under a particular tree, or a space specially marked off as suitable for the purpose. But there is in my mind no doubt that under section 6 the magistrates have power to grant a licence whether the place licensed is a house, a tent, or a portion of a field.

Holding that opinion, I do not think I require to deal with section 17 at all. I do not think the case of Hamilton rules the present. That was a case of trafficking in exciseable liquors in a public street, and there is no doubt that a person doing so could not be properly charged under section 17 of the Act. In my opinion this is quite a different kind of case; here the place in question was such a place as the magistrates might in their discretion have licensed, and as no licence was applied for, it was a breach of the statute to sell exciseable liquors in a place not authorised for the sale of such.

I may further remark that this case must be decided entirely irrespective of all questions of facts raised by the complainers. The proper course for parties wishing to appeal to this Court from such a conviction upon the legal decision given by the magistrates on the facts is to obtain a case from the magistrates. Here no such case was applied for, and therefore we cannot deal with any question other than the legal question raised on the complaint itself, and upon that question my opinion is that which I have now expressed.

THE COURT refused the suspension.

WISHART & MACNAUGHTON, W.S.—R. C. GRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

RICHARD HOUGHTON, Appellant.—Wilton.
CHARLES STEUART PHYN, Respondent.—Dundee.

No. 14.

Fishing—Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 123), sec. 23—Occupier of fishing in England with landing place in Scotland.—A Phyn fisherman was convicted of a contravention of the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868.*

Feb. 1, 1892.
Houghton v.
Phyn.

* The Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 123), sec. 23, enacts,—“The proprietor or occupier of any fishery shall within thirty-six hours after the commencement of the annual close time remove and carry

No. 14.

Feb. 1, 1892.
Houghton v.
Phyn.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
General.
Lord Adam.
Ld. M'Laren.
Justiciary
Clerk.

It was proved that while he held a licence to fish in the Solway Firth in English waters his landing place (where his nets were found unsecured) was in Scottish waters of the Firth.

The Court quashed the conviction, holding that, notwithstanding that his landing place was in Scotland, he was not an "occupier" of a Scottish fishery, to which alone the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868, applied.

ON 17th November 1891 Richard Houghton, fisherman, residing at Upper Kenziels, in the parish of Annan, Dumfriesshire, was charged in the Sheriff Court of Dumfries and Galloway at the instance of the prosecutor on behalf of the Annan District Fishery Board, upon a complaint to the following effect, "that he being an occupier of a fishery in the Solway Firth, the landing place of which is Annan Waterfoot, in the parish of Annan aforesaid, and within the limits of the district of the River Annan, did, on 25th September 1891, have two drift or whammel nets in a boat at Annan Waterfoot aforesaid, and did fail within thirty-six hours after the commencement of the annual close time in said district, which commenced on 10th September 1891, to remove from said landing place and grounds adjacent thereto the said drift or whammel nets which had been used or employed by him in taking salmon, and effectually secure the same, so as to prevent their being used in fishing until the end of the close time, contrary to 'The Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868,' section 23, whereby" he was liable to penalties.

The Sheriff-substitute (Campion) convicted the accused of the contravention charged, and, at the latter's request, stated a case on appeal to the High Court.

The Sheriff-substitute stated the following facts as proved in evidence:—"That the accused was the occupier of a fishery in the Solway Firth, within the district of the River Eden, under licence from the Eden Fishery Board, dated 12th February 1891, and produced herewith; * that the landing place of said fishery was at Annan Waterfoot, within the district of the River Annan; that on the date libelled in the complaint the police-constables, on searching the boats at said landing place, found in the accused's trawl boat two drift or whammel nets belonging to him, which had been used by him in taking salmon, and which he had failed to remove and secure so as to prevent their being used in fishing until the end of the close time; and that the close time in the district of the River Annan is from 10th September to 24th February."

The questions of law for the opinion of the High Court were,—"(1) Whether the appellant is an 'occupier' of a fishery within the meaning from such fishery, and from the landing places and grounds adjacent thereto, all boats, oars, nets, engines, and other tackle used or employed by such occupier in taking salmon, and effectually secure the same, so as to prevent their being used in fishing until the end of the close time, with the exception of such boats and oars as may be used for angling, . . . and any proprietor or occupier who neglects to remove and carry away and effectually secure in manner aforesaid any boat, oar, net, engine, or other tackle . . . shall forfeit every engine and thing not removed . . . in compliance with the terms of this section," and suffer a penalty.

* The licence bore that "We, the Board of Conservators appointed for the fishery district of the River Eden, as defined by a certificate of the Board of Trade, dated 6th August 1890, and deposited in the office of the Clerk of the Peace for the county of Cumberland, by virtue of the powers vested in us under the Salmon Fishery Acts, 1861-1873,

"Do hereby license Richard Houghton . . . to fish . . . in any water within the said district in which there is a public . . . right of fishing for salmon."

of the 23d section of 'The Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868'; and (2) Whether, considering the appellant's fishery is in English waters and the landing place in question in Scotland, the appellant could legally be convicted of a contravention of the 23d section of 'The Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868'?"

No. 14.

Feb. 1, 1892.
Houghton v.
Phyn.

Argued for the appellant;—He was not an "occupier" of a Scots fishery, and therefore he was not guilty of an offence under the statute libelled. It mattered not that he landed his fish at a landing place in Scotland.

Argued for the respondent;—The appellant's landing place was in Scotland, and it was there therefore that the offence was committed. If this prosecution had been raised in England, it would have been stated against it that the English Courts could not entertain a prosecution for a quasi criminal offence where the locus delicti was in Scotland.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—I am of opinion that this conviction must be quashed. No one can contravene the section libelled except the "occupier" of a fishery in the sense of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868. The question whether it is a fishery in Scotland is one of fact, and the Sheriff-substitute has found that this fishery is in England.

It is suggested that because the landing place is in Scotland that that is sufficient to found jurisdiction against the appellant.

I cannot, however, follow that argument, because the person who alone can be convicted of the offence is not a person who has a landing place in Scotland, but who is "occupier" of a fishery in Scotland.

On that short ground I think the first question must be answered in the negative.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. This complaint is brought against the appellant for a contravention of the 23d section of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868, which enacts that the "proprietor or occupier of any fishery shall, within thirty-six hours after the commencement of the annual close time, remove and carry from such fishery" all nets, &c.

Now, the first question presented to us is, what is the meaning of the words "such fishery"? Do they mean "any" fishery, or do they mean a fishery within Scotland?

I am of opinion that the latter is the true meaning of the words.

To say that because the landing place is a place where the fisherman usually lives, and is the place where he finishes his day's fishing, that that makes it a "fishery" is quite out of the question.

I have therefore no hesitation in concurring with your Lordship.

LORD M'LAREN concurred.

THE COURT answered the first question in the case in the negative, and reversed the determination of the inferior Judge.

THOMAS M'NAUGHT, S.S.C.—HOPE, MANN, & KIRK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 15.

Feb. 1, 1892.
Rodgers v.
Henderson.

OWEN RODGERS, Complainer.—John Wilson.

WILLIAM HORN HENDERSON (Procurator-Fiscal for Linlithgowshire), Respondent.—Wallace, A.-D.

Suspension—Oppression—Severity of sentence—Jurisdiction of High Court to interfere—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. c. 53), sec. 29.—A person accused of disorderly conduct was after a trial convicted and sentenced by the Sheriff-substitute to sixty days' imprisonment with hard labour. He brought a suspension of the sentence as oppressive, considering that the offence charged was only a breach of the peace and a first offence, stating that the Sheriff-substitute had not given him the option of a fine, but had inflicted the highest penalty which he could competently inflict.

The Court refused the bill, holding that no adequate reason had been stated for interference.

Question whether the Court may suspend a sentence of an inferior Judge on the ground of undue severity.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
General.
Lord Adam.
Ld. M'Laren.
Justiciary
Clerk.

OWEN RODGERS, fireman, Linlithgowshire, and William Sherry, miner, Linlithgow, were charged under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, upon a complaint at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Linlithgowshire, which set forth that they "did, on 29th November 1891, in a field on the farm of Ochiltree Place, Linlithgow parish . . . behave in a disorderly manner, struggle and fight together, annoy and disturb the lieges, and commit a breach of the peace."

On 9th December Rodgers pleaded not guilty, and the Sheriff-substitute (Melville), after evidence led, convicted the accused, and sentenced him to sixty days' imprisonment with hard labour.

Rodgers brought a bill of suspension of the conviction and sentence on the ground that the latter was unduly harsh and oppressive, and ought to be cancelled, or at least restricted to a fine.

Argued for the complainer;—The sentence pronounced was oppressive, considering that the offence charged was only a breach of the peace and that the complainer had never been convicted before. He had not been given the option of a fine, and the term of imprisonment in the sentence was the highest to which the Sheriff-substitute could competently sentence him, having regard to section 29 of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864.

Argued for the respondent;—The Court had no jurisdiction to interfere with a sentence pronounced by the Sheriff in his discretion on the ground merely that it was severe. They could only consider whether the sentence was one which the Sheriff could competently pronounce. The appellant's remedy then was an application to the Secretary for Scotland.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—The question here is whether this sentence is of such severity as to call for interference by way of suspension.

I am of opinion that it is not.

Counsel for the complainer has made a very moderate and brief statement, from which I gather that the offence was of such a nature as to give rise to a question of discretion within pretty wide limits,—the sentence called for might be light or severe according to the view taken by the Judge of the conduct of the persons concerned, and also the circumstances of the district in which the thing occurred.

We are not in the region of reviewing the sentence in the exercise of a discretion as to whether the sentence should be completely fulfilled, or whether it may better be, in whole or in part, remitted. In dealing with a suspension, the question is within narrower limits, and the complainer must found himself on objections to the sentence of a more definite character before we can be justified in quashing it. I have heard no adequate reasons stated for our interference.

No. 15.

Feb. 1, 1899
Rodgers v.
Henderson.

LORD ADAM.—This is the first case I have seen where the suspension of the sentence is limited to the ground of the severity of the sentence.

We have seen cases where this ground is mentioned as a circumstance to be taken along with other facts in order to justify us in suspending the sentence.

It is unnecessary for us to determine here whether we can competently in any case interfere with the discretion of the Judge in awarding punishment, and I reserve my opinion on the point.

Here I agree that there are no grounds for interfering with the Sheriff-substitute's discretion.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree that it is undesirable in any way to prejudice the question, if such should ever arise, as to the jurisdiction of this Court to suspend a conviction on the ground that the sentence is altogether disproportionate to the offence, and not within the reasonable discretion of the Judge who pronounced it.

Here the sentence certainly at first sight appears a sharp one, and upon the statement of facts the charge disclosed to us does not differ from an ordinary breach of the peace. But I agree with your Lordships it cannot be said here that there has been such a misuse of discretion or excess of jurisdiction on the part of the Sheriff-substitute as would entitle us to interfere, nor, indeed, am I prepared to say that the sentence was wrong, because we have no record of the evidence.

THE COURT refused the bill.

ROBERT STEWART, S.S.C.—CROWN AGENT—Agents.

ALEXANDER MACDONALD, Appellant.—Glegg.
MRS CATHERINE ROSS OR LAMONT, Respondent.

No. 16

Feb. 1, 1899
Macdonald
Lamont.

School—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 70—Failure to educate child—Mother prosecuted in absence of father.—By section 70 of the Education Act, 1872, it is provided that "it shall be the duty of every school board to appoint an officer to ascertain and report to the school board what parents resident within the parish or burgh have failed and omitted, and are failing and omitting to perform the duty of providing for their children such elementary education as aforesaid . . . and defaulting parents may be proceeded against by the procurator-fiscal on a certificate from the board stating that the parents have without reasonable excuse failed to discharge that duty."

By section 1, "parent" shall include guardian and any person who is liable to maintain or has the actual custody of any child."

A mother was charged on a complaint brought under the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, with failing to provide efficient elementary education for her child. Her husband, who usually resided in family with her, was, at the date of the complaint, absent from home, having been for six months employed at work at a known address in another county.

Held that, notwithstanding the absence of the husband, the wife was not liable.

No. 16.

Feb. 1, 1892.
Macdonald v.
Lamont.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
General.
Lord Adam.
Ld. McLaren.
Justiciary
Clerk.

MRS CATHERINE ROSS OR LAMONT, wife of William Lamont, and residing at Edrigill, in the parish of Snizort, was charged at the instance of Alexander Macdonald, appointed by and acting for the School Board of that parish in the Sheriff Court of Inverness, Elgin, and Nairn, upon a complaint brought under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and section 70 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872. The complaint set forth that the accused, during the period of not less than one month immediately preceding the 1st day of December 1891, did, without reasonable excuse, fail to discharge the duty of providing efficient elementary education in reading, writing, and arithmetic for her child Maggie Lamont, who was between five and fourteen years of age, as specified in a certificate by the school-board of the parish, whereby she was liable to a penalty.

On the case being called in Court on 10th December the accused stated, and the prosecutor admitted at the bar, that she was a married woman, and that her husband, William Lamont, usually resided in family with her and their children at Edrigill; that he occasionally went to the south in search of employment, and was sometimes absent from home and at work in the south for a few weeks, and sometimes for a few months at a time; that he was at present, and had been since June last, employed at work at Garelochhead in Dumbartonshire, and that during that period Maggie Lamont had been residing in her father's house at Edrigill under her mother's care and guardianship.

The Sheriff-substitute (Fraser) was of opinion that William Lamont, and not the accused, was the proper party to be prosecuted, and he therefore, without calling on the respondent to plead, held the complaint irrelevant, and dismissed it.

The prosecutor obtained a case, in which the Sheriff-substitute set forth the facts above narrated, and stated the question of law,—“Whether, on the facts ascertained, the respondent is liable as the mother to be prosecuted for failing to educate her own and her husband's child while her husband is alive, and has his home and domicile with her at Edrigill, though at present and since the month of June last personally temporarily resident in Dumbartonshire?”

Argued for the appellant;—In the circumstances stated the parent responsible for this failure to educate in terms of the Education Act, 1872, was the mother. She was the “parent” “resident” in the parish in terms of section 70 of that Act, and in “actual custody” of the child within the meaning of the interpretation clause. In short, the policy of the Act was not to consider who was the child's legal guardian, but who was the guilty party and had the custody of the child.

There was no appearance for the respondent.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—The Sheriff-substitute has found as matter of fact that William Lamont, the respondent's husband, usually resides in family with her and their children at Edrigill, and it appears that at present he is engaged in work at Garelochhead, Dumbartonshire, and has been there since the month of June. He had therefore, at the date of the prosecution, a known address, in a neighbouring county.

Now, the question is whether in these circumstances this married woman is to be treated as responsible to a prosecution for failure to educate a child of the married couple.

It is quite plain that the word “parent,” even as defined in the interpretation clause, cannot be stretched this length, that merely because the wife is always resident in the house and the husband is not always resident, therefore she is to be subject to prosecution for failure to educate her child. This would lead to absurd consequences, and therefore we must be cautious in scrutinising the degrees by which the absence of the husband may create this grave responsibility on the part of the wife. The practical result of the success of the present appeal would be that this woman would have to suffer penal consequences; and as, prima facie, it is not the wife but the husband who is liable, I am in no hurry to reach this result.

Now, I cannot say that the facts stated in the case justify us in holding that by occasionally going away from home to obtain work the father has, de facto, renounced his position as head of the house, or devolved his duties upon the mother. I cannot say that merely because he is at a known address in Dumbartonshire he is not the parent who is responsible under the statute. In my opinion, there is nothing in the statute which calls for such a construction, and although I can imagine that in more dubious circumstances practical difficulties may arise in carrying out the Act, I do not think that any difficulty arises here.

LORD ADAM and LORD M'LAREN concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

ALEXANDER MACDONALD, Solicitor, Portree, Agent.

JOHN DUNCAN, Appellant.—D.-F. Balfour—Shaw.
 GEORGE NEILSON (Procurator-Fiscal of Police Court at Glasgow), Respondent.—Lees—A. S. D. Thomson.

No. 17.

Feb. 1, 1892.
 Duncan v.
 Neilson.

Police—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. c. 273), secs. 184, 218, and 219—Job carriage—Using hackney carriages without licence at railway station.—The 184th section of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, enacts,—“Every person who keeps, uses, or lets for hire within the city any stage or hackney carriage . . . without a certificate or licence . . . shall be liable in a penalty.”

Section 218, after defining “stage carriage,” continues,—“The expression ‘hackney carriage’ shall mean every other wheeled carriage, whatever be its form or construction, which shall stand on hire or ply for a passenger for hire within the city, except a carriage let out to hire as a job carriage by the day, month, or other longer period, or a carriage kept by the proprietor within his own premises unyoked, for the purpose of being let out to hire as a job carriage for any shorter period. The expression ‘job carriage’ shall not include any carriage licensed in pursuance of this Act.”

Section 219 enacts,—“Nothing in this Act . . . shall prevent any carriage proprietor from having one or more ‘job carriages,’ not being licensed carriages, at any railway station within the city.”

The manager of a tramway company in Glasgow was charged and convicted of a contravention of section 184, in respect he used and let for hire two unlicensed hackney carriages. It was proved that the company, who had by lease an exclusive right of entry to the Caledonian Railway Station, had on the occasion libelled the two carriages standing and plying for hire without licences at the station; that they were hired by two passengers to carry them to their respective destinations, and that in neither case had the carriages been let out to hire by the day, month, or longer period, and no previous intimation had been sent to the company by the hirers requiring the company to have them awaiting their arrival at the station. The accused maintained that the carriages were used as job carriages, and that under sec. 219 they did not require to have a licence.

Held that the carriages in question were not job carriages, as defined in section 218, and that therefore sec. 219 did not apply.

No. 17.

Feb. 1, 1892.
Duncan v.
Neilson.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
General.
Lord Adam.
Ld. M'Laren.
Justiciary
Clerk.

JOHN DUNCAN, secretary and manager of the Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Company, Limited, and the company itself, were charged at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of the Police Court at Glasgow "with having, contrary to the Glasgow Police Act, 1866," section 184, on 24th November 1891, at the Central Railway Station, Glasgow, kept, used, and let for hire two hackney-carriages without having obtained a certificate or licence from the Magistrates' Committee" for each of the hackney-carriages, which were driven by William Hunter and Philip Crum respectively.

Duncan pleaded not guilty, and, after evidence led, the Magistrate convicted him of the offence charged, and fined him.

Duncan craved a case, in which the Magistrate set forth as follows:—"On the evidence led, I held it proved that on the date libelled the said company had the two carriages libelled (which, in outward appearance, differed from hackney carriages in having no name nor number painted outside, and resembled private carriages), driven respectively by the said William Hunter and Philip Crum, standing and plying for hire at the said railway station; that the appellant had not obtained a licence or certificate for either of said carriages; that both carriages were hired by two passengers arriving by train at said station, to convey, the one to St Enoch Railway Station, and the other to the College, Glasgow; that said passengers were conveyed to their respective destinations, and paid the ordinary hackney carriage fares to the drivers; that in neither case had the carriage been let out to hire by the day, month, or other longer period, and that no previous intimation had been sent by the hirers requesting the company to have the carriages awaiting their arrival at the station.

"On behalf of the appellant it was proved that, under a lease from the Caledonian Railway Company the appellant's company have the exclusive right of entry to the station for their cabs and other vehicles for the use of passengers arriving by the Caledonian Railway Company's trains. An employee of the Tramway Company, and a carriage proprietor, charged with a similar offence, were adduced as witnesses by the appellant to prove that the carriages in question were used as job carriages, and that hitherto it had been the custom to send them to stand for hire within the railway station without challenge; and that they considered they were entitled to do so under provisions of section 219; but I ruled that the section did not authorise or empower them to use unlicensed carriages to ply for general hire, but only to send job carriages to the station on being previously ordered or hired to wait at the station; that were it otherwise, the safeguards prescribed by the Act and the Hackney Carriage Bye-laws would be of no use.

"On the facts held proved as before stated, I held that the two carriages in question were hackney carriages within the meaning of section 218 of said Act, and, being unlicensed, I convicted the appellant of the offence charged, and imposed the nominal penalty of five shillings, with the alternative of a day's imprisonment. The penalty was paid."

The questions of law stated for the opinion of the Court were,—"(2) Were the carriages libelled hackney carriages within the meaning of section 218 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866? (3) Is a carriage proprietor entitled, under section 219 of said Act, to send job carriages to a railway station to stand therein or ply for hire generally; or (4) Is he only entitled to send job carriages to a railway station when specially ordered or hired? (5) Does the fact of the appellant's company by their lease having the exclusive right of entry to the station, give them any other or higher privilege than that given to any other carriage proprietor?" No. 17.

Argued for the appellant;—A construction must be put on section 219 which would add something to section 218. Its true intention was to confer a privilege upon job carriages with regard to railway stations which they did not have in any other place. A job carriage was not necessarily a carriage hired by time. Such a carriage could not stand or ply for hire within the city, but it could do so at any railway station by virtue of section 219. Feb. 1, 1892.
Duncan v.
Neilson.

Argued for the respondent;—This was an attempt to carry on the business of hiring hackney carriages without having a licence. The statute was quite plain. In order to escape liability it was incumbent on the appellant to shew under section 218 that the carriages sent to the station were there for hire for a period of not less than a whole day, or that they had been ordered in advance by someone who hired them for a shorter period than a day. Here there were neither of these elements in the hiring, and accordingly the appellant must be held to have contravened the statute.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—It is contended on behalf of the defenders in this prosecution that the carriages used by them on the occasion libelled were "job carriages" within the meaning of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866. Now, when the Dean of Faculty was examining the statute he was constrained to admit that the definition of "job carriage," upon which he relied, was the extremely comprehensive one that a job carriage should not "include any carriage licensed in pursuance of this Act." It appears to me that that construction is untenable. The practical effect of it would be to render licences entirely optional for the very large class of carriages which ply for hire at railway stations.

It is true that for their own interest, and for the convenience of their traffic, the railway companies, generally speaking, stand on their right to select the cab proprietors whom they are going to admit within their station precincts. But this Act of Parliament does not proceed upon the basis of any such selection, and would equally apply to the case of a railway station where there is free admittance for all carriage owners to go and compete for fares. It would certainly be a very extreme result if the Court were compelled to conclude in favour of that construction, because in one of the most important classes of traffic, and perhaps the one in which such regulation seems to be most needed, it would render licences optional, and by consequence would render the whole enactments on that behalf purely illusory.

But it seems to me that we are not compelled by the statute to arrive at any such conclusion. I think that section 218 does contain a sufficient explanation of what was meant by a "job carriage," without giving to that expression so absolutely comprehensive a sense as the defenders have assigned to it.

In the passage from section 218, quoted in the case, two classes of carriages are dealt with as falling within the exception to hackney carriages. The first case is that of a carriage "let out to hire as a job carriage by the day, month, or other longer period."

In that class the element of time comes very sharply forward. That is the class of yoked carriages which may be found in the street, and in possible competition with others. The other case is that of a carriage kept by the proprietor in his own premises, unyoked, for the purpose of "being let out on hire as a job carriage for any shorter period" than a day.

No. 17.

Feb. 1, 1892.
Duncan v.
Neilson.

It seems to me that these passages afford a sufficient explanation of what is meant by "job carriage" in the sense of the Act. If the carriage is yoked it must be a carriage that offers itself for hire for a day, month, or longer period; but it may be unyoked, and then it is permitted to be without a licence, if the owner waits and finds that someone comes for his carriage unyoked, and then takes it for hire for a shorter period than a day.

The result, I think, then is that in the kind of case with which the Court has to deal, viz., the case of a yoked carriage at the railway station, it can only escape the obligation to have a licence if its terms are that it does not take hire for a shorter period than a day.

The conclusion I have come to is that, inasmuch as these carriages were not already hired for the day or longer period, and were not offering themselves for a day or longer period, therefore they are within the prohibitive clause, and accordingly this conviction is right.

This conclusion seems to me to be entirely consistent with the convenience of all the persons who are instanced by the learned Dean.

Persons who make an arrangement beforehand to hire a carriage to meet them at the station for the day are quite within the section, because the carriage which meets them is hired for a day, and does not require to be licensed, and under section 218 it is quite entitled to its place at the railway station. Being already hired it is not standing or plying for hire.

I think also that a carriage which is not under a previous engagement may under this section lawfully get admittance to the railway station if it offers itself for hire there on the footing that it shall take engagement for a day, but not for a shorter period. That is the case of a yoked carriage which is at the station, and forms an exception to the general prohibition against carriages standing for hire without a licence.

I am of opinion that the case before the Court was a clear contravention of the statute, and that the judgment appealed against was right.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I find that the definition of "hackney carriage" includes carriages of every construction, with certain exceptions. The general definition, apart from the exceptions, would clearly include a carriage standing for hire within an owner's yard, and therefore also at a railway station. But the exception includes two cases, viz., vehicles hired for a day or longer period, and vehicles hired at a stable standing unyoked at the time at which they are hired.

I agree that the case does not fall within either of the exceptions. In order to avoid prosecution the appellants must shew either that the vehicles were only at the station for hire for a period of not less than a whole day, or that they had been ordered in advance by someone, and in that case it does not seem to us to be material whether the order is by time or for a journey. What the omnibus company is seeking to do is to carry on the business of hiring hackney carriages without having a licence.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, affirmed the determination of the inferior Judge, and decerned.

MILLAR, ROBSON, & Co., S.S.C.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

GEORGE SHARP, Appellant.—Salvesen.
GEORGE TODD, Respondent.—R. L. Orr.

No. 18.

Feb. 2, 1892.
Sharp v. Todd.

Summary prosecution—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104), sec. 172—Conviction—Suspension.—In a prosecution under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, for a contravention of a provision of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, entailing a penalty, the Sheriff, without expressly convicting the accused of the offence charged, gave decree for a certain sum of penalty, and granted warrant for arrestment and poiding. The Court sustained an appeal, on the ground that there was no conviction.

GEORGE SHARP, shipmaster, Aberdeen, was charged in a complaint at the instance of George Todd, fireman, Aberdeen, with concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal, that he did "on 12th September 1891, in Aberdeen, upon payment of the wages due to the complainer, or on 17th September 1891, in Aberdeen, upon the discharge of the complainer, a fireman on board the steamship 'Spray' of Aberdeen, of which the said George Sharp is master, fail to sign and give to the complainer a certificate of his discharge in the form sanctioned by the Board of Trade, specifying the period of his service and the time and place of his discharge, contrary to 'The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854,' particularly section 172 thereof,* whereby he has rendered himself liable to a penalty of not exceeding £10 sterling, together with the expenses of prosecution and conviction, as provided by section 531 of said Act."

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-General.
Lord Adam.
Ld. M'Laren.
Justiciary Clerk.

On 17th November 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Grierson) pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Sheriff-substitute, having heard the agents for the parties and considered the proof adduced, decerns against the defender for payment to the complainer, George Todd, of the sum of 10s. of penalty and £1, 17s. 6d. of expenses, and grants warrant for arrestment and poiding in default of payment, such arrestment and poiding to be carried into effect by sheriff-officers in the same manner as in cases arising under the ordinary jurisdiction of the Sheriff."

Sharp took a case.

Argued, inter alia, for the appellant;—(1) Before giving decree, as the Sheriff had done here, for payment of a penalty under a complaint in this form, the defender ought to have been found guilty of the charge. The statutory form was to be found in schedule K, under the 18th section of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864 [both quoted infra by the Lord Justice-General]. The omission to use that form was fatal to the conviction. (2) This was a general conviction, proceeding upon an alternative charge. It could not therefore stand.¹

Further objections were pleaded, but it is unnecessary to state the argument regarding these.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The charge was not really alternative. There was a variation in the modus, but nothing further.² The case was

* The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 172, enacted,—“Upon the discharge of any seaman, or upon payment of his wages, the master shall sign and give him a certificate of his discharge in a form sanctioned by the Board of Trade, specifying the period of his service and the time and place of his discharge, and if any master fails to sign and give to any such seaman such certificate of discharge he shall for each such offence incur a penalty not exceeding £10.”

¹ Bell v. M'Phee, July 18, 1883, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 78; De Banzie v. Peebles, March 16, 1875, 2 R. (Just. Cases) 22.

² Bell v. M'Phee, July 18, 1883, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 78; Murray v. M'Dougall, Feb. 7, 1883, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 42; O'Neil v. Campbell, July 18, 1883, 10 R. 76; Maxwell v. Marsland, Jan. 28, 1889, 16 R. (Just. Cases) 48.

No. 18. treated by the Sheriff-substitute as a civil suit. The test whether it was civil or criminal depended upon whether imprisonment was part of the punishment. Where, as here, it was only in execution that imprisonment was permissible, the action was treated as a civil one, and the penalty was regarded in the light of damages.¹ (2) The variation in the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute was not material.

Feb. 2, 1892.
Sharp v. Todd.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—I am of opinion that this decree cannot stand. The complaint alleges a contravention of section 172 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and it is important to observe the terms in which the section penalises a contravention. They are these,—“ . . . If any master fails to sign and give to any such seaman such certificate of discharge he shall for each such offence incur a penalty not exceeding ten pounds.”

The complaint quite properly takes the same view of the legal qualities and nature of the contravention, because it craves the Judge to “convict the said George Sharp of the said contravention, and to adjudge him to suffer the penalty provided by the said Act.” Now the first objection that is taken raises the important question whether on a complaint so framed and proceeding upon such a section, it is competent for a Judge, in the exercise of summary jurisdiction, neither to convict nor to assoilzie, but passing over the question whether an offence has or has not been committed, to decern the respondent in the complaint to pay a sum of money.

I am of opinion that that is quite incompetent. In our law, before the Summary Procedure Act, wherever a case had gone to trial, the grounds of the conviction required to be precisely stated, for it was held that the Judge must set out how the conviction was obtained, whether upon evidence or upon a confession, and that it would not do to mix together confession and evidence and arrive at a composite conclusion not articulately stated. I mention this to shew in what a high degree the conviction as distinguished from the sentence of punishment is an important part of the proceedings, and I believe that in your Lordships' experience, which is in these matters much greater than mine, no such omission as we have here has ever occurred before.

But I do not require to go back to the former state of the law, because the Summary Procedure Act of 1864 makes as it were a fresh start upon this matter, and speaks with no ambiguous voice. It is admitted that these proceedings took place, and necessarily took place, under the Act of 1864, which provides a series of forms for judgments appropriate to particular cases. Schedule K contains these forms, and No. 6 is the particular form of judgment suitable to the present case. This schedule is introduced into operation by section 18 of the Act, in these words,—“The sentence of the Court may be in one or other of the forms contained in the schedule K to this Act annexed, or as nearly as may be in such form, according to the nature and circumstances of the complaint, namely,” and then it goes through the cases dealt with in the schedule. Now, it is quite true that these words are directory. I see that cases have occurred in which there were deviations from these forms which were not held to invalidate the sentence,—these deviations being held to be warranted by the words “or as nearly as may be in such form, according to the nature and circumstances of the complaint.”

¹ Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, sec. 28; Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, secs. 524 and 538.

The scope of these deviations are clearly set forth in previous decisions where it is laid down that the Court is entitled according to the circumstances to make the necessary, but not more than the necessary, variation where it is impossible literally to comply with the words of the form. But we have not here to deal with a case of variation necessary to adapt this judgment to the circumstances of the case. The variation here is to omit what according to the old law and practice, and according to the statute law now in existence, is treated in each and every case as being the first and most essential part of the judgment, and it is accordingly anxiously and laboriously repeated in each example in the schedule. "The Justices (or Justice or Sheriff or magistrate) in respect of the judicial confession of the said J K (or of the evidence adduced) convict the said J K of the contravention (or offence) charged, and therefore adjudge him to forfeit and pay," and so on—such is the invariable style. Therefore it appears to me that the Act of 1864 is violated, because the plain implication from its laborious repetition of this essential part of the judgment is that that is a part which no one would think of omitting. If there is anything special in this case, I should say it was a clamant call for specification of the offence of which the accused was convicted.

No. 18.

Feb. 2, 1892.
Sharp v. Todd.

In this complaint the prosecutor has charged two alternative offences. It is manifest that there is a great deal to be said against the validity of the first alternative, both as matter of relevancy and on the proved facts of the case. Where there are two alternatives in a complaint, one of which is bad, it is obvious that the accused has a substantial interest to be told on which alternative the conviction proceeds. Here we do not know whether the Judge considered the contravention proved at all or not, or if proved, whether he considered it proved as regarded one alternative or as regarded the other.

It appears to me that this is a case of high importance affecting a general question, and that our judgment may have the effect of calling the attention of Judges of summary jurisdiction to the necessity of articulately stating the conviction upon which alone they are warranted in proceeding to sentence, and that they are not entitled to omit this essential part of the judgment.

LORD ADAM.—Two objections are stated to the Sheriff's interlocutor in this case—first, that it contains no conviction in terms of the prayer of the complaint, and second, that in its terms it is a general conviction, while the complaint is alternative.

I agree with your Lordships that the conviction must be quashed, or rather, I should say, that the judgment of the Sheriff cannot stand.

This complaint bears to be under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, and section 18 of that Act and relative schedule provide examples of findings in complaints under that Act. All these examples provide that there shall be a finding expressly convicting or acquitting the accused.

I think it is idle to say that this is a matter of slight importance, the provisions of the Summary Procedure Act of 1864, under which this complaint bears to proceed, not having been fulfilled. I think the judgment must be set aside. The imposing of the penalty is the consequence of the conviction, and if there is no conviction there can be no imposition of a penalty. I may say that this is the first case in which I have seen a penalty decerned for without a conviction.

LORD M'LAREN.—I think it is important in considering what is necessary to

No. 18.

Feb. 2, 1892.
Sharp v. Todd.

the substance of the conviction that we should clearly distinguish between those proceedings which are carried on before a Sheriff or magistrate without a jury and those in which the conviction is the result of an investigation by a Judge and jury. In the latter case, if the prisoner pleads guilty, he is sentenced on his own confession, and there is no conviction or finding that the party is guilty. But if in the course of the trial the prisoner tenders a plea, he is found guilty in respect of his confession, or failing that on the evidence. In summary convictions, where the magistrate performs the duty of judge and jury, it is necessary before coming to the operative part of the judgment awarding sentence that it should be stated whether the accused is convicted on his confession or upon evidence; and above all, it must be stated that he is convicted of some offence.

In the present case there is no conviction to support the decerniture. I agree with your Lordship that this is a deviation from the statute which affects the substance of the decree, because on a strict consideration of the decree it may possibly have proceeded upon some other view than that an offence had been committed.

I was reading yesterday the judgment of the Lord Justice-Clerk in the recent Clyde collision case (Parker v. Barrie, 16 R. (Just. Cases) 5), and his Lordship there makes reference to a remark of mine in a previous case to this effect. I said that notwithstanding the provision of the forms of indictments in the recent statute, an indictment ought to set forth that something which we could recognise as a crime had been committed. The Lord Justice-Clerk says that if that had been the view of the Court he would have accepted it, however contrary to his impressions and convictions. But as it rested only on my authority, he had no hesitation in disregarding it. I do not find that his Lordship's opinion to that effect was concurred in by other Judges, but I must at least assume that it is not clear that an indictment must necessarily disclose a crime. I am glad to hear from your Lordships that a conviction must shew that a crime has been committed, because if it were possible that a sentence could follow on an indictment which did not state a crime, and with a conviction which did not state that the law had been contravened, I should begin to doubt whether I was living in a free country.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, reverse the determination of the inferior Judge, and decern: Find appellant entitled to expenses, which modify to seven guineas."

BOYD, JAMESON, & KELLY, W.S.—WM. OFFICER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 19.

Feb. 16, 1892.
Walker v.
Lamb.WILLIAM WALKER, Appellant.—Asher—Hunter.ROBERT LAMB (Procurator-Fiscal at Aberdeen), Respondent.—Ura.

Police—Public Health—The Aberdeen Police and Water-Works Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. cccii.), secs. 140-145—Statute—Construction.—A person was convicted of a contravention of section 140* of the Aberdeen Police Act,

* The Aberdeen Police and Water-Works Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. cccii.), sec. 140, enacted,—“Every person who permits to exist or remain in or upon any land, building, or place, open, covered, or enclosed, and owned or occupied by him or under his control within the limits of this Act, any pool, watercourse, ditch, gutter, drain, privy, water-closet, urinal, cesspool, or ashpit, so foul as to be injurious to health or offensive to the occupiers of any adjoining premises, or who keeps any animal in or upon any such land, building, or place so as to be injurious to health, or offensive to such occupiers, or who permits to 1862, upon a complaint which set forth that he permitted to remain on a piece of land occupied by him in Aberdeen a large quantity of paraffin, "which was injurious to health and offensive to the occupiers of premises adjoining." It was proved that the paraffin was offensive and injurious to the health of his neighbours. No. 19.

Feb. 16, 1892.
Walker v. Lamb.

Held that the words "any matter or thing whatever injurious to health or offensive to" the occupiers of adjoining premises were to be read as meaning any matter or thing ejusdem generis with those specified, and did not apply to goods stored for commercial purposes, although they might be injurious to health and offensive to the neighbours, and conviction quashed.

ON 29th September 1891 William Walker, grocer, Gallowgate, Aberdeen, was charged upon a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Court, which set forth that he did, "during the period between 26th August 1891 and 28th September 1891, permit to remain in or upon an enclosed garden or piece of land occupied by him, and situated at the back of premises, No. 25 Constitution Street, Aberdeen, a large quantity of paraffin, which was injurious to health and offensive to the occupiers of premises adjoining, contrary to section 140 of the Aberdeen Police and Water-Works Act, 1862," "and that he is liable to a penalty." HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Ld. Wellwood.
Ld. Stormonth Darling.
Justiciary Clerk.

The accused objected to the relevancy of the complaint, in respect that the charge libelled did not constitute an offence under the section libelled.

The magistrate (M'Kenzie) repelled the objection, and the accused having pleaded not guilty and evidence having been led, the magistrate convicted him of the contravention charged, and fined him, holding "that the large quantity of paraffin stored in the garden or piece of ground was both injurious to health and offensive to the occupiers of premises adjoining within the meaning of the section."

Walker appealed upon a case stated by the magistrate, in which the following facts were set out:—"It was proved that an enclosed garden or piece of land, situated at the back of No. 25 Constitution Street, formerly part of the garden belonging to that house, had been let to the appellant for the purpose of, and was occupied by him, and used as a store for paraffin, and that at the first date mentioned in the complaint, viz., 26th August 1891, about 1200 barrels, each containing 40 gallons of paraffin, had been stored there, which had been reduced to about 900 barrels at the second date mentioned in the complaint, viz., 28th September 1891; and that the garden or piece of land was open, and in no way covered in. The shortest distance between the barrels and dwelling-houses was about 20 feet; that it was proved by a number of the occupiers of adjoining properties that the smell arising from the paraffin was noxious and nauseous, and very offensive to them; that some of them, who were in perfect health before the paraffin had been stored there, had since suffered from headaches, sickness, and want of appetite; and that they complained verbally and exist or remain in or upon any such land, building, or place any accumulation of manure, or any matter or thing whatever injurious to health or offensive to such occupiers, shall, for every such offence, be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings."

Section 145 enacted,—“Every person who has or keeps or suffers to be kept within any house . . . or other place any dog . . . which shall be a nuisance or annoyance to any of the inhabitants in the neighbourhood, and does not prevent the continuance of such nuisance or annoyance by removing such dog or other animal or otherwise, within such time as the magistrate shall determine, shall be liable in a penalty.”

No. 19.

Feb. 16, 1892.
Walker v.
Lamb.

in writing to the sanitary inspector of the city, who requested the appellant to remove the cause of complaint, but that he had failed to do so.

"It was established by medical evidence that the symptoms above described were caused by the offensive odour of the paraffin, and that the continued inhalation of air so impregnated with paraffin was undoubtedly injurious to health; that paraffin was poisonous, but that very small quantities would not be injurious to health."

The questions of law for the opinion of the High Court were,—"(1) Whether the said complaint is relevant? (2) On the facts proved, was the appellant guilty of the offence charged?"

Argued for the appellant;—There was no contravention of the 140th section of the Aberdeen local Act, and further that section could not be founded on to support a conviction of the offence libelled. It was said that the storing of paraffin was "a matter or thing injurious to health" in the sense of the section. But the section, in the earlier part of it, was directed against certain specified offences, such as keeping drains, animals, and heaps of manure in an uncleanly state, and the words "matter or thing," in the later part, must, according to a familiar rule of construction,¹ be taken to refer to things ejusdem generis with the offences already particularly specified. If that was so, then the words did not include the storing of paraffin, because it was not said that it was stored in an uncleanly way. Indeed, nothing manufactured or used in connection with trade could be brought into the Act. The complaint for such an offence as this ought to have been framed under section 16 of the Public Health Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 101), and following sections.

Argued for the respondent;—On a sound reading of the 140th section of the statute, it referred to whatever was brought on to ground situated near a dwelling-house of an offensive nature or injurious to the health of the neighbours. It was not disputed that the paraffin was both offensive and injurious to health.

At advising, the opinion of the Court was delivered by LORD STORMONTH DARLING.—We must assume, on the facts presented to us, that the storing of from 900 to 1200 barrels of paraffin in the back-garden in question was not only offensive to the neighbours but injurious to health, and if so, it would be strange, after so much sanitary legislation, if there were no statutory remedy. But the question is whether the complaint discloses an offence under section 140 of the Aberdeen Police Act of 1862. I am of opinion that it does not.

The section is directed against any person who "permits to exist or remain" in any place within the burgh of Aberdeen certain things (such as drains, privies, cesspools, or ashpits) so foul as to be injurious to health or offensive to the occupiers of adjoining premises, or who keeps any animal, "so as to be injurious to health or offensive to such occupier," or who "permits to exist or remain" in any such place "any accumulation of manure, or any matter or thing whatever, injurious to health or offensive to such occupiers." The storage of paraffin in large quantities is said to fall within the latter category as being an accumulation of a "matter or thing," injurious to health and offensive to the neighbours, permitted to exist or remain in this back-garden within burgh.

If the whole of the section were in terms as general as its concluding words, it would be difficult to resist this argument. But specialia derogant generalibus. The offences specified in the section seem all to resolve themselves into keeping premises in a foul or dirty state. It is so expressly as to the drains, privies, &c., and the accumulation of manure suggests the same idea, for the offence consists in the excessive retention of what ought at frequent intervals to be removed. Even the reference to the keeping of an animal seems to be limited to the case where an animal is kept in such a dirty state as to be offensive or injurious to health. This, I think, clearly appears from the fact that there is a separate section (the 145th) which provides for the case of an animal (such as a howling dog) which is a "nuisance or annoyance" to the neighbourhood from its own behaviour, as distinguished from the manner in which it is kept.

¹ Anderson v. Aberdeen Agricultural Hall Co., May 16, 1879, 6 R. 901.

No. 19.
Feb. 16, 1892.
Walker v.
Lamb.

Accordingly, it seems to me that the general words towards the end of the section, "any matter or thing whatever injurious to health or offensive to such occupiers," must be read as meaning merely any matter or thing ejusdem generis with those which have been already specified. If so, the simple storage of an article of commerce like paraffin is not covered by the section. We are not told, and cannot assume, that the offence arose from any want of care or cleanliness in the manner of storing the paraffin. Indeed, it would appear that the storing of any large quantity, however it may be done, is calculated to be offensive to the sense of smell and injurious to health.

The Public Health Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 101), sec. 16, and following sections, provides for the "removal, or remedy, or discontinuance, or interdict" of "any work, manufactory, trade, or business injurious to the health of the neighbourhood, or so conducted as to be offensive or injurious to health," but the procedure provided by the Act requires that the application shall be made only to the Sheriff, and on medical certificate, or a requisition in writing by ten inhabitants of the district. There may be very good reasons for providing that a trade or business should not be put down without these precautions being taken, although mere want of cleanliness in the mode of keeping premises within burgh may be reached by a more summary procedure.

Even if no statutory enactment applied, I cannot doubt that, if any person lays down on his premises what is so offensive as to be injurious to health, he may be interdicted from doing so at common law. But I think we should decide nothing more than this, that the circumstances disclosed in this case do not justify a prosecution under section 140 of the Aberdeen Police Act. I am therefore for quashing the conviction.

THE COURT quashed the conviction.

THOMAS DALGLEISH, S.S.C.—ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN LANG, Appellant.—Lees—A. S. D. Thomson.
DANIEL MUNRO, Respondents.—Asher—Younger.

No. 20.

Mar. 9, 1892.
Lang v.
Munro.

Statute—Construction—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 101), secs. 45 and 46—Glasgow Police Acts, 1862 and 1866.—The provisions of the Glasgow Police Acts, 1862 and 1866, dealing with underground dwellings, exact certain requirements from which, however, they exempt such dwellings as are registered in pursuance of the Acts.

The Public Health Act, 1867, contains similar but enlarged provisions relating to underground dwellings, but without the exemptions.

In a prosecution under the Public Health Act for contravention of these provisions in the case of an underground dwelling in Glasgow, held that it was not a good defence that the dwelling was registered under the Glasgow Police Acts.

No. 20.

Mar. 9, 1892.
Lang v.
Munro.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
General.
Lord Adam.
Lord M'Laren.
Justiciary
Clerk.

THE clerk to the Glasgow Police Commissioners, who were the Local Authority for the city of Glasgow under the Public Health Act, 1867, brought this petition and complaint under the 45th and 46th sections* of that Act against Daniel Munro, house-factor, Glasgow. The petition recited "that Daniel Munro, house-factor, 39 Hope Street, Glasgow, the owner of the two cellars, vaults, or underground rooms after mentioned, has, since the 11th day of July 1891, let separately other than as a warehouse or storehouse, or has suffered to be occupied as a dwelling-house the two cellars, vaults, or underground rooms situated at 38 Catherine Street, Glasgow, . . . which are not entirely open on one or other of their sides, and which have less than one-third of their height above the level of the street or ground adjoining the same, or otherwise have not three feet at least of their height from the floor to the ceiling above the said level, with an open area of 2 feet 6 inches wide from the level of the floors of such vaults or rooms up to the level of the said street or ground, notwithstanding that the said local authority, on 10th July 1891, issued and gave notice to the said Daniel Munro, . . . that the letting of such cellars, vaults, or underground rooms as dwelling-houses was prohibited from that time forth, contrary to sections 45 and 46 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867," whereby he had become liable in a penalty not exceeding 20s. for every day during which such cellars, vaults, or rooms were so occupied after conviction of the first offence.

It was admitted that the two houses in question were registered under the provisions of the 375th, 376th, and 377th sections of the Glasgow Police Act, 1862.†

* The Public Health Act, 1867, section 45, enacted,—“It shall not be lawful to let separately, except as a warehouse or storehouse, or to suffer to be occupied as a dwelling-house, any cellar whatsoever, or any vault or underground room (not being entirely open on one or other of its sides), which vault or room shall be less in height from the floor to the ceiling than 7 feet, in the case of houses built prior to the passing of this Act, or less in height than 8 feet, in the case of houses built subsequently to the passing hereof, or which shall be less than one-third of its height above the level of the street or ground adjoining the same, or otherwise shall not have 3 feet at least of its height from the floor to the ceiling above the said level, with an open area of 10 feet 6 inches wide from the level of the floor of such vault or room up to the level of the said street or ground, or which shall not have appurtenant thereto the use of a water-closet or privy and ashpit, or which shall not also have a glazed window made to open to the full extent of the half thereof, the area of which is not less than 9 superficial feet clear of the frame, and a fireplace with a chimney or flue, or which vault or underground room, being an inner or back vault or cellar let or occupied along with a front vault or room as part of the same letting or occupation, has not a ventilating flue (unless such inner or back vault or room shall be part of a house built before the passing of this Act), or which shall not be well and effectually drained by means of a drain,” &c.

Section 46 enacted the penalty “for letting underground dwellings.”

† The Glasgow Police Act, 1862, section 375, enacted,—“Except as after mentioned, it shall not be lawful for any proprietor to let, or for any person to take in lease, or to use or suffer to be used, for the purpose of sleeping in, any apartment, unless one-third at least of its height is above the level of the turnpike road, or public or private street or court adjoining or near to it, and unless there be in front of at least one-third of every window in such apartment, including any turnpike road, or public or private street or court, a free space equal to at least one-half of the height of the wall in which it is placed, measuring such space in a straight line from and at right angles to the plane of the window, and measuring such wall from the floor of the apartment to where the roof of the building rests upon it.”

Section 376 enacted,—“Any person who lets, or who takes on lease, any apart-

The respondent pleaded that the dwelling-houses in question having been registered under the local Acts could not be subjected to the provisions of the Public Health Act founded on. No. 20.

The Sheriff-substitute (Birnie), on 14th January 1891, gave effect to that contention, and assailed the respondent. Mar. 9, 1892.
Lang v.
Munro.

The clerk to the Police Commissioners obtained a case for the opinion of the High Court. The question of law stated was,—“Can the two sections of the Public Health Act founded on by the complainer and appellant be applied to the two dwelling-houses complained of?”

The case narrated that it was admitted by the respondent (1) that the two houses in question were occupied as dwelling-houses; (2) that if the two sections of the Public Health Act founded on did apply to them, they, as dwelling-houses, stood condemned, as not having the conditions required by the said sections in the respects mentioned in the complaint; and (3) that he had received notice of prohibition as specified in the complaint; but that it was pleaded that that Act could not apply in consequence of the provisions of the Glasgow local Police Acts above quoted.

Argued for the appellant;—The Public Health Act, 1867, was not a tentative or experimental statute. It was a remedial statute and swept away all local peculiarities. It removed the exception contained in the Glasgow Police Acts, which were prior to it, and were in no way saved by it. The conditions of the underground dwelling struck at by the Public Health Act were more exhaustive than those in the local Acts, and some of them were enlarged. The limitations contained in the latter were therefore by implication removed.¹ This argument was strengthened by the fact that in section 16, subsection (d) of the Public Health Act, a special exception was made in the case of Glasgow from the provisions of that section. Further, section 104 of the Public Health Act, enacted that “all powers given by this Act shall be deemed to be in addition to, and not in derogation of, any powers conferred by Act of Parliament not hereby repealed.” The Glasgow local Acts were clearly within the view of the Legislature when they passed the Public Health Act, for the Police Commissioners under any local Act were by section 5 made the Local Authority.

Argued for the respondent;—The sections of the Public Health Act under which this prosecution had been brought, and the corresponding provisions of the local Acts, dealt not so much with the sanitary state of the underground dwellings in question as had been suggested as with their architectural requirements. In the general Act there were no doubt provisions in regard to drainage, &c., but the structural conditions required ment for the purpose of sleeping in, which is not in conformity with the said provision, or which does not fall within the exceptions hereinafter specified, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £5, and any person who uses, or suffers to be used, for the said purpose any such apartment, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 5s. for every day or part of a day during which any such apartment is so used or suffered to be used.”

Section 377 enacted, that the provisions in question should not apply, inter alia, “to any apartment which in any part of the three years preceding the term of Martinmas 1861 was used for the purpose of sleeping in, if the proprietor of such apartment desires to retain the power of so letting or using it, and registers it in pursuance of the provisions hereinafter contained.”

The Glasgow Police Act of 1866, sections 370, 371, and 372, contained similar provisions.

¹ Bramston v. Mayor of Colchester, 1856, 6 Ellis & Blackburn, 246; Duncan v. Scottish North-Eastern Railway Co., 1870, L. R., 2 Scot. Appa. 20, 8 Macph. (H. L.) 53.

No. 20.
 —
 Mar. 9, 1892.
 Lang v.
 Munro.

by the general and local Acts were very similar. The general Act could not be held to repeal by implication the special exemption conferred on registered dwellings by the local Acts. Where there was no absolute inconsistency between the two Acts, it was not to be inferred that the provisions of a general Act derogated from those of a special Act. In passing the former, the Legislature was not to be presumed to have in view special cases already dealt with. Generalia specialibus non derogant.¹ The distance of time was so very brief that it was not intelligible that the Legislature should intend to take away by a general Act passed in 1867 a privilege conferred by a local Act passed in the previous session.

At advising.—

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—The petition of the appellant, from which the respondent has been assolized in the Court below, was laid under the 45th and 46th sections of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867. The latter of these sections merely states the penalty for the offence created by the former, which declares that it shall not be lawful to let separately, except as a warehouse or storehouse, or to suffer to be occupied as a dwelling-place, any cellar whatsoever, or any vault or underground room, which does not fulfil certain enumerated conditions as to space, air, light, drainage, heat, and ventilation. It is admitted that the two of those conditions which are specified in the petition are not fulfilled by the dwellings which are the subject of complaint. The defence is that the dwellings in question having been registered in accordance with certain provisions of the Glasgow Police Act, 1862, could not be subjected to the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1867.

The question thus raised is of considerable importance, and requires somewhat close attention.

The first thing to be ascertained is what was done by the Glasgow Police Act of 1862. Now, that statute is made up of an immense number of provisions on all the multifarious subjects which come under its title, using the term in its most comprehensive sense; it deals with the constitution of the local governing body, its members, rates, officers, and courts; with fires, public-houses, weights and measures, pawnbrokers, cabs, fireworks, porters, cleansing, lighting, sanitary objects, the edile jurisdiction, streets, sewers, buildings, and markets.

In the part headed "Buildings—their erection, alteration, and use," there occurs as the 375th section a provision that, except as after mentioned, it shall not be lawful to let or use, for the purpose of sleeping in, any apartment unless one-third at least of its height is above the level of the street, and unless there be in front of at least one-third of every window in the apartment a free space equal to at least one-half of the height of the wall in which it is placed; and section 376 provides a penalty. The excepting clause from this provision is the 377th; it exempts from the application of this prohibition any apartment which in any part of the three years preceding Martinmas 1861 was used for the purpose of sleeping in, if the proprietor desires to retain the power of so letting or using it, and registers it in pursuance of certain clauses which follow, providing the machinery of registration. It is under these provisions that the respondent's house is registered; and the question is, does this registration avail him against a prosecution under the 45th section of the Public Health Act, 1867?

¹ Hardcastle's Statutory Law, 174; Thorpe v. Adams, 1871, L. R., 6 C. P. 125, Bovill, C. J. p. 135; Fitzgerald v. Champneys, 1861, 30 L. J. Chan. 777; London and Blackwall Railway Co., v. Board of Works for Limehouse District, 1856, 3 Kay & Johnston, 123, at p. 128.

Now, before considering the relation of the two statutes—the local and the general—it is well, for greater accuracy, to compare the two sections which, the one in the local Act and the other in the General Act, declare the offence. They are, as already mentioned, the 375th in the local Act, and the 45th in the general Act. It will be found that while the local Act demands two things in underground dwellings, the general Act demands nine, and that even as regards the two of which the subject-matter is the same, the provisions are not identical. One of them, that relating to the one-third above ground, is in substance the same; the other, which relates to the air space in front of the windows, is different as to the amount required.

No. 20.
Mar. 9, 1892.
Lang v.
Munro.

Now, the first and most obvious remark on the respondent's argument is that the privilege of registration set up in the local Act does not profess to do more than protect against the specific penal provisions of that Act, viz., sections 375 and 376, to which it creates an exception; and some process of reasoning is required to make this registration avail as a protection against the provisions of a subsequent and general Act. To give full justice to the argument of the respondent, which I am now to consider, it may be right to add that in another Glasgow Police Act of 1866 which repealed that of 1862, the clauses in the Act of 1862 are re-enacted. This, however, very slightly, if at all, affects the argument.

The point, then, for the respondent is that the 45th section of the General Act of 1867 (so far as the two matters go, which are the subject of this prosecution) relates to the same subject-matter as the section in the local Act from which he has a statutory exemption. The argument is that the Legislature, having in 1862 dealt with this subject, and conferred the exemption, and having (as the respondent adds) re-enacted it in 1866, is not to be held to have abrogated this local exemption in 1867, when, dealing with the same subject in a general Act, it again re-enacts substantially the same prohibitions. The general doctrine which the respondent invokes is that in a general Act the Legislature is presumed to have only general cases in view, and not particular cases, which have been already provided for by a special Act.

At best this is no more than a presumption; and it is necessary to examine the Public Health Act itself to ascertain its relation to local statutes, and particularly to the Glasgow Police Act. Now, when this is done, it becomes clear that the Public Health Act is intended to apply to places having local Police Acts, and in particular that it speaks with full remembrance of the particular provisions of the Glasgow Police Act. The former of these propositions is demonstrated by the 5th section, which imposes the duty of executing the Act, in places within the jurisdiction of police commissioners or trustees exercising the functions of police commissioners under any general or local Act, on those police commissioners or trustees. Those bodies are created the local authorities to execute the Act; and by the 104th section it is provided that all powers given by the Act (viz., the Public Health Act) shall be deemed to be in addition to, and not in derogation of, any powers conferred by Act of Parliament not thereby repealed; and such last-mentioned powers may be exercised in the same manner as if this Act had not passed, but without prejudice to the powers conferred by this Act. It is thus plain that, instead of contemplating only general cases, this Act does contemplate particular cases, which had already been provided for by special Acts.

That Glasgow and its local arrangements were in view of the Legislature in passing the Public Health Act is strikingly proved by section 16 (d), where the

No. 20.

Mar. 9, 1892.
Lang v.
Munro.

city of Glasgow is excepted from a provision fixing the minimum distance of dunghoops from the municipal boundaries. It is plain that this was done in order to allow Glasgow to retain the more flexible arrangements provided in section 354 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866.

I hold it therefore to be clear that the sanitary system contained in the Public Health Act was intended to apply to Glasgow, and that where it was intended to relax or vary those provisions in their application to Glasgow, such relaxation is expressed in the Act.

And now, coming to closer quarters, I ask, does it not follow that section 45 of the Public Health Act, upon which this prosecution is rested, applies to at least some dwellings in Glasgow? I take the case of buildings not registered. If they are the subject of a prosecution under this clause, exactly such as the present, their only defence could be, that inasmuch as the local Act dealt with the subject although not quite in the same way, therefore the general Act did not apply. But this defence is hopeless, looking to the fact that the Legislature, as I have already shewn, has applied the Public Health Act to places which have local Acts, and in the case of Glasgow has done so with the local Act, so to speak, open before them.

I take next the case of registered dwellings; and I suppose a prosecution under the Public Health Act for non-compliance with one of the seven new conditions prescribed by that Act. On the principles already laid down I see no answer to a prosecution.

Coming next to the case in hand—a prosecution of a registered dwelling for non-compliance with the absolute and universal requirement of the conditions, which under previous legislation could only be exacted in buildings not registered—what is the theory of the defence? It must be that the case of these registered houses having been considered in 1862 and in 1866, they got an immunity, and that it is not to be held that rights of property so protected are further infringed in 1867. But it appears to me that the previous steps in the argument have already swept away the ratio of this defence. If those registered houses have by the Act of 1867 been subjected to the seven new requirements, that is in quality as definite an encroachment of the settlement of 1862 and 1866 as to do away with the distinction between registered and unregistered dwellings in regard to the two old requirements. The truth is, once it is admitted or established that the Public Health Act applies to Glasgow, the result follows that it applies on its own terms, and not on the terms of the local Act. Nor is this repugnant or surprising. In the Glasgow Police Act, as already noticed, sanitary provisions are merely a part of a general local scheme, which had to be adjusted and pared down to meet conflicting local interests concerned in the establishment of a common administration. In that case it is natural that different interests should be protected or conciliated as here. But in 1867 the Legislature was moved by the declared desire to establish a general sanitary system over Scotland, the provisions of which, by virtue of their universality, should improve public health. Every sanitary scheme necessarily involves interference with the rights of property, as exercised before it is passed, whether those be recognised or established by statute or not. I think it quite intelligible that when all over the country new restraints were being imposed on the use of property, no special sanctity should have been perceived in those dwellings which had under local arrangements received a protection against local legislation. These considerations confirm rather than produce the opinion which I have reached on the statutes themselves, that the question stated in the case must be answered in the affirmative, and that the judgment of the Court below was wrong.

No. 20.

Mar. 9, 1892.
Lang v.
Munro.

LORD ADAM.—This complaint is brought under the 45th and 46th sections of the Public Health Act. The respondent does not dispute that if that Act applies to his case he has contravened it, but he pleads that the Act cannot apply in consequence of certain provisions of the Glasgow Police Act of 1866 which are set forth in the case. That Act lays down certain rules as to the letting of such underground dwellings as the one in question, similar to but not the same as those of the Public Health Act, and it continues an exemption from its application in favour of certain houses which are upon a register made up by the Sheriff under the previous Glasgow Police Act of 1862. The provisions of the Act of 1862, under which the register was made up, are set forth in the case. The Sheriff has held that because these houses have been registered in the register established by the Act of 1862, and continued by the Act of 1866, sections 45 and 46 of the Public Health Act cannot apply to them. We have not the reasons of the Sheriff's judgment, but I do not think it can have proceeded on any other ground than this, that the Public Health Act does not apply to the case, because Glasgow has a local Act, although of prior date, dealing with the same subject-matter. After a careful consideration of the provisions of the Public Health Act it seems to me clear that it did not repeal, nor was it intended to repeal, any existing local Police Act. But I think it is equally clear that the Act does apply to all boroughs whether they have a local Police Act or not. Your Lordship has referred to the 16th section which shews that it had the local Act of Glasgow in view. Local Acts are also referred to in other sections. Section 71, for example, which vests sewers within a district in the local authority provides that "Nothing in this Act contained shall affect the rights of any person or persons to the property or management of any sewers in virtue of any existing local or general police statute," the reason of the exception being that otherwise the Public Health Act would have applied. Accordingly I should have arrived at the same conclusion upon a construction of the Act as it expresses itself in the 104th section, where it provides that "All powers given by this Act shall be deemed to be in addition to and not in derogation of any powers conferred by Act of Parliament not hereby repealed, or any law or custom, and such last-mentioned powers may be exercised in the same manner as if this Act had not passed, but without prejudice to the powers conferred by this Act." The position of matters, then, appears to me to be this. I think it was within the power of the Local Authority to have proceeded against this house under the clauses of the local Act if it had not complied with the conditions imposed by that Act. In that case the privilege of registration would have applied and would have exempted from prosecution. But I think it was equally open to them to proceed under the Public Health Act for the violation of the provisions of that Act, and if the violation be established the penalties must follow, unless there is some provision in the Act exempting the respondent from prosecution. I cannot see that a privilege of exemption from prosecution under the local Act can be held to exempt from prosecution under the public Act, which contains no such privilege.

I agree that it is not surprising that the Legislature should have provided as it has done. The Public Health Act was passed with regard to the health of the whole community, and contains such provisions as were thought desirable for effecting that purpose, and there appears no reason why the inhabitants of

No. 20.

Mar. 9, 1892.
Lang v.
Munro.

Glasgow or of Edinburgh, because these cities have local Acts, should be put in a different position from the inhabitants of other places.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in the judgment proposed, and have very little to add. The question how far a right conferred under an Act of Parliament is affected by supervenient legislation is an interesting, and sometimes a delicate question. We were referred to authorities in the decisions of the English Courts to the effect that such a right would in general not be affected by subsequent Acts of the nature of local legislation unless it appeared from the terms of the subsequent Act of Parliament that the cases already dealt with were intended to be included in its provisions. Now that may be a very good principle where the two Acts of Parliament to be considered are both of the nature of local and personal Acts, such as railway legislation and municipal legislation, because Acts of Parliament of that kind are very much like decrees. They proceed upon the application of persons interested, and are generally granted if unopposed, unless there be anything in them contrary to public policy, which the Speaker or the Chairman of Committee might disallow of his own motion. Therefore it is very right that if a private individual has made a contract with a railway company, and that contract has been embodied in an Act of Parliament, not necessarily putting it as a contract, but imposing building conditions or the like—it is quite right, I say, that the person whose contract has been ratified by Parliament should be entitled to trust to it, and to assume—unless he gets notice to the contrary—that his particular case is not intended to be covered by the general words of any new bill that may be applied for. And if the new powers are expressed in general terms, I should highly approve of the principle which received effect in those cases relating to railway legislation for London, that the individual who already had the Parliamentary contract was not intended to be affected by general words in an Act obtained at the suit of the other contracting party. I can conceive that the same principle might apply to local legislation obtained at the instance of municipal corporations who, perhaps, have not always the same regard for individual interests which Parliament is supposed to have. At all events these interests are not under their protection, and they are under the protection of Parliament when dealing with public questions. But I think that the principle which I have endeavoured to explain is in general inapplicable to supervenient public legislation. I think that anyone who has notice of a public bill affecting his interests must apply to have a clause inserted protecting his interests if he conceives that he is entitled to such protection.

In all cases as to the application of a public Act of Parliament the safe rule is to determine its application, as your Lordship has proposed to do, by an analysis of the clauses of the Act itself, and the evidence which these afford of the state of knowledge of Parliament of the various interests which the Act proposes to affect. There is also another consideration distinguishing the two classes of cases which I think not unimportant. I mean that as a general rule Parliament will not give power to corporations, whether trading or non-trading, to take away private rights without making compensation. Accordingly, when the city of Glasgow first proposed to suppress a certain class of houses as being in their view insanitary, doubtless opposition was offered. It was possibly foreseen that, unless some compromise was effected, the power desired would not be given, because it was not proposed to give compensation to the owners of such houses. Accordingly this arrangement was made, that all persons whose houses might be liable to exception under the Act should be permitted to register a claim of exemption within a certain time. But it by no means follows that if the matter had been brought before the Legislature, they would have seen it to be in accordance with the general principles which govern their proceedings, to make an exception of those registered houses from the operation of the Public Health Act, because in public Acts laying restrictions on individual rights for the public benefit it is not necessary or usual to give compensation. That, I think, is only done where the hardship to individuals would be very great, as in the case of slaughtering cattle and some other cases which readily occur to me. But where the interference is slight, each person must suffer the inconvenience and expense which is caused by the statute in consideration of the public benefit which he along with others derives from the operation of the statute. Now, the Public Health Act makes no exceptions, and makes no provision for compensation, and I am of opinion that it must receive effect according to its terms, and that the mere registration for the purposes of exemption from the operation of the Glasgow local Acts gives no protection against the operation of clauses of a more comprehensive character introduced into Acts applicable to the country at large.

No. 20.

Mar. 9, 1892.
Lang v.
Muuro.

THE COURT accordingly answered the question in the affirmative, reversed the determination of the inferior Judge, and remitted to him, finding no expenses due.

CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

D. RUSSELL & COMPANY, Pursuers (Respondents).—Shaw—T. B. Morison.
MRS GEORGINA MURRAY, Defender (Appellant).—J. Wilson.

No. 21.

Mar. 9, 1892.
Russell & Co.
v. Murray.

Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Review—Small-Debt Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 41), sec. 31.
—A defender in the Small-Debt Court having objected to the Sheriff-substitute's jurisdiction upon the ground that she had no residence within the county, he, after a proof, repelled her objection, and decerned against her.

Held (1) that the defender was entitled to appeal to the High Court under the 31st section of the Small-Debt Act, 1837, on the ground of "defect of jurisdiction" of the Sheriff-substitute, and (2) that the case should be remitted to the Sheriff to inquire into the facts, and to report.

THIS was an appeal at the instance of Mrs Georgina Murray under the 31st section of the Small-Debt Act, 1837,* against a decree of the Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton) of the Lothians and Peebles, pronounced against the appellant in the Small-Debt Court at Edinburgh in a summons at the instance of D. Russell & Company, Oil Mills, Burntisland. The ground of the appeal was that the appellant was not subject to the jurisdiction of the Court, as her only residence was in Fife.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-General.
Lord Adam.
Lord M'Laren.
Justiciary Clerk.

* The Small-Debt Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 41), sec. 31, enacts,—“It shall be competent to any person conceiving himself aggrieved by any decree given by any Sheriff in any cause or prosecution raised under the authority of this Act to bring the case by appeal before the next Circuit Court of Justiciary, or where there are no Circuit Courts, before the High Court of Justiciary at Edinburgh, . . . provided always that such appeal shall be competent only when founded on the ground of corruption or malice and oppression on the part of the Sheriff, or on such deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments as the Court shall think took place wilfully, or have prevented substantial justice from having been done, or on incompetency, including defect of jurisdiction of the Sheriff,” &c.

No. 21.

Mar. 9, 1892.
Russell & Co.
v. Murray.

The appellant made the following statements in her appeal:—"On 9th September 1891 the respondents took out a small-debt summons against her for £7, 13s. in the Edinburgh Small-Debt Court. In the summons she was erroneously designed as residing at 'Piershill House, Jock's Lodge,' and the summons was executed by posting a copy to her addressed to her at Piershill House. She did not reside there, and had no domicile of citation there. The service copy of the summons was received by her daughter-in-law, Mrs Murray, who, on opening the envelope containing it and finding it was intended for the appellant, sent it back to the Sheriff-clerk at Edinburgh.

"When the case was called on 23d December, objection was taken on behalf of the appellant to the jurisdiction of the Court, on the ground that she was in no way subject to the jurisdiction of the Court, and proof was adduced upon the question of jurisdiction.

"The appellant and four other witnesses deponed, and it is the fact, that the appellant did not reside within the counties of the Lothians and Peebles, and in particular did not reside at Piershill House, Jock's Lodge, but that her only residence was in Morton Place, Aberdour, in the county of Fife. As matter of fact it is the case that the appellant has resided in Aberdour since Whitsunday 1890 continuously, with the exception of a few days at a time when she has been visiting one or other of her children. No counter evidence was led by the respondents, and no ground was stated to sustain the jurisdiction of the Court. Nevertheless, the Sheriff-substitute repelled the objection to jurisdiction, allowed a proof on the merits, and on 13th January 1892 pronounced the decree complained of."

Argued for the appellant;—Her appeal was founded upon "defect of jurisdiction" of the Sheriff-substitute in the sense of section 31 of the Small-Debt Act, 1837. She was prepared to shew, if she were allowed a proof, that the Sheriff-substitute's judgment sustaining jurisdiction was ill-founded. The fact that he had decided in favour of his own jurisdiction did not debar the appellant from pleading the Small-Debt Act.¹

Argued for the respondents;—The judgment of a Sheriff-substitute upon a question of fact affecting his jurisdiction must be held as final.² At all events, the Court would only interfere where upon the face of the proceedings before him there appeared to be an irregularity.³ In Burrell's case the Sheriff had given judgment on the evidence of a single witness. In the present case the Sheriff-substitute had considered the evidence of five witnesses.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—This appeal against a small-debt decree is brought on the ground that the defender was not subject to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles who granted it. This objection was stated in the Court below, and proof was adduced on the question of fact, the appellant alleging, as she does now, that her only residence was in Fife, and that she had not been absent thence since Whitsunday 1890, with the exception of a few days when she has been visiting one or other of her children, that she did not reside within Midlothian, and had no domicile of citation at the house of her daughter-in-law, where the service copy of the summons was left. On the evidence the

¹ Burrell & Son v. Foster, Nov. 2, 1868, 1 Couper, 103; Graham v. Mackay, Feb. 25, 1845, 7 D. 515, 17 Scot. Jur. 240, affd. March 13, 1848, 6 Bell's App. 214, 20 Scot. Jur. 340.

² Edward v. The Inverness and Aberdeen Junction Railway, April 24, 1862, 4 Irvine, 185.

³ Moncrieff's Review in Criminal Cases, p. 253.

Sheriff decided that he had jurisdiction, and he granted decree. There is, of No. 21.
course, no record of the evidence.

In view of the cases cited by the appellant, and having regard to the terms of the statute, the fact that the Court below heard evidence and decided upon that evidence in favour of its own jurisdiction, does not exclude the present appeal, which is under the 31st section of the Small-Debt Act, 1837. It is necessary that we should, in order to dispose of the appeal, become possessed of the facts; and I therefore propose that we should remit to the Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles to inquire and report as to the facts relating to the appellant's plea of no jurisdiction.

Mar. 9, 1892.
Russell & Co
v. Murray.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The only difficulty is as to the course which we should follow. As to the competency of the appeal there is no doubt. One of the grounds of appeal under the Act is defect of jurisdiction on the part of the Sheriff, which is the precise ground of the appeal here. The question was one of fact. The Sheriff-substitute heard evidence and came to the conclusion that the appellant was resident in the Lothians, and that therefore he had jurisdiction. The question is as to the course which we should follow. We had an example in the case of Burrell of an appeal taken under the same circumstances. In that case the Court adopted a course which, looking to the value of this case, I am not prepared to follow. In that case the Court remitted the case to the Second Division of the Court of Session to inquire and report. To remit a case of the value of £7, 16s. for inquiry in that way would, I think, be inexpedient. We cannot, I think, have a proof in this Court, but the Act gives us power to remit to the Sheriff with instructions. I think that is the most expedient course, and that we should send the case to the Sheriff to report.

LORD M'LAREN.—Defect of jurisdiction is one of the grounds of appeal which are specified in the Small-Debt Act, and it is not disputed that the question raised in this case is a proper one for us to consider. Where the jurisdiction depends upon fact, the question can only be settled by evidence. I am not prepared to say that in no circumstances could this Court take a proof in open Court under an appeal. But certainly it has been the habit of this Court, where inquiry into facts was necessary in summary cases, to make a remit to the Sheriff, and it appears to me that the course your Lordship proposes is the proper course in a case of this kind.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Remit to the Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles to inquire and report as to the facts relating to the appellant's plea of no jurisdiction."

LACHLAN M'INTOSH, S.S.C.—PETER MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

HER MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE.—Ferguson, A.-D.—

A. O. M. Mackenzie.

ELIZABETH SCOTT.—Salvesen.

No. 22.

Mar. 29, 1892.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Scott.

Culpable homicide—Child-birth—Neglect to call for assistance—Indictment—Relevancy.—An indictment against a woman set forth that having been delivered of a child at a certain place she did then and there compress the throat of the child, and did suffocate and kill him; or otherwise, that being delivered of the child, she did refrain from calling for assistance when the time of her being delivered had arrived, in consequence whereof the child died.

No. 22.

Mar. 29, 1892.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Scott.

Held (per Lord Young) that the second alternative charge was irrelevant.

Opinion, that if a child dies of suffocation or other cause consequent upon the mother's reckless neglect at the time of her delivery to call for assistance which is at hand, she is guilty of culpable homicide.

Culpable homicide—Child not completely born.—Observed (per Lord Young) that injuries causing the death of a child which has breathed and cried may constitute the crime of culpable homicide, although at the time the injuries are inflicted the child is not completely born.

Proof—Culpable homicide—Letters of panel.—In the course of the trial of a woman for the culpable homicide of her infant child her counsel proposed to put in evidence certain letters written by her to her mother prior to and during her pregnancy which shewed that she had suffered from irregularity of menstruation prior to and subsequent to her becoming pregnant. The object of the evidence was to shew that she was ignorant of the probable period of her confinement, and that her labour had come upon her unexpectedly.

Held (per Lord Young) that the letters were inadmissible as evidence for the panel.

HIGH COURT.
(Perth.)
Justiciary
Clerk.

ELIZABETH SCOTT was indicted, in the High Court of Justiciary at Perth, on the charge "that having, on 5th February 1892, been delivered of a male child, you did then and there compress the throat of your said child and suffocate him, and did kill him, or otherwise that at time and place above libelled you, being delivered of a male child as aforesaid, did refrain from calling for assistance when the time for your being delivered had arrived, in consequence whereof the said child died."

Counsel for the panel objected to the relevancy of the second alternative charge in the indictment, in respect that no crime, either at common law or under a statute, was therein set forth.

Argued for the Crown;—The objection proceeded in part upon a misapprehension, as no charge was attempted to be made under the Concealment of Pregnancy Act (49 Geo. III. c. 14). What was charged was the crime of culpable homicide, and that crime was relevantly charged under the alternative charge in the indictment.¹ It might be argued from Martin's case that it was unnecessary to set forth in the indictment the facts stated in the alternative charge, and that if these facts were proved it would be the duty of the jury to return a verdict of culpable homicide, although the alternative charge were omitted from the indictment. But the specification of the facts upon which the Crown relied, contained in the alternative charge, was to the advantage of the accused. The charge was also consistent with the older practice, for in June 1614 Janet Brown was convicted of child murder, "in respect she went out to the fields and so neglected the ordinary help for being delivered."²

LORD YOUNG.—I do not require to call for any answer here. It is said that the alternative charge is a good charge at common law. Now, the common law is just the customary law, and though we are now in the year 1892, there is no instance of such a charge having ever been preferred against a prisoner, and therefore it cannot be a charge under the customary law. As I remarked in the course of the Advocate-Depute's speech, the circumstance that assistance is at hand if a woman chooses to call for it, and that she refrains from doing so, may be a material and conclusive circumstance in a case of this kind. If a woman chooses to take upon herself the task of her own delivery, with a reckless disregard of the child's safety and life, and the child dies, either suffocated or strangled in consequence of her failure to do what it was her duty to do, that would, I think, amount to the crime of culpable homicide, but a charge that a child died in consequence of the mother having refrained from calling for assistance is, in my opinion, as a charge by itself, not a good charge, and I am not prepared to sustain it at this time of day.

¹ H.M. Advocate v. Martin, Jan. 29, 1877, 3 Couper, 379, per Lord Justice-Clerk, 381.

² Hume's Comm. p. 292.

No. 22.

Mar. 29, 1892.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Scott.

The Court sustained the objection stated to the alternative charge.

The panel pleaded not guilty, and a jury was empannelled.

In the course of the trial Dr Stewart senior and Dr Stewart junior who had made a post-mortem examination of the body of the child, deposed that, in their opinion, the child was born alive, and that death was caused very shortly after birth by suffocation, consequent on compression of the windpipe. Both doctors stated that they were of opinion, as the whole result of their examination, and particularly on account of the full establishment of respiration, that the child had been completely born alive, and that death was the result of strangulation by the hand, the marks on the neck being just such as would be produced by violence. Both doctors had attended the accused after her delivery. Dr Stewart deposed that panel had stated to him that she "had killed it" (the child), adding, "I did it trying to save myself." Dr Stewart junior said that panel had stated to him that the child had cried, and that she had killed it. In cross-examination both doctors admitted that it was not impossible that a child might cry before the process of birth was completed, and that the injuries might have been inflicted before the child was completely born.

Dr Snedden was examined for the defence. He had not seen the body. He was of opinion that a child might cry before it was completely born; that the accused might have caused the injuries in question in delivering herself; and that alternatively they might have been wilfully inflicted before the child was completely separated from the body of its mother.

In the course of the case for the defence counsel for the panel proposed to prove and put in evidence two letters from the panel to her mother, one written prior to and the other during her pregnancy, to shew that the panel had suffered from irregularities of menstruation prior to pregnancy, and that for a considerable time after she became pregnant she was ignorant of her condition. The object of the proposed evidence was to assist in proving that the panel was ignorant of the probable period of her confinement, and that her labour had come upon her unexpectedly.

LORD YOUNG refused to allow the letters to be put in evidence.

In his address to the jury counsel for the panel argued that the injuries had been innocently inflicted in self-delivery, and that in any case, unless they were proved to have been inflicted after complete delivery, there could be no conviction of culpable homicide.¹

LORD YOUNG—in charging the jury.—If the child was killed and the prisoner is to blame for its death, then she is guilty of culpable homicide. If you think that she is not blameworthy you will acquit her, she is entitled to that. If, on the other hand, you think that she went on from the conception to the birth of the child desiring to hide her shame, and refrained from calling for assistance when assistance was at hand—it is ridiculous nonsense to say that a girl who was able to get up and go about in a house where a family and establishment of servants were living could not have got assistance had she called for it—and took upon herself to assist herself, and in the agony of child-birth grasped the

¹ Jean M'Allum, Oct. 11, 1858, 3 Irvine, 187.

No. 22.

Mar. 29, 1892.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Scott.

throat of the child with the result of causing its death—I cannot say to you that she is not blameworthy, or that her blameworthiness does not amount to culpable homicide. The amount of her blame it is for the Court to determine, and it is also for the Court to determine the amount of punishment which is to follow upon it.

If, then, you think no blame attaches to the prisoner you will, as I have said, acquit her. But if you think that blame does attach to her, then culpable homicide is the name for that blame, resulting as it did in the death of a child which had both breathed and cried. It does not matter the least if the injuries were inflicted when the child was partly in its mother's body, though no suggestion of that kind was made by the girl herself.

THE JURY unanimously found the panel not guilty, and the Court assolized the panel simpliciter, and dismissed her from the bar.

CROWN AGENT—R. OSBORNE PAGAN, W.S., Cupar—Agents.

No. 23.

Mar. 29, 1892.*
Simpson v.
Board of Trade.

THOMAS SIMPSON, Complainer.—M'Lennan.

THE BOARD OF TRADE, Respondent.—Johnston—C. K. Mackenzie.

Jurisdiction—Finality clause—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 104), sec. 542.—Held that sec. 542 of the above Act declaring that all orders, decrees, and sentences pronounced under the authority of the Act should be final and not subject to suspension except on the ground of corruption or malice, did not exclude a suspension on the ground that the prosecutor had no authority under the statute to prosecute, and that the complaint and conviction were not in terms authorised by the statute.

Jurisdiction—Sheriff—Summary Procedure—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 104), sec. 520.—The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 520, provides that, “for the purpose of giving jurisdiction under this Act, every offence shall be deemed to have been committed, and every cause of complaint to have arisen either in the place in which the same actually was committed or arose, or in any place in which the offender or person complained against may be.”

A seaman was charged in the Sheriff Court of Renfrewshire with a contravention of the 255th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, in so far as he had at Brisbane and Melbourne respectively wilfully and fraudulently made a false statement of his own name to the masters of two ships, the one belonging to the port of Melbourne, and the other to the port of Glasgow. Opinions that under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, the Sheriff had jurisdiction to entertain the charge.

Instance—Prosecution—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104), sec. 531—Board of Trade.—The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 531, enacts that in Scotland summary prosecutions under that Act may be brought “at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Court, or at the instance of any party aggrieved with concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal of Court.”

By the 6th section of that Act the Board of Trade were empowered “to carry into execution the provisions of the Act.”

Held that a complaint against a seaman for contravention of the 255th section of that Act was not competently brought at the instance of the Board of Trade with consent and concurrence of the procurator-fiscal.

Conviction—Sentence—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, sec. 18 (6).—The Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sec. 18, subsec. 6, enacts, that in cases where, under the authority of any Act of Parliament, a penalty is or shall be declared to be recoverable by arrestment, poinding, or distress and sale, or imprisonment, or by any combination of these forms of diligence other than before provided for, the judgment may be expressed in form No. 6 of sched. K, so far licable, "and no warrant of imprisonment shall be issued upon a judgment in such form until after the period allowed for execution by arrestment or poinding, except in the event mentioned in the said form No. 6." Form No. 6 in sched. K, after giving a form of judgment with warrant of poinding and sale, and a form of warrant of imprisonment to be issued after the officer's report, continues,—"If at the hearing it shall appear that the issuing of a warrant of arrestment, poinding, and sale would be inexpedient, then, in place of the warrant annexed to the judgment in the preceding form, say: And in respect it is inexpedient to issue a warrant of poinding and sale [or of arrestment, poinding, and sale], ordain instant execution by imprisonment, and grant warrant to officers of Court to apprehend," &c.

* Decided Feb. 3, 1892.

Opinions, that a conviction (under subsec. 6) ordaining instant execution by imprisonment, and not setting forth that it was inexpedient to issue a warrant of poinding and sale, was invalid.

Oppression—Suspension.—Opinions that certain circumstances attending a conviction of a seaman for an offence against the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, did not amount to oppression on the part of the Board of Trade.

On 17th September 1891 Thomas Simpson, seaman, residing in Greenock, was served with a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, at the instance of the Board of Trade, "with consent of and concurrence of Robert Blair, Procurator-fiscal of the Sheriff Court of the Lower Ward of Renfrewshire." The complaint charged him with having "contravened 'The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854,' or part thereof, and particularly section 255 thereof, in so far as he did (1) on 19th December 1890, at Brisbane, on being engaged to serve as a seaman on board the ship or vessel 'Grasmere' of Melbourne, wilfully and fraudulently and falsely state to the master of the 'Grasmere,' or other person engaging him, that his name was 'J. Scott,' and was on said false statement engaged as a seaman on the 'Grasmere' aforesaid; and (2) on 24th March 1891, at Melbourne, on being engaged to serve as a seaman on board the ship or vessel 'Fiery Cross' of Glasgow, wilfully and fraudulently and falsely state to the master of the 'Fiery Cross,' or other person engaging him, that his name was 'J. Scott,' and was on said false statement engaged as a seaman on the 'Fiery Cross' aforesaid, whereby for each of the said contraventions he has incurred a penalty not exceeding £5 sterling, together with the costs of prosecution, and failing payment, to imprisonment."

Simpson was cited to appear to answer to the complaint on the 21st, but before that day he had left Greenock in a vessel, the "Persis," on which he had accepted an engagement as an able seaman for a foreign voyage. On the 21st the acting Sheriff-substitute (Black) pronounced this conviction:—"In absence, convicts the said Thomas Simpson of the contraventions charged, and therefore adjudges him to forfeit and pay the sum of £10 of penalty, with £1, 10s. of expenses, and in default of immediate payment thereof, adjudges him to be imprisoned for the space of thirty days from the date of his imprisonment, unless said sums shall be sooner paid, and grants warrant to officers of the law to apprehend and convey the said Thomas Simpson to the prison of Greenock, thereafter to be dealt with in due course of law."

Simpson did not return to Greenock until 27th December following, and on the 29th, after claiming at the shipping office the wages he had earned on the voyage from which he had just returned, he was apprehended and put in prison, from which he was released on payment of the amount of the fine and expenses.

He then lodged a reponing note against the decree under the 539th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, which, on 8th January following,

No. 23.

Mar. 29, 1892.

Simpson v.
Board of Trade.HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
General.
Lord Adam.
Ld. M'Laren.
Justiciary
Clerk.

No. 23.
 —
 Mar. 29, 1892.
 Simpson v.
 Board of Trade.

was dismissed by the Sheriff-substitute as incompetent, on the ground that the decree had been implemented by payment.*

He then brought a suspension of the sentence, stating the following pleas;—1. The conviction, sentence, and warrant complained of should be suspended in respect that—(1) the Sheriff had no jurisdiction to entertain said complaint; (2) the complaint is incompetent, irrelevant, and wanting in essential specification; (3) the pretended conviction is incompetent, illegal, and inept; and (4) the whole proceedings were irrelevant, illegal, and oppressive, and contrary to natural justice. 2. Generally in the circumstances, the proceedings should be suspended, the respondents should be ordained to repay to the complainer the penalty and expenses paid by him, and should be found liable in expenses.

He made the following statement:—(Stat. 1) The complainer went in April 1890 on a voyage to Brisbane, Australia. On arriving there he obtained work on shore, and continued at this work for fully six months, and while engaged at it was called by his associates by the name of "Scott," in consequence of his Scotch extraction. "The complainer did not repudiate the name, his mother's maiden name being 'Scott.' In December 1890 the complainer decided to take another voyage, and called at the shipping office at Brisbane, where he was engaged to serve as a seaman on board the 'Grasmere,' on a voyage to New Zealand and back to Melbourne. He was engaged as an able seaman, but did not produce any previous discharges as seaman when engaged. His engagement did not take place on board the 'Grasmere.' When engaged, he gave the name of 'J. Scott,' the name by which, as above stated, he was then generally known. He had no object in view in changing his name, and in particular, he had no false or fraudulent purpose in changing it. On arrival at Melbourne, he obtained a discharge under the name of 'J. Scott.' He then looked out for a vessel bound for the United Kingdom, and was successful in obtaining an engagement on board a vessel so bound, namely, the 'Fiery Cross,' to the master of which, Captain Casey, he was previously known under his name of Simpson. His engagement took place in Flinders Street, Melbourne, and he signed an agreement at the shipping office at Melbourne, and he was there asked by the shipping master to produce his last discharge. He accordingly exhibited said discharge from the 'Grasmere,' and was placed on the articles of the vessel as 'J. Scott,' without being asked any questions about his name. When the 'Fiery Cross' reached Queenstown, in the United Kingdom, the captain was ordered to proceed to Dieppe to discharge, and there the complainer received from Captain Casey a discharge under the name of 'J. Scott,' and also a separate certificate under the name of 'Thomas Simpson.' The complainer ultimately reached Greenock on 24th July 1891."

The complainer thereafter, on 17th September, accepted an engagement on the "Persis," in order to obtain which he had had to produce his previous discharges, which shewed his change of name, for which he gave the explanation stated above. The matter having been reported to the Board of Trade by the Superintendent of the Mercantile Marine, the complaint in question was served upon him, but being under orders to be on board the "Persis" next morning, he informed the sheriff-officer of this engagement and joined the ship next morning.

In support of the plea of oppression, he stated:—(Stat. 13) "The whole of the proceedings above detailed were most irregular, illegal, and oppressive, and most prejudicial to the complainer. The respondents' officials, without previous notice to the complainer, and in the knowledge that he was to join his ship at six o'clock on the morning of 18th September, served said complaint on him at 10.30 P.M. on the previous night, and had a diet fixed thereunder for a date at which they well knew that the complainer, unless he committed a gross breach of contract, was bound to be absent with his ship. They failed to inform him of his liability to be convicted and sentenced in absence, and further failed to inform the Sheriff-substitute, when the date for trial arrived, of the reason for the complainer's absence. On the contrary, they moved for sentence, although well aware that the complainer had sailed in the 'Persis'; also that, had he been present, they had not a single witness available to prove the circumstances of the alleged contraventions. They deliberately took advantage of the complainer's absence to obtain an unfounded conviction against him. Further, on the complainer's subsequent apprehension, they obtained from him payment of the penalty and expenses, in manner above set forth, well knowing that he was ignorant of his right to have the cause reheard,* and they failed to inform him of his said right, as they were bound to have done. And finally, when the complainer did discover his right to a rehearing, the respondents prevented him from getting the benefit of that right by pleading that the decree had been fully implemented."

* See section 539 of Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, infra, footnote to p. 69.

No. 23.

Mar. 29, 1892.
Simpson v.
Board of Trade.

Argued for the complainer;—(1) This was a case of gross oppression; although the Sheriff could not entertain a plea of that kind, the Court were entitled to do so.¹ (2) The Sheriff had no jurisdiction to entertain the case. The charge was brought under the 255th section of the Merchant Shipping Act,[†] and the alleged offences were said to have been committed at Brisbane and at Melbourne. It was not stated that they were offences by the laws of these places. No doubt section 109 of the Act enacted that the 255th and other sections in the part of the Act dealing with "masters and seamen" should apply "to all sea-going British ships wherever registered of which the crews are discharged, or whose final port of destination is in the United Kingdom, and to the owners, masters, and crews of such ships." But it did not appear, and was nowhere enacted, that these provisions applied to the colonies. The "legislative authorities in any British possession" had power under the 288th section of the Act to apply or adapt them to any British ships "registered at, trading with, or being at any place within their respective jurisdictions," but there was nothing libelled to shew that this had been done. In any view this argument was applicable to the first offence which was charged as having been committed at Brisbane. (3) No statutory offence under the 255th section had been set forth. There was no fraudulent device libelled, and no facts and circumstances alleged to shew that the statement made had been wilful or fraudulent. The complaint really proceeded upon the assumption that it was a contravention of the statute for a seaman to change his name under any circumstances. No one was named as having been defrauded; further, it was not said that the alleged false statements had been made to anyone. The complaint therefore did not in law justify a ¹ Mackenzie v. Macphee, Jan. 28, 1889, 2 White, 188, L. J.-C. Moncreiff, 216, 16 R. (Just. Cases) 53; Ritchie v. Pilmer, Dec. 20, 1848, John Shaw's Reps. 132.

* The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 539, enacted that "if a defender who has been duly cited shall not appear at the time and place required by the citation he shall be held as confessed, and sentence or decree shall be pronounced against him in terms of the complaint, with such costs and expenses as to the Court shall seem fit; provided always that he shall be entitled to obtain himself reponed against any such decree at any time before the same be fully implemented by lodging with the Clerk of Court a reponing note," &c.

† The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 255, enacted,—“If any seaman on or before being engaged . . . wilfully and fraudulently makes a false statement of his own name, he shall incur a penalty not exceeding £5. . . .”

No. 23.

Mar. 29, 1892.
Simpson v.
Board of Trade.

conviction.¹ (4) Further, the instance was defective. The 531st section of the Act provided that in Scotland prosecutions were to be brought in a summary way "at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Court, or at the instance of any party aggrieved, with concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal of Court."* There was no statement to the effect that the Board of Trade had been in any way aggrieved. Accordingly, the prosecution must necessarily be at the instance of the procurator-fiscal. It had been long settled that his concurrence was not enough when his instance was required.² This complaint was at the instance of the Board of Trade, for which there was no warrant in the Act. (5) The complaint and conviction were fundamentally bad. Neither contained any statement of the alternative penalty to imprisonment, failing payment, viz., "execution by arrestment, poinding and sale" as provided by section 18, subsection 6 of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864,† and by the 538th section of the Merchant Shipping Act itself.‡ It might be that diligence was inex-

¹ Kidger v. Macphee, Nov. 22, 1888, 2 White, 107, 16 R. (Just. Cases) 24; Nelson v. M'Phee, Oct. 17, 1889, 2 White, 307, 17 R. (Just. Cases) 1; Rae v. Linton, Dec. 11, 1874, 3 Couper, 67, 2 R. (Just. Cases) 17.

* The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 531, provided,—“In Scotland all prosecutions, complaints, actions, or proceedings under this Act, other than prosecutions for felonies or misdemeanours, may be brought in a summary form before the Sheriff of the county, or before any two Justices of the Peace of the county or burgh where the cause of such prosecution or action arises, or where the offender or defender may be for the time, and when of a criminal nature or for penalties, at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Court, or at the instance of any party aggrieved, with concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal of Court; and the Court may, if it think fit, order payment by the offender or defender of the costs of the prosecution or action.”

² Mitchell v. Scott, June 24, 1873, Arkley, 315.

† The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, sec. 18, enacted,—“In cases of conviction or judgment against the respondent in prosecutions and proceedings under this Act, the sentence of the Court may be in one or other of the forms contained in the Schedule (K) to this Act annexed, or as nearly as may be in such form according to the nature and circumstances of the complaint, viz., . . .

“(6) In complaints for the contravention of any Act of Parliament under which the accused is or shall be liable to a penalty, and where no special provision is made for the recovery thereof, or for the substitution of a term of imprisonment in default of payment, and also in cases where, under the authority of any Act of Parliament, such penalty is or shall be recoverable by action, civil process, or diligence, the judgment of the Court shall authorise execution by arrestment, poinding and sale, and imprisonment (unless recovery by imprisonment is excluded by the terms of the Act), and may be in the form No. 6 in the said schedule . . . and no warrant of imprisonment shall be issued upon a judgment in such form until after the period allowed for execution by arrestment or poinding, except in the event mentioned in the said form No. 6.”

Schedule K, No. 6, supplied the form of a conviction with warrant for poinding and sale, and a form of warrant for imprisonment to be used after the officer's report. Then followed this note:—“If at the hearing it shall appear that the issuing of a warrant of arrestment, poinding, and sale would be inexpedient, then, in place of the warrant annexed to the judgment in the preceding form, say: And in respect it is inexpedient to issue a warrant of poinding and sale [or of arrestment, poinding, and sale], ordain instant execution by imprisonment, and grant warrant to officers of Court to apprehend,” &c.

‡ The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 538, provided,—“In Scotland all sentences and decrees to be pronounced by the Sheriff or Justices of the Peace upon such summary complaints shall be in writing; and where there is a decree for payment of any sum or sums of money against a defender, such decree shall contain warrant for arrestment, poinding, and imprisonment in default of payment, pedient, but in that case under the section the Sheriff was bound to have applied his mind to it, which he had not done.¹ Imprisonment for debts under £3, 6s. 8d. was abolished by the Act 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 70, and the penalties here being limited to £5 each, imprisonment was incompetent.²

No. 23.

Mar. 29, 1892.

Simpson v.

Board of Trade.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) There had been no incompetency in the procedure in the case. A contravention of the 255th section of the Merchant Shipping Act had been charged, and the complainer not having appeared as required by his citation, was “held as confessed” in terms of the 539th section. Under the 542d section all sentences “pronounced under the authority of this Act” were final, and the only review permissible was on the ground either of corruption or malice “within fourteen days of the date of the order, decree, or sentence complained of.” All the arguments which could be stated against the conviction had been urged before the Sheriff on the reponing note, and whether the Sheriff was right or wrong, his judgment was final under the 542d section of the Act.³ (2) On the question of title, the 531st section of the Merchant Shipping Act enacted that the procurator-fiscal, or the party aggrieved, with his concurrence, “may” bring a complaint in a summary way. Assuming that that section by itself did not justify the Board of Trade in bringing this complaint with the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal, it was further provided by the 6th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1853 that the Board of Trade were the department who were “to carry into execution the provisions” of the Act, and by the 31st section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1873 (36 and 37 Vict. c. 85), it was provided that “in any legal proceedings under these Acts the Board of Trade may take proceedings in the name of any of their officers.” The present instance was therefore all that was required.⁴ (3) On the question of jurisdiction, the contravention charged was contained in Part III. of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1853, relating to masters and seamen, and by section 109 Part III. of the Act applied to all ships registered in the United Kingdom, and in any British possession “wherever the same may be,” and by section 520 “every offence shall be deemed to have been committed in any place in which the offender may be.” Further, by section 531 any prosecution may be brought “where the offender may be for the time.” By section 543, it was provided that the general provisions, with respect to jurisdiction, so far as not inconsistent with the special rules for the conduct of legal proceedings and the recovery of penalties in Scotland should extend to proceedings and penalties in that country.⁵ (4) In regard to the sentence which had been pronounced, the warrant for it was to be found in section 538 of the statute, and in section 18 (6) and Schedule K of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864. Under the form of sentence given in Schedule K (3) of the latter Act, imprisonment came in lieu and in default of the penalty. The debt in question was not to be treated as a civil debt, and imprisonment was really an alternative to the fine.⁶ The words “shall authorise execution by arrestment” in the 6th such arrestment, poinding, or imprisonment to be carried into effect by sheriffs-officers or constables, as the case may be, in the same manner as in cases arising under the ordinary jurisdiction in the Sheriff or Justices.”

¹ Thomson v. Wardlaw, Jan. 23, 1865, 5 Irvine, 45; Galt v. Ritchie, July 16, 1873, 2 Couper, 470.

² Walker v. Trades Lane Co., Dec. 22, 1865, 4 Macph. 268, 38 Scot. Jur. 143.

³ Moncreiff's Review in Criminal Cases, 247, 300.

⁴ M'Kelvie v. Barr, Dec. 3, 1860, 3 Irv. 631, 33 Scot. Jur. 48.

⁵ Regina v. Lopez, 1858, 7 Cox. C. C. 431.

⁶ Moncreiff's Review in Criminal Cases, p. 19; Lawson v. Jopp, Feb. 16, 1853, 15 D. 392, 2 Scot. Jur. 236.

No. 23. subsection of section 18 of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, were equivalent to "do not exclude," and ought not to be extended further.¹
 Mar. 29, 1892. At advising,—
 Simpson v. Board of Trade.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—This being a sentence pronounced or purporting to be pronounced by the Sheriff in Scotland under the authority of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, it is protected by a very strong clause, sec. 542, which renders such decrees final except upon a very few and narrow specified grounds. But it was very properly admitted by Mr Mackenzie that in order to give any sentence or decree that protection it is necessary that it should be pronounced within the limits of the statute, and accordingly this sentence is impeached by the complainant upon certain grounds, review upon which is not excluded by section 542.

I shall mention four points which have been raised by Mr M'Lennan, and I take first, merely because he first opened upon that, the allegation of oppression. I do not think that the case on this head is made out even on the statements by the learned counsel for the appellant. The officials of the Board of Trade seem to have acted with zeal in this matter, probably because a high estimate had been formed of the importance of the case, higher perhaps than might have been formed by those who were less conversant with the departmental working of the system. But I do not think, and it is right perhaps, especially in dealing with a department of Government, to say that I do not think the case of oppression has been made out.

The next point is raised as to the jurisdiction of the Court. Now, the jurisdiction which has been exercised on this occasion is a highly artificial one, and it is somewhat singular that the circumstance that the vessel "Grasmere," which was at Brisbane in December 1890, was a registered ship at Melbourne, which is within the jurisdiction of another Colonial Government, is really the point which founds the jurisdiction of the Sheriff-substitute of the counties of Renfrew and Bute. But one can quite understand the concatenation of causes which render it possible for jurisdiction thus and there to be exercised, because the fact that a merchant ship is out of the jurisdiction of its own Government makes it at all events highly intelligible, and probably highly expedient, that the supereminent power of the British law should afford a remedy against the violation of provisions which by the clauses referred to by Mr Mackenzie are distinctly applied to that class of ships. Therefore, without going further into this, I think the attack upon jurisdiction has failed.

But then it is further alleged that this complaint is not a statutory proceeding under the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, because it is a complaint, not of a procurator-fiscal or a person alleging himself to be aggrieved, with the consent of the procurator-fiscal, but it is a complaint of the Board of Trade for Great Britain and Ireland with the consent and concurrence of the procurator-fiscal. Now, I may say at the outset I believe it to be quite settled that the mere consent and concurrence of the procurator-fiscal will not supply the place of his instance if his instance be a statutory requirement for such a prosecution. When one turns to inquire what is the right of the Board of Trade to prosecute in such a complaint, it appears that the area for discussion is limited to the two clauses—clauses 531 and 6—of the Act. Clause 6 gives to the Board of Trade in very general terms the power of superintendence of the provisions of the Act. The words are,—“The Board of Trade shall be the department to undertake the general superintendence of matters relating to merchant ships and seamen, and shall be authorised to carry into execution the provisions of this Act and of all other Acts relating to merchant ships and seamen in force for the time being, other than such Acts as relate to the revenue." But when we come to what after all is merely a portion of a comparatively limited part of the Act,—namely, legal procedure,—we find that there is a series of clauses devoted to legal procedure in Scotland which contain very specific provisions as to the mode of prosecuting offences, and when we come to this complaint one naturally asks—What is the authority for a summary complaint for the punishment of offences created by this statute? The answer to that is section 531. Now, the substantive enactment of section 531 is, that complaints "other than prosecutions for felonies or misdemeanours may be brought in a summary form before the Sheriff." In short, this section is one which legalises summary prosecutions for offences created by the Act.

¹ Murray v. Jones, June 17, 1872, 2 Couper, 284.

No. 23.
Mar. 29, 1892.
Simpson v.
Board of Trade.

The prescribed condition of a summary prosecution seems to be this, that it shall be at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Court, or at the instance of any party aggrieved, with concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal of Court. It has been pointed out by the counsel for the Board of Trade that the section is permissive, and that is quite true. But what it permits is summary prosecutions, and as one of the terms and qualities and conditions of the prosecution it secures this, that the summary prosecution which is authorised is a summary prosecution at the instance of the procurator-fiscal, or of a party aggrieved, with the consent of the procurator-fiscal. Now, this is not a complaint at the instance of the procurator-fiscal, but at the instance of the Board of Trade, and I find it impossible, where we have a specific provision relating to this limited subject-matter of summary prosecutions, to hold that to be over-ridden by a very general clause which concerns administration primarily and not prosecution—I mean clause 6.

We are familiar with the fact that the Legislature has, especially in more modern Acts than this, authorised prosecution at the instance of some of the Government departments. But then that may be a most appropriate provision, and I should not at all have questioned the propriety of a clause in this Act which enabled the Board of Trade to prosecute for what are really departmental offences. But here we must limit ourselves to the provisions of the Act which is founded upon, and this Act does not contain a power to the department to act as prosecutor. I rather think that the counsel for the Board of Trade did not press seriously the suggestion that the Board of Trade might be regarded as a party aggrieved. I think it is quite clear that the Board of Trade is not a party aggrieved in the sense of this statute, which plainly enough refers to individuals aggrieved. It would be a most extraordinary and unwarrantable stretch of such language to represent the department of Government which was concerned with the administration of the Act as aggrieved by the violation of some of its provisions. I think that quite untenable, and if it were needful to pursue the idea, there is no allegation of grievance in this complaint, and I do not think that on the statute itself the mere contravention of one of the provisions constitutes a grievance in the sense of this Act, or that the Board of Trade can be fairly described as a party aggrieved. Therefore I am bound to say that I think that this complaint is bad, and that this is a defect entering completely into the essence of the proceedings and fatally vitiating them. An objection of this kind is not excluded by the wide terms of sec-

No. 23.
Mar. 29, 1892.
Simpson v.
Board of Trade.

tion 542, because if the view I have stated be well founded, this was not a proceeding under the Act founded upon.

That is enough for the decision of the case, because the conviction must be quashed. But another point has been argued to us, and I think the parties are entitled to our judgment upon it. It is pointed out that this conviction adjudges the person complained against to forfeit and pay a sum of £10 of penalty with £1, 10s. expenses, and in default of immediate payment thereof, adjudges him to be imprisoned for the space of thirty days. Now, I think that that is an error, and I think again that it is a fatal error. The Act does not authorise the imposition of a penalty with imprisonment failing immediate payment; it authorises the Judge in certain cases to pronounce a sentence of that kind, but only in certain cases. The normal and appointed procedure—and here I am referring to the Summary Procedure Act as well as the Act immediately before us, namely, the Act of 1854—is the imposition of a penalty, and failing payment of the penalty, execution by arrestment and poinding, and then, and only then, imprisonment. Now, what the Sheriff has done is—he has missed out the intervening remedy of ordering execution by arrestment and poinding, and his sentence expressly bears that unless the complainer pays, imprisonment shall follow without any attempt being made to recover by arrestment and poinding. Now, how is the matter dealt with in the Summary Procedure Act of 1864? It is agreed that we are under the 6th subsection of section 18, and that the part of Schedule K which has been referred to applies to the case in hand. The effect of the section and the schedule taken together is this, that if at the hearing, as the schedule says, it shall appear that the issuing of a warrant of arrestment and poinding and sale would be inexpedient, then in place of the warrant the magistrate may order imprisonment. Now, the learned counsel for the Board of Trade very properly admitted that if the magistrate proposes to make imprisonment follow immediately on the failure to pay, he must apply his mind to that question, and must consider whether the circumstances of the case warrant the omission of the intermediate remedy. That admission, which is a most appropriate one to have made, because it is inevitable from the terms of the statutory enactments, brings us to this point, that here is an essential part of a sentence pronounced which does not appear on the face of the sentence itself. The case as we now have it is that the magistrate has felt himself entitled to depart from the normal and proceed to the abnormal form of sentence, and that he has not set out in the sentence anything about the consideration of that question. Now, I find that under the Act which we have to construe all sentences must be in writing, and the sentence of imprisonment, which is only authorised in the circumstances which I have described as specified in the statute, is not in writing, because the term and condition upon which it is made to follow is not to be found in the sentence at all. The schedule of the Act of 1864 may be departed from so as to adapt the case to circumstances which are not provided for or directly contemplated by the statute, but it may not be departed from when the state of the facts is exactly that contemplated by the Act, and where we are asked to assume that the Sheriff has considered a question which he has omitted even to mention in his sentence. Therefore, in my opinion, that is a fatal objection to the sentence; and I think it a matter of high importance that magistrates should not abridge the number of steps by which imprisonment is reached as a punishment of a statutory offence. In this case, for aught that appears, this £10 might have been recovered by an arrest-ment and poinding, and no necessity have arisen for imprisonment. I mention that, however, merely as illustrating the expedience and importance of the statutory provisions. Upon this, therefore, as well as upon the bad instance, I think the conviction must be quashed.

No. 23.

Mar. 29, 1892,
Simpson v.
Board of Trade.

LORD ADAM.—This is a complaint brought at the instance of the Board of Trade with consent of the Procurator-fiscal of the Sheriff Court of the Lower Ward of Lanarkshire, against a seaman of the name of Simpson for contravening the 255th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854. That clause provides,—"If any seaman on or before being engaged wilfully and fraudulently makes a false statement of the name of his last ship, . . . or wilfully and fraudulently makes a false statement of his own name, he shall incur a penalty not exceeding £5." It is the last branch of that clause that the suspender here is said to have contravened. Now, the case was followed by conviction in these terms—[reads.] Of course these proceedings are protected, as your Lordship has pointed out, by very strict clauses against appeal, and there is no appeal, generally speaking, on the merits. Mr M'Lennan, for the suspender, stated, I think, four or five different objections to the proceedings which had taken place; and I must say with reference to all of these objections, if well founded, I think they lead to the result that this conviction should be set aside, because they all go to shew that the proceedings complained of were not taken under the authority of the Act, and that they could not have been protected by the Act.

The first of these objections was that in this matter the Board of Trade, the complainers, had acted with gross oppression. I concur with your Lordship that there is no case of oppression, and I need not say any more about it.

The next point was that the Sheriff Court of Renfrewshire had no jurisdiction to try the case. As I understand Mr M'Lennan, that was upon this ground, that both the acts complained of which were alleged to have been contraventions of the Act were committed in a colony, Australia, and that the Sheriff of Renfrewshire had no jurisdiction over an offence committed out of his territorial jurisdiction. I agree with your Lordship that the Act does confer jurisdiction upon the Sheriff just as if the offence had been committed in his own jurisdiction. I do not think that is a good objection.

The next objection is that the complaint does not set forth any statement of a statutory offence. It is said that the complaint merely repeated the statutory words of complaint, but did not set forth any particular facts and circumstances to shew that the statement alleged to have been made had been wilful and fraudulent. It is in all cases a question of circumstances whether the party complained of has fair notice of the charge against him. I confess that in such cases as this I do not see that anything else was required, and I should not have proposed to have sustained the objection on that ground.

That brings us to what is the most serious plea to be dealt with in this case, namely, whether under the 531st section of this Act the Board of Trade was entitled to insist upon this complaint. Upon that matter I agree with your Lordship. It is said to be the practice in England that the Board of Trade prosecutes. I am not familiar with prosecutions in England, and that matter has no influence upon my mind. We are here dealing with Scottish legal procedure, and we must apply it to the circumstances of this case. This is a summary prosecution taken under the Summary Procedure Act of 1864. Now, the 531st section of the Act which authorises such procedure is this—[reads.]

No. 23.

Mar. 29, 1892.
Simpson v.
Board of Trade.

This complaint is not at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Court; and if it is not at his instance, then, according to this section, it must be at the instance of a party aggrieved, with the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal. Now, the Board of Trade does not appear to be a party aggrieved. I think it is idle to say that a public body in the meaning of this section is a party aggrieved by the proceedings here. I concur with your Lordship that the 6th section of the Act, which gives general powers to the Board of Trade, cannot, and did not, apply to this particular section, which specifies the parties at whose instance, and it appears to me at whose instance only, proceedings can be taken. I agree with your Lordship on that ground also, that the Board of Trade have no title to insist in this complaint; and that being so, it is clearly not protected by the section of the Act which has been referred to.

That leaves only the last ground, which was an objection both to the form of the complaint and the form of the sentence. It is founded, as I understand, upon the terms of the Summary Procedure Act and the 538th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, which enacts,—“In Scotland all sentences and decrees to be pronounced by the Sheriff or Justices of the Peace upon such summary complaints shall be in writing; and where there is a decree for payment of any sum or sums of money against a defender, such decree shall contain warrant for arrestment, poinding, and imprisonment in default of payment, such arrestment, poinding, or imprisonment to be carried into effect by sheriffs-officers or constables, as the case may be, in the same manner as in cases arising under the ordinary jurisdiction in the Sheriff or Justices.” The objection to the form of the complaint was that the suspender was entitled to have all the alternatives set forth which it was competent for the Sheriff to inflict, and that it was bad because it should have set forth that failing payment the sum might be recovered by arrestment and poinding, and that it was only in default of that that the Sheriff was entitled to imprison. And the same objection applies to the conviction, which sets forth,—“In absence, convicts the said Thomas Simpson of the contraventions charged, and therefore adjudges him to forfeit and pay the sum of £10 of penalty, with £1, 10s. of expenses, and in default of immediate payment thereof, adjudges him to be imprisoned for the space of thirty days from the date of his imprisonment, unless said sums shall be sooner paid, and grants warrant to officers of the law to apprehend and convey the said Thomas Simpson to the prison of Greenock, thereafter to be dealt with in due course of law.” As your Lordship has pointed out, the Sheriff is entitled to find so and so liable for so and so, and failing payment, that there shall be arrestment and execution by poinding, and following that imprisonment. But there is a dispensing power to the Sheriff if it shall appear that a warrant of arrestment and poinding would not be expedient; and the objection here is that it does not appear on the face of this conviction that the Sheriff followed the terms pointed out to him in the Act, and that there is nothing to shew that he ever applied his mind to the circumstances, or that he knew that it was necessary for him to do so. Probably, as Mr M'Lennan said, the form of the complaint misled him. I think this is a good objection; I think it is fatal to the conviction that it does not set forth what it was required to set forth.

LORD M'LAREN.—It is necessary that we should keep in view in disposing of this suspension that the subject-matter of the prosecution has been withdrawn altogether from our cognisance. These regulations of the Merchant Shipping Act, although very important to commercial interests, are not considered as likely to raise questions of legal difficulty suitable for the determination of the High Court of Justiciary, and accordingly the administration of this branch of the penal law is committed entirely to Sheriffs and magistrates, and no review is permitted. Accordingly, if it should appear that this is a case brought under the Merchant Shipping Act, we have no power to review it. If, on the other hand, it appears that the case has not been brought in the exercise of the powers of that statute, it is equally clear that we may review the sentence on its merits, because it is admitted that there is no common law jurisdiction on the part of the Sheriff to try offences of this character. Now, in order that the prosecution may truly represent this as a case under the statute, it must appear that we have a prosecutor of the character contemplated by the statute, a complaint in terms of the statute, and a conviction in accordance with the sentence which the statute authorises. The exception that is taken to the proceedings is on the ground that every one of these requisites is wanting.

No. 23.
Mar. 29, 1892.
Simpson v.
Board of Trade.

I shall consider the points, as your Lordships have done, very briefly in this order.

On the first point I am clearly of opinion that we have not a prosecutor under the statute. It is perfectly useless for the purposes of this case to consider how prosecutions under the Merchant Shipping Act are to be conducted in England and Ireland, or the colonies, because under the 531st section the mode of prosecution in the Courts of Scotland is prescribed, and the prosecutor is to be either the procurator-fiscal or a party aggrieved. Now, we only know of two titles to prosecution, namely, private interest and public interest, and each of these is recognised in the section. If a shipowner, for instance, could qualify a case of patrimonial injury through some wrong done to him by a sailor contrary to the Act, no doubt he would have a title to prosecute, but it is clear enough that the Board of Trade have sustained no patrimonial injury. The interest which they very properly seek to safeguard is the public interest, and while it may be very right that such prosecutions should be promoted by the Board of Trade they can only do so by making representations to the proper department of the Crown Office, and calling for a prosecution in the public interest in the manner prescribed by the Act. That ground of decision would be quite sufficient to support the appeal, because a defect in the prosecutor's title goes to nullify the whole proceedings.

On the question of the relevancy of the case, I am not disposed to apply a more critical test to summary prosecutions under the statute than we should apply to indictments in our own Court. Now, as it is no longer necessary to use the words falsely and fraudulently in an indictment in this Court, I hardly think it can be necessary in a complaint under the statute to set forth the circumstances constituting the fraud, which is no longer considered to be a necessary ingredient in an indictment or complaint. Therefore, seeing that the time and place are properly set out, and that the defender had all the information given to him necessary to enable him to prepare for his defence, I should think this is a good complaint. With regard to the conviction, I agree with your Lordships that it is very important, wherever imprisonment is immediately or contingently authorised as part of a sentence, that a Judge should take care not to exceed the limits which the statute authorises. That becomes especially important where the penalty in the first place is a pecuniary penalty, because imprisonment for debt in the general case having been abolished, it may very

No. 23.

Mar. 29, 1892.
Simpson v.
Board of Trade.

well be that it is not intended by the Legislature to authorise imprisonment as a mode of recovering a penalty until other and milder measures have been tried. Now, under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, wherever it is ascertained from the special statute that the penalty is to be recoverable as a civil debt, then the sentence is to contain a warrant of arrestment and poinding, imprisonment being authorised only as an ultimate remedy failing recovery of the penalty by other means. But to meet the case of a man who is known to be impecunious a dispensing power is given to the Judge to dispense with arrestment and poinding so that imprisonment may immediately follow. I am of opinion that the Sheriff has no power to omit this part of the sentence—I mean the words dispensing with poinding and sale—because it must appear from the sentence that he has applied his mind to the case and has been satisfied that this is a case for immediate imprisonment, and not one where poinding should first be tried. We are told in this case that the sailor had money to pay the penalty, and that there were wages due which could have been recovered in the hands of the employer and the penalty paid. I think there is here also such a variation in the sentence from that authorised by the statute that we cannot consider this as a sentence in terms of the statute which would be final and not subject to review.

On these grounds I am of opinion that this bill of suspension must be allowed and the sentence suspended.

THE COURT accordingly quashed the conviction.

MILLER & MURRAY, S.S.C.—DAVID TURNBULL, W.S.—Agents.

No. 24.

May 23, 1892.
Lamb v.
Threshie.

DAVID LAMB, Complainer.—Comrie Thomson—Rhind.
JOHN MORTON THRESHIE, Respondent.—Dickson—Maconochie.

Process—Competency—The Lotteries Act, 1823 (4 Geo. IV. cap. 60), sec. 67—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. c. 53), sec. 3, subsec. 2.—The Lotteries Act, 1823, provides by sec. 67, that “If any person shall be brought before any two or more Justices of the Peace, . . . where any offence against this Act shall have been committed, and shall be convicted . . . and shall be adjudged a rogue and vagabond, then and in every such case such Justices shall . . . order such offender to be sent to the house of correction . . .” for a space of not more than six months, nor less than one month.

The Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sec. 3, subsec. 2, authorises proceedings to be taken under the forms of that Act in every case in which a person has committed any offence for which “under the provisions of any Act of Parliament he is liable upon summary conviction before any . . . Justices or Justice to be imprisoned or fined or otherwise punished.”

Held that offenders against the Lotteries Act, 1823, were liable to summary conviction in the sense of sec. 3, subsec. 2 of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, and that therefore it was competent to prosecute them under the latter Act.

Bute v. Moir, Nov. 24, 1870, 9 Macph. 180, 1 Couper, 495, distinguished.

Observations on the meaning of the words “summary procedure.”

Process—Lottery—Lotteries Act, 1823 (4 Geo. IV. c. 60), secs. 41, 62, and 67.—The Lotteries Act, 1823, sec. 41, provides that if any person shall sell a ticket or chance in any but an authorised lottery, such person “shall for every such offence forfeit and pay the sum of £50, and shall also be deemed a rogue and vagabond . . . and shall be punished as such in the manner herein-after directed.”

Section 62 provides that prosecutions in Scotland for pecuniary penalties under this Act shall only proceed at the instance of Her Majesty’s Advocate, and before the Court of Exchequer.

Section 67 provides that if any person shall be brought before two Justices under the Act, and “shall be convicted of any offence or offences against this Act by such Justices, and shall be adjudged a rogue and vagabond, then such Justices shall, and they are hereby required to order such offender to be sent to the house of correction " for a space of not more than six months, nor less than one month. No. 24

—
May 23, 1892.

In a suspension of a conviction by two Justices of a contravention of the Act it was contended that the Justices were only entitled to proceed in cases where the Court of Exchequer had already declared the accused to be a rogue and a vagabond. Held that the Justices had an independent jurisdiction to try offences against the Act under section 67, and that the conviction was valid. Lamb v.
Threshie.

ON 13th February 1892 David Lamb was served with a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of the Justice of Peace Court of the county of Lanark. The complaint set forth that the accused had been guilty of an offence within the meaning of the Act 4 Geo. IV. cap. 60, entitled "An Act for granting to His Majesty a sum of money to be raised by lotteries," so far as the same has not been repealed, and particularly sections 41 and 67* thereof, in so far as on the 26th of January 1892, and within the "tent occupied by him at or near to Bridgeton Cross, in the city of Glasgow and county of Lanark, he did sell to each of Alexander Gordon and David Winter, detective officers in Glasgow, one ticket or chance in a lottery not authorised by the Act of Parliament aforesaid or by any other Act of Parliament to be sold, viz., one ticket or chance, number 1910, to the said Alexander Gordon, and one ticket or chance, number 322, to the said David Winter, in a lottery in which six prizes of 10s. each, six prizes of 5s. each, and twelve prizes of 2s. 6d. each were put up, which lottery was then and there drawn. Such offence is the first offence, whereby the said David Lamb is liable to be deemed a rogue and vagabond and to be sent to the house of correction, there to remain for any space of time not exceeding six calendar months, nor less than one calendar month." The case was tried before two Justices of the Peace for the county of Lanark. HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Kin-
cairney.
Ld. Stormonth
Darling.
Justiciary
Clerk.

After evidence led the accused was convicted of the offence charged, and adjudged a rogue and vagabond, and sentenced to imprisonment for a period of one calendar month.

Lamb presented a bill of suspension and liberation to the High Court, in which he, inter alia, stated as follows:—"It was and is incompetent for the Justice of Peace Court to entertain a complaint such as that pre-

* 4 Geo. IV. cap. 60, sec. 41, provides,— "And be it further enacted that if any person or persons shall sell any ticket or tickets, chance, or chances, share or shares of any ticket or tickets, chance or chances in any lottery or lotteries authorised by any foreign potentate or state, or to be drawn in any foreign country, or in any lottery or lotteries, except such as are or shall be authorised by this or some other Act of Parliament to be sold, or shall publish any proposal or scheme for the sale of any ticket or tickets, chance or chances, share or shares of any ticket or tickets, chance or chances, except such lottery or lotteries as shall be authorised as aforesaid . . . such person or persons shall for every such offence forfeit and pay the sum of £50, and shall also be deemed a rogue and vagabond, or rogues and vagabonds, and shall be punished as such in the manner hereinafter directed."

Section 67 provides,— "That if any person shall be brought before any two or more Justices of the Peace for the county, city, liberty or place where any offence against this Act shall have been committed, and shall be convicted of any offence or offences against this Act by such Justices, and shall be adjudged a rogue and vagabond, then and in every such case such Justices shall, and they are hereby required to order such offender to be sent to the house of correction, there to remain for any space of time not exceeding six calendar months, nor less than one calendar month." The section further provided that the proceedings should not be subject to appeal.

No. 24.
 May 23, 1892.
 Lamb v.
 Threshie.

ferred against the complainer. No jurisdiction is conferred upon the Justices by statute to try such a case, and they have no jurisdiction at common law. In dealing with lotteries, the Justices only possess a restricted jurisdiction, the terms of which must be specified as qualifying conviction of an accused. The Court of Exchequer is the Court of first instance, and the Justice of Peace Court can only entertain and dispose of a complaint after the case has been tried in the Court of Exchequer,* and the jurisdiction of Justices of the Peace in such a case is strictly limited and administrative, amounting only to the power of inflicting the punishment provided by the statute.

Assuming the competency of the prosecution in the Justice of Peace Court antecedent to or independent of a prosecution in the Court of Exchequer, such prosecution is incompetent under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864,† or any statute subsequent thereto in date dealing with summary prosecution. The offence charged against the complainer is serious in character and involves most serious consequences to him, requiring, as it does, as a condition of conviction that, in addition to the punishment of imprisonment for a possible period of six months, he should be adjudged a rogue and vagabond—an adjudication which would attach to him a lifelong stigma and disgrace. There is nothing in the Summary Procedure Acts warranting such a prosecution, and the statute alleged to have been violated, the Lottery Act, does not authorise expressly or by implication summary prosecution. Summary prosecutions are limited to certain cases expressly provided for, and are not to be extended to cases to which they do not apply.

The complainer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) It being incompetent to charge the complainer with the offence preferred against him without ante omnia a prosecution and conviction in the Court of Exchequer in terms of the statute alleged to have been violated, it was incompetent for the Justices of the Peace to entertain the complaint against him, and the conviction and sentence following thereon ought to be suspended as

* 4 Geo. IV. cap. 60, sec. 62, provides,—“That all pecuniary penalties for any offence against this Act . . . shall when recovered go and be applied to the use of His Majesty, his heirs or successors; and from and after the commencement of this Act it shall not be lawful for any person or persons whatever . . . to commence or enter, or cause or procure to be commenced or entered, or filed, or prosecuted, any action, suit, bill, plaint, or information for the recovery of any pecuniary penalty or penalties inflicted by this Act, unless the same be commenced, entered, filed, and prosecuted in the name of His Majesty’s Attorney-General in the Court of Exchequer at Westminster if such offence shall be committed in England, . . . or in the name of His Majesty’s Advocate-General in the Court of Exchequer in Scotland if such offence shall be committed in Scotland; and if any action, suit, bill, plaint, or information shall be commenced or entered in any other person’s name or names than as is before mentioned, the same and all proceedings thereupon had are hereby declared to be null and void, and the said Court or Courts where such proceedings shall be so commenced shall cause the same to be stayed, any law, custom, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.”

† The Summary Procedure Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. c. 53), sec. 3, provides that the provisions of that Act may be applied to . . . “(2) All proceedings to be taken before any Sheriff, Justices, or Justice, or magistrate in Scotland for the prosecution of any person who has committed or is charged with having committed any offence or act for which, under the provisions of any Act of Parliament he is liable upon summary conviction before any Sheriff, magistrate, Justices, or Justice, to be imprisoned or fined, or otherwise punished, or to be ordered to do or perform any act, and to be imprisoned in default of performance.”

craved. (3) Assuming competency otherwise, it was incompetent to take proceedings for violation of the statute founded on under the Summary Procedure Acts, and therefore the whole proceedings ought to be suspended simpliciter. No. 24.
May 23, 1892.
Lamb v.
Threahie.

Argued for the complainer;—(1) The offence was not one which could competently be tried under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864. The respondent founded on subsection 2 of section 3, but that section was inapplicable. There was no provision in the Lotteries Act for trying the offence summarily, and further, the nature of the punishment enjoined excluded the notion of summary trial.¹ (2) It was incompetent to proceed before the Justices to have a person adjudged a rogue and vagabond for an offence under section 41 of the Lotteries Act, and punished under section 67, unless there was previous conviction and fine by the Court of Exchequer under the 62d section.²

Argued for the respondent;—It was competent to try this offence under the forms of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864. Offenders under the Lotteries Act could be convicted “summarily” before the Justices within the meaning of subsection 2 of section 3 of the Summary Procedure Act. It was true that the Lotteries Act did not expressly use the word “summary,” but the word was clearly implied. The Court which was to try offenders was prima facie a Court of summary jurisdiction, the procedure was of a summary nature, and review by appeal was excluded. That distinguished the case from that of Bute v. More, where the statutes against Sabbath profanation clearly anticipated a trial before a higher Court than the Justices, and further expressly provided for an appeal. Further, there was nothing in the nature or gravity of the punishment which made the cases under the Act unsuitable for summary trial. The Police Courts daily adjudged persons to be rogues and vagabonds, and there were various statutes under which Justices of the Peace could award a longer term of imprisonment than sixty days, e.g., the Apprentices Act, 4 Geo. IV. c. 34, and the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict. c. 112). Here the power to do so was expressly given. Lord Young’s view in M’Allister’s case was unsound. There was nothing in the Lottery Act to lead to the conclusion that proceedings in the Exchequer Court were a condition precedent to proceedings before the Justices. To give effect to Lord Young’s view would simply be to expunge section 67 out of the Act. Lord Adam’s opinion in the case was sound.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There are three points raised in this bill of suspension which are of importance and of some difficulty.

The first is that under the Act Geo. IV. cap. 60, it is provided that any person who sells tickets in any lottery shall forthwith pay a fine of £50, and shall also be deemed a rogue and vagabond, and be punished “in the manner hereinafter provided.”

By clause 62 of the Act it is provided that the penalty of £50 is only to be sued for and judgment given for it in the Court of Exchequer.

It is maintained on the part of the complainer that unless the person accused is first sued for the penalty of £50 proceedings cannot be taken against him for having him declared a rogue and vagabond, and for having him subjected to punishment. I think Mr Comrie Thomson and Mr Rhind went even further,

¹ Bute v. More, Nov. 24, 1870, 9 Macph. 180, 43 Scot. Jur. 65, 1 Couper, 495.

² M’Allister v. Douglas, March 20, 1878, 5 R. (Just. Cases) 30, 4 Couper, 28, per Lord Young, p. 37 of 4 Couper.

No. 24. and argued that it must be the Court of Exchequer which must find him to be a rogue and a vagabond.
May 23, 1892. I find no ground in the Act for holding, nor anything to indicate, that the two subclauses dealing with a person accused must be taken the one with the other, or indeed that both must be taken at all.
Lamb v. Threshie.

The Act prescribes that if there is a suit for a penalty it shall be a suit before the Court of Exchequer. It is quite clear that any proceedings for the recovery of the penalty of £50 before any other Court than the Court of Exchequer would have been incompetent.

I think that all the Court of Exchequer would do in such a case would be to find that there had been a contravention of the Act and to impose a penalty of £50, and the jurisdiction and functions of the Court would have been exhausted by that procedure.

On the other hand, section 67 of the Act provides that if any person is brought before two or more Justices for an offence against the Act, and shall be convicted of any offence or offences against the Act, and by such Justices should be adjudged a rogue and a vagabond, then and in every such case the Justices shall do certain things.

I find no indication whatever that the Justices, when a person is brought up for trial under section 67 of the Act, have anything to with the question whether there have been proceedings in the Court of Exchequer or not. In my opinion they would not be entitled to refuse to exercise their jurisdiction until they had ascertained whether the Court of Exchequer had done anything or not, nor would they be entitled to look at anything the Court of Exchequer had done if the jurisdiction of that Court had been invoked by the Lord Advocate.

Clause 67 says distinctly that the Justices are to try cases brought before them, and I see nothing to indicate that they are to do anything else than try the cases in the ordinary way, viz., they are to consider whether any offence against the Act has been committed, which of course they can only consider upon evidence led before themselves, and if they consider that the evidence justifies them in doing so, they must convict the accused.

I therefore have no doubt or difficulty whatever in holding that the Justices cannot be held to have acted illegally because no proceedings had previously been taken in the Court of Exchequer, and because no proceedings in that Court were placed before them.

It seems to me that the contention of the complainer simply amounts to this, that the Justices are only to act as an administrative body to inflict a punishment in respect of something which has been found by some other Court. That would be a most anomalous and absurd mode of dealing with a case, and a mode which, so far as I know, is utterly unknown in any Court procedure within this realm. It was contended that the Justices should have had brought before them the fact that the Court of Exchequer had held the accused guilty under clause 41 and had declared him a rogue and a vagabond, and that therefore they must punish him. That would be a procedure without any precedent, and it certainly would require very clear, distinct, and emphatic enactments in any Act of Parliament to induce any Court to hold that that was what was meant by its enactment. Therefore the first point which is based upon the argument that no case can be brought before the Justices until it has been previously brought before the Court of Exchequer, I set aside without difficulty.

The next point raised is that this case could not be tried under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. A great deal has been said by the complainer's counsel about the magnitude of the case and its very great importance to the parties, and the case of Bute has been founded upon. If I thought that it ruled this case, I should give effect to it. But I must say I see no resemblance between the two cases. In Bute's case the prosecutor endeavoured to charge certain persons with an offence against the laws relating to Sabbath-breaking, and to bring them within the jurisdiction of a summary Court by restricting the demand for penalties to a punishment suitable to the summary Court. The Court held that was not competent, and I am not surprised that they should have reached that result.

No. 24.

May 23, 1892.
Lamb v.
Threahie.

It was pointed out that many of the offences embraced in these Acts were offences of a serious kind to be dealt with by severe and—according to our present ideas—cruel methods of punishment, and as there was no Act of Parliament whereby such offences could be brought within the ordinary jurisdiction of the summary Courts, the Court held that it could not be so brought but must be raised on indictment before a jury. This case is the opposite, for I find that the Legislature has provided that the Court to try the case is not to be a Court with a jury, but the lowest Court in the scale of jurisdiction and importance.

It was said that the matter was of very vast importance to the accused, that it is a very serious thing to be stamped as a rogue and vagabond. These are arguments which might very well have been addressed to the Legislature by any Member of Parliament when the Act was passed or to the Legislature now, but they were not arguments which can have any weight whatever with this Court when it is seen that, great or small, the questions which might be raised in such cases are, by the express terms of the Act, to be remitted to the disposal of two Justices of the Peace. I can only say in addition that I do not see the great importance of the questions here raised. The question whether a man is to be declared a rogue and vagabond is a question which is decided every day in Courts of exactly similar jurisdiction to that of the Court prescribed by the Act of George IV. It is not a question which ever comes before a Court of superior jurisdiction, but a question really to be decided by the local magistrate upon an investigation conducted by himself.

To consider then the question whether this is a case under clause 67 of the Act of George IV. which could be tried in a summary manner under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts of 1864 to 1881, we are at once brought face to face with this, that in none of the statutes is there any definition whatever of the words "summary jurisdiction." It seems throughout all these Acts of Parliament to be assumed as perfectly well understood what the expressions "summary jurisdiction" and "summary prosecution" mean, and the Acts which have been passed had been intended to apply to a procedure already existing which went by the name of summary procedure.

Now, we have only three modes of criminal procedure in this country—one is trial by jury, applicable both to the Supreme Court and to the Sheriff Court. and although in one Court criminal letters were formerly used, still the formalities were exactly the same in both Courts, and now the form of indictment has been applied to all jury cases. The peculiarity of that procedure is that it is an indictment with a long inducias, with notice of the productions and the names of witnesses, and no conviction can follow against a citizen on evidence except

No. 24.
May 23, 1892.
Lamb v.
Threshie.

on the verdict of his peers. The second mode of trial took place upon six days' inducie before the Sheriff, a procedure which has never been abolished, but which has, I think, died a natural death, for during the last thirty years there has never been to my knowledge any case so conducted. And there remains a further jurisdiction, in which there are no inducie and no notice of witnesses, and so far as I know there is no other way in which one can explain the words "summary jurisdiction" or "summary procedure" except that it is a procedure on a complaint without inducie and without indictment, and further without any notice to the party of the names of the witnesses that are to be called against him, and the productions to be used in evidence, and without the accused being represented by legal advisers unless he chooses to provide himself with them. That is, I think, what is meant in the Acts of Parliament when they speak of summary procedure and summary jurisdiction.

Now, does the Court to which this offence is relegated fall within that category? I think it does. It is a Court in which one or more Justices are to sit, and there are in the Court of the Justices no inducie, no indictment, and no lists of productions or witnesses. The Act of 1864, which is a very comprehensive Act, was intended to regulate the procedure of all Courts of summary jurisdiction including Justice of Peace Courts; and subsection 2 of section 3 of that Act is the subsection applicable to this case. It seems to me, therefore, that all the procedure here was perfectly general and correct.

It was made part of the complainant's case that the Act of Parliament was only an old remnant of an old Act of Parliament passed to protect the public revenue, which at that time was aided by Government lotteries. The object of the original Act undoubtedly was to secure the King's revenue at a time when it was not thought improper for the Crown through its advisers to carry on lotteries for the purpose of raising money; that was long ago put an end to, but Parliament has seen fit to retain upon the statute book that clause constituting it an offence to carry on lotteries. The Legislature undoubtedly thought that in repealing the other parts of the statute it was for the public weal that the parts of the statute making lotteries illegal should be retained, so that individuals should not carry on money lotteries, as was apparently done in this case.

I have come without any real doubt or difficulty to the conclusion that this conviction must stand as being a summary conviction under the Act of 1864, against the form and substance of which nothing can be alleged.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I am of the same opinion. On the question whether the proceedings should have commenced in the Court of Exchequer, I concur with your Lordship, and also in the opinion of Lord Adam in the case of M'Allister, whose reasoning I consider conclusive and take leave to adopt.

The question as to the competency of proceeding under the Summary Procedure Act is to my mind considerably more difficult. It appeared in the argument to be brought to this, whether the case falls under subsection 2 of section 3 of the Act of 1864, and that question seems to come to this, whether prior to the Summary Procedure Act a person charged with the offence under the Lottery Act of which the complainant has been convicted would have been liable to summary conviction. If he would have been liable, then the subsection applies, and the forms of the Summary Procedure Acts are thereby rendered competent. If he would not, the subsection does not apply, and the objection would fall to be sustained. I think we must hold that a person charged in a Justice of Peace Court prior to the Procedure Act would have been liable to summary conviction. A Justice of Peace Court is, generally speaking, essentially a Court of summary jurisdiction, and its ordinary procedure is summary. I incline to think that convictions by Justices might, without impropriety, be termed summary convictions. When the statute commits the trial of offences which it creates to Justices of the Peace, the implication is that they may deal with them by summary conviction according to their usual practice. The exclusion of appeal also is characteristic of summary procedure. We have no information that Justices of the Peace have been in the custom of disposing of such cases where the complaint is proved in any other way than summarily. It may be that in some cases written pleadings may be usual or proper, and that other cases—I suppose a great majority—are disposed of without pleadings. We have no information as to that before us. But even in a case where there have been or should have been such pleadings, it appears to me that a conviction might not the less be properly termed a summary conviction.

We were referred to the case of Bute v. More. It appears to me, however, that that case does not apply. The particular offence charged in that case was held unsuitable for summary trial. Possibly it could not have been tried by Justices of the Peace at all. The offence here is of a totally different kind, and it really appears to me impossible to hold that an offence is unsuitable for summary trial for which the Justice of Peace Court is the selected statutory tribunal.

LORD STORMONTH DARLING.—I concur, and have only a word or two to add. The only question of difficulty, as it seems to me, is, whether this case falls under subsection 2 of section 3 of the Summary Procedure Act of 1864,—that is to say, whether the Lottery Act itself made offenders against it liable to summary conviction.

Now, as to that I am mainly influenced by two considerations. In the first place, the Act directs that proceedings shall be taken before two Justices, and proceedings before Justices are generally of a summary nature.

In the second place the Act expressly provides at the end of section 67 that the proceedings shall not be subject to appeal, which goes far to shew that it was not intended to keep a record of the evidence.

THE COURT refused the bill.

JOHN VEITCH, Solicitor—CROWN AGENT—Agents.

THOMAS DAVID TORRANCE, Defender (Appellant).—G. W. Burnet.

JAMES MILLER, Pursuer (Respondent).—Macfarlane.

No. 25.

Procedure—Appeal—Competency—Penalty—Expenses—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 101), secs. 16 and 17—Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 62), secs. 2 and 3.—A local authority petitioned a Sheriff under the Public Health Act, 1867, to have a person ordained to remove from certain premises a nuisance, “and failing his doing so within such period as the Court shall appoint, to find him liable in a penalty not exceeding 10s. per day during his failure to comply with the order of Court, and to find him liable in expenses.” The Sheriff granted decree, finding that the nuisance existed at the date of the presentation of the petition: “Finds that the said nuisance having now been removed, it is unnecessary to

May 23, 1892.
Torrance v
Miller.

No. 24.
May 23, 1892.
Lamb v.
Threshie.

No. 25. dispose of the prayer of the petition; therefore dismisses the same: Finds the defender liable in expenses," and remitted to the Auditor to tax and report.
May 23, 1892. The defender craved, but was refused a case under the Summary Prosecutions Torrance v. Appeals Act, 1875, and presented a note to the High Court under section 5 of Miller. that Act "for an order" upon the Sheriff "to shew cause why a case should not be stated."

The Court refused the note on the ground that if the petition was a "cause" within the meaning of section 2,* it had not been "determined" in the sense of section 3 of the Act.

Opinion per curiam that in any view an appeal under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, was incompetent, in respect that the petition was not a "proceeding for the recovery of a penalty" within the meaning of section 2 of the Act.

Opinion of Lord Justice-General (Inglis) in Lee v. Lasswade Local Authority, Nov. 2, 1883, 5 Couper, 329, 11 R. (Just. Cases) 1, approved of.

HIGH COURT. ON 24th February 1892, James Miller, sanitary inspector of the Lord Justice- Northern District Committee of the County Council of Ayrshire, presented Clerk. a petition in the Sheriff Court of Ayrshire, at Kilmarnock, in which he Lord Kin- prayed the Court "to find that within or near the premises therein cairney. described there exists a nuisance within the meaning of sections 16 and Ld. Stormont 17 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, viz.:—An ashpit in such Darling. a foul and filthy condition as to be injurious to health; to find that "Thomas David Torrance, writer, Glasgow," is the author of said nuisance, to ordain him to remove and discontinue the same, and for that purpose to drain and cleanse the said ashpit, and, failing his doing so within such period as the Court shall appoint, to find him liable in a penalty not exceeding 10s. per day during his failure to comply with the order of Court, and to find him liable in expenses."

Torrance lodged answers on 27th February, in which he objected to the pursuer's title to sue, and further, inter alia, maintained that at the date of the presentation of the petition there was no foul or filthy matter in the ashpit, it having been cleaned out on 11th February.

On 16th March 1892, the Sheriff-substitute (Hall) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the defender's plea of no title to sue: Finds that at the date of presentation of the petition a nuisance existed on the property mentioned in the prayer thereof: Finds that the defender was the author of said nuisance within the meaning of section 3 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867: Finds that at the date of the presentation of the petition it had not been brought to the pursuer's knowledge, or to the knowledge of the Northern District Committee of the County Council of Ayrshire, that the defender had taken or was about to take any steps for the removal of the said nuisance: Finds that the said nuisance having

* The Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 62), enacted,—

Section 2,—". . . 'Cause' means and includes every proceeding which may be brought under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, and every other summary proceeding for the prosecution of an offence or recovery of a penalty competent to be taken before an inferior Judge."

Section 3,—"On an inferior Judge hearing and determining any cause, either party to the cause may, if dissatisfied with the Judge's determination as erroneous in point of law, appeal thereagainst, notwithstanding any provision contained in the Act under which such cause shall have been brought excluding appeals against or review in any manner of way of any determination, judgment, or conviction or complaint under such Act, by himself or his agent applying in writing within three days after such determination to the inferior Judge to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of such determination for the opinion thereon of a superior Court of law. . . ."

now been removed, it is unnecessary to dispose of the prayer of the petition: Therefore dismisses the same: Finds the defender liable in expenses, of which allows an account to be given in, and remits the same, when lodged, to the Auditor of Court to tax and report, and decerns." No. 25.
May 23, 1892.
Torrance v. Miller.

Torrance craved a case under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875. The Sheriff-substitute having refused to state it, Torrance presented a note to the High Court for an order upon the Sheriff-substitute, under section 5 of the Act, to shew cause why a case should not be stated.

Argued for the appellant;—The Sheriff-substitute ought to be ordained, in terms of section 5 of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, to shew cause why a case should not be granted. This was a "cause" in the sense of section 2 of the Act, for a penalty was concluded for. The case was entirely different from the cases of *Lee v. Local Authority of Lasswade*¹ and of Couper v. Lang.² In these cases the decisions turned upon the fact that under the petitions under consideration no penalty could have been recovered without the institution of further and separate proceedings. It was a great hardship that the appellant, when the petition against him had been dismissed, should be found liable in expenses. They far exceeded any penalty which could competently be inflicted eo nomine.

Argued for the respondent;—The Sheriff-substitute had properly refused to state a case. No appeal was competent, because the petition was not a "cause" in the sense of section 2 of the Act. It was not a prosecution for an offence, the existence of a "nuisance" on one's premises not constituting an offence. It was not a proceeding for the recovery of a penalty. The money fine craved in the petition was not a criminal penalty in the statutory sense, but only a civil compulsitor to enforce the order of a civil Court. The stage of the proceedings at which the Sheriff might have been asked to apply the so-called penalty had not been reached. So far therefore as the proceedings had gone, there was nothing criminal in their character. It was substantially the same as if there had been no crave for the so-called penalty, for the inferior Judge had not had to apply his mind to that part of the petition.

But assuming that the petition was a "cause" within the meaning of the section, it had not been heard and determined in the sense of section 3. There was no decerniture for the taxed amount of expenses, and the question of expenses was the only matter the appellant had any interest to submit to review.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—If it were necessary for us to decide the question raised on the case of Lee which has been cited to us, I must say that I should be inclined to follow the opinion of the Lord Justice-General in that case, and to hold that the case before us is not one of a criminal nature, and not one in which a penalty is concluded for, and therefore not a "cause" under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act.

The procedure here was begun for the purpose of enforcing sanitary arrangements within a county district, and one of the modes of doing this was to obtain an order for removal of a nuisance, and if this order is not obeyed and the nuisance removed, then a fine may be imposed for the failure. It does not appear to me to be a penalty in respect of a crime, but rather a civil compulsitor, the Court being given the power, if the order is not obeyed and the nuisance removed, to impose a pecuniary penalty.

¹ Lee v. Lasswade Local Authority, Nov. 2, 1883, 5 Couper, 329, 11 R. (Just. Cases) 1.

² Couper v. Lang, Dec. 12, 1889, 2 White, 393, 17 R. (Just. Cases) 15.

No. 25.

May 23, 1892.
Torrance v.
Miller.

There is, however, a clear distinction in this case which will enable us to decide it without dealing with that point. We are here not dealing with a concluded case. The Sheriff-substitute has found the appellant liable in expenses, and has remitted the account to the Auditor to tax. That is not an operative judgment. It is only an order for the adjustment of the expenses. There is no conclusion for a money payment. Therefore there seems to me to be nothing in the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute which can be appealed against at the present stage. On that ground I would propose to your Lordships to refuse this note.

LORD KINCAIRNEY concurred.

LORD STORMONTH DARLING.—I concur, and though the ground of judgment proposed by your Lordship is a narrow one, it seems to me necessary to decide this case upon it.

Even if the case had come to us after the Auditor's report had been received and a precise sum decerned for, the opinion of the late Lord Justice-General in the case of Lee would have led to the conclusion that this was not a "proceeding for the prosecution of an offence or the recovery of a penalty" in the sense of section 2 of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act of 1875, and in that opinion I agree.

THE COURT refused the note.

CARMICHAEL & MILLER, W.S.—CARMENT, WEDDERBURN, & WATSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 26.

May 24, 1892.
Donald v.
Hart.

EDWARD WOODFORD DONALD, Complainer.—W. Thomson.
GEORGE HART (Procurator-Fiscal of Renfrewshire), Respondent.—
C. N. Johnston.

Complaint—Conviction of an aggravation not charged.—A man was charged upon a complaint which set forth that he did drive a horse and van against a woman, "and knock her down and fracture her skull, to the danger of her life." The prayer was for conviction of the "said crime." A conviction followed, finding the accused "guilty of the crime charged, aggravated as charged."

The Court quashed the conviction.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Young.
Lord Trayner.
Justiciary
Clerk.

EDWARD WOODFORD DONALD, van-driver, Glasgow, was charged before Sheriff-substitute (Cowan) at Paisley, upon a complaint at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of the Court, which charged the accused that he "did, on 4th February 1892, in Paisley Road, Glasgow, Renfrewshire, drive a horse and van against Elizabeth Young, and knock her down and fracture her skull, to the danger of her life." In the prayer the Court was prayed to convict the accused of "the said crime."

On 14th April 1892 the Sheriff-substitute, in respect of the evidence adduced, found the accused "guilty of the crime charged, aggravated as charged," and therefore adjudged him to be imprisoned for thirty days.

Donald presented a bill of suspension and liberation, and it was argued, inter alia, for him;—The complaint contained no mention of "aggravation," but merely charged the accused with an offence. The Court must then quash the conviction, which convicted of an aggravation not charged in the complaint.

Argued for the respondent;—The words in the conviction were "aggravated as charged." The Sheriff-substitute had therefore found the accused guilty of nothing beyond what was charged in the complaint. He had treated the words "to the danger of her life" as an aggravation of the offence of knocking down the woman and fracturing her skull.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think we can dispose of this case upon the terms of No. 26. the conviction.

The prosecutor here has stated certain things together in his complaint, viz., Donald v. May 24, 1892.
that the accused did “drive a horse and van against Elizabeth Young, and Hart.
mock her down and fracture her skull, to the danger of her life.”

These are the facts, and they are stated as one crime.

There is no suggestion of any aggravation whatever. The words “aggravated” or “aggravation” are not used in the complaint. The prosecutor states the facts as being one crime, and the prayer, which is a most important part of a complaint in an inferior Court, calls upon the magistrate to convict the accused of the crime charged without any mention of any aggravation.

The Sheriff-substitute, in giving judgment and in his conviction, finds the accused guilty of the crime charged “aggravated as charged.” Neither the complaint nor the prayer justify the words “aggravated as charged.” It may be very plain, as a mere matter of speculation, what these words mean. It may be that driving against this woman was, in the mind of the Sheriff-substitute, the crime charged, and the aggravation may in his mind have been that she was knocked down and her skull fractured to the danger of her life. We may speculate on this, but we do not know what the aggravation was, and we are not entitled to speculate upon this matter.

I am of opinion that the Sheriff could not convict of any aggravation under this prayer and complaint, and I therefore cannot sustain the conviction.

LORD YOUNG.—I asked to see the original proceedings in this case in order to observe whether the words “aggravated as charged” were part of the printed form of the conviction. I find this is not so; the words have been added in writing. I agree in thinking it would be unsafe to sustain a conviction from which it appears that the Judge was thinking of an aggravation which is not in the complaint. It is not only the crime which is taken account of, but also the aggravation which may go to increase the punishment. The Sheriff may have been under some misapprehension, and I think it would be unsafe to allow this conviction to stand.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree in the result at which your Lordships have arrived. I think the complaint asks for the conviction of the accused of a specified crime. The Sheriff in finding the accused “guilty of the crime charged” exhausted all that was asked of him, and when he went on to find the accused guilty of an aggravation he proceeded ultra petitem.

THE COURT passed the bill, suspended the conviction and sentence complained of simpliciter, and decerned.

J. DOUGLAS GARDINER & MILL, S.S.C.—CROWN AGENT—Agents.

HUGH PETER DUFFIE, Appellant.—Comrie Thomson—Ure.
ALEXANDER M'CORMICK, Respondent.—Jameson—Clyde.

No. 27.

May 24, 1892.
Duffie v.

Burgh—Footpath by side of turnpike road—Police Commissioners—Jurisdiction—Turnpike Roads (Scotland) Act, 1831 (1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 43), sec. 96—Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. c. 51), secs. 47 and 123.—Section 96 of the Turnpike Roads (Scotland) Act, 1831, enacts that*

* 1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 43, sec. 96, enacts,—“If any person shall ride upon any footpath or causeway, on or by the side of any turnpike road made or set

No. 27. if any person shall drive any horse or carriage of any description upon any footpath or causeway on or by the side of any turnpike road made or set apart for the use or accommodation of foot-passengers, he shall be liable in a penalty.
May 24, 1892. Duffie v. M'Cormick. The Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, by section 123,* provides that section 96 of the Turnpike Roads (Scotland) Act, 1831, shall be incorporated with the Act.

Section 47 of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, enacts that "from and after the commencement of this Act the highways and bridges situated within any burgh shall be by virtue of this Act transferred to and vested in the local authority of such burgh, and such local authority shall have the entire management and control of the same, and shall possess the same rights, powers, and privileges, and be subject to the same liabilities in reference to such highways and bridges . . . as the trustees under this Act possess . . ."

A turnpike road, forming the main street in a burgh, had on either side of the carriageway strips of ground of varying breadth popularly known as loanings. Down to 1878 the Turnpike Road Trustees maintained the carriageways of uniform breadth in the centre of the street but did nothing for the loanings, which, however, had been for over forty years maintained as footpaths by the town-council and latterly by the Police Commissioners.

Held that the Turnpike Road Trustees could, prior to the Act of 1878, have prosecuted, under section 96 of the Act of 1831, any person driving carts or carriages on the loanings, and that the Police Commissioners being now vested with the control of the highways within the burgh under section 47 of the Act of 1878, were entitled to institute a similar prosecution under section 123 of that Act.

HIGH COURT.
 Lord Justice-Clerk.
 Lord Young.
 Lord Trayner.
 Justiciary Clerk.

HUGH PETER DUFFIE, grocer, Rutherglen, was charged under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 to 1881, in the Burgh Police Court, at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Court, upon a complaint which charged him that he "has been guilty of an offence within the meaning of the 'Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878,' particularly section 123 thereof, which incorporates with said Act section 96 of the Act passed in the first and second years of the reign of His Majesty King William the Fourth, chapter 43, in so far as on the 3d day of March 1892 the said Hugh Peter Duffie did, contrary to the said Roads and Bridges Act, unlawfully drive a horse, yoked to a spring van, being a carriage within the meaning of the said Acts, upon the loaning, being a footpath set apart for the use of foot-passengers on the south side of the highway in the burgh of Rutherglen, and forming the Main Street of the said burgh, in the parish of Rutherglen and county of Lanark, at that part thereof opposite or near to his shop there, situated at 210 Main Street aforesaid, whereby the said Hugh Peter Duffie is liable to forfeit and pay a penalty."

Duffie was convicted, and appealed on a case stated by the magistrate, in which the following facts were narrated:—"It was proved that the Main Street of Rutherglen consisted partly of a public carriageway of uniform breadth, situated in the centre of the street, and bounded on apart for the use or accommodation of foot-passengers, or shall lead or drive any horse, ass, mule, swine or cattle, or carriage of any description, or any wheelbarrow, truck, or sledge, or any single wheel of any waggon, cart, or carriage apart therefrom, upon any such footpath or causeway, . . . he shall forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding fifty shillings."

* The Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, sec. 123, enacts that, inter alia, section 96 of the Act 1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 43, shall be "hereby incorporated with this Act, and from and after the commencement of this Act in any county shall extend and apply to all the highways made or to be made within such county, and, except in so far as inconsistent with the provisions of any general or local Police Act in force therein, within the burgh or burghs situated . . . within the same."

either side by gutters and kerbs. Prior to the passing of the Roads and Bridges Act of 1878 this carriageway was turnpike, under the control and management, and solely maintained and metalled, by the Road Trustees. On each side of the greater part of the carriageway, and separated therefrom by the gutters and kerbs, there are strips of ground popularly known as loanings. These loanings, which are of very irregular breadth, have been for many years made, maintained, and set apart as footpaths, were originally private plots, in some cases enclosed by walls, belonging to the owners of the dwelling-houses abutting on the street, and extended out from the houses to the gutters and kerbs of the highway. When these plots were gradually and from time to time removed or abandoned, from forty to sixty years ago, they became footpaths, and have ever since been maintained as such. Excepting that portion of the loanings paved or hornised by the owners, which in some cases extends out to the gutter of the highway, they have been so maintained as footpaths, first by the town-council and latterly by the Police Commissioners, out of the common goods and rates, by the magistrates annually putting ashes on them, but they were never formed, maintained, or set apart for carriage traffic. The Road Trustees, while they had charge of the carriageway, never did anything for the loanings, maintaining the carriageway only. They were succeeded in this by the magistrates and council, as Police Commissioners, in 1878, when by the Act of that year the entire control and management of the carriageway vested in them. Under the Police Act of 1862 the owners of houses on the sides of the streets have from time to time been required to form and maintain footways of varying breadth, as fixed by the Commissioners, on that part of the footpaths close to their houses, the remainder of the loanings between those parts made by the owners and the gutters and kerbs on the sides of the highway continuing to be maintained by the Commissioners by ashing them as footpaths. The public lamps are and have always been placed thereon, and trees have recently been planted on a part of them, and these loanings or footpaths have from time immemorial been extensively used as footpaths by the public. At one part on the north side of the street the kerbs were recently renewed by the Commissioners, and three openings left by them in the kerbs to admit of carriages entering for the delivery of heavy goods. At that part of the street opposite to the old churchyard there are no loanings, and the gutter and kerb of the highway approaches within a distance of from ten feet, gradually narrowing down to four feet from the wall of the graveyard, this being the only path for foot-passengers at that part of the street, and at other parts there are no footpaths except a very narrow path of not more than two feet, and in front of some old houses in the street there are no footpaths, the gutter and kerb being quite close to the building line. For some years back (one witness spoke to about ten) certain drivers of brewers' and bakers' vans, chiefly from Glasgow, have occasionally been in the habit of crossing the gutters and kerbs, separating them from the carriageway, and driving along these loanings or footpaths sometimes from one end to the other. This has increased to such an extent of late that the Commissioners, for the purpose of protecting the foot-passengers, sometime ago resolved that it should be discontinued by enforcing the statute, and one month's public notice was given of this resolution. Several persons have recently been convicted of using these loanings or footpaths for vehicular traffic."

No. 27.

May 24, 1892.
Duffie v.

M'Cormick.

The questions of law for the opinion of the High Court were:—
 "(First) Is the charge as set forth in the complaint relevant? and (Second) Does there exist any question of civil right in favour of the respondent to exclude the prosecution of the offence charged?"

No. 27.

May 24, 1892.
Duffie v.
M'Cormick.

Argued for the appellant;—The complaint was irrelevant. Whatever jurisdiction the Police Commissioners possessed under section 47 of the Act of 1878 was confined to the carriageway. They had never done anything for the loanings. The complaint did not state by whom the loanings were set apart as footpaths. If the Commissioners had proceeded under the 149th section of the Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 101), they might have enforced the keeping of the footpaths clear under section 251 of that Act. (2) This was a question of civil right to be settled by an action in a civil Court and not by a police prosecution.

Counsel for the respondent was not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It appears to me that this case is one of really no practical importance whatever. That the arrangement of street, road, and footpath in the place referred to in this case must be made and regulated by the Magistrates of Rutherglen nobody doubts. Now, they have made a certain regulation, and if that regulation is an outrage upon the inhabitants, and upon the comfort or rights of the inhabitants, the present Magistrates and Town-council of Rutherglen will be certain to suffer for it at the proper time. But in the meantime they have the responsibility and the duty of making these regulations. Now, they have made a regulation in regard to a certain space between the edge of the old turnpike road and the houses running along that turnpike road in the burgh of Rutherglen, and we are told in the case that that space between the old turnpike road and the houses has, as a matter of fact, for the last forty years and upwards, been used as a footpath by the inhabitants of Rutherglen. In accordance with that fact the magistrates have come to the conclusion that it is advisable that it should not be used for anything else, and they have issued orders accordingly. The appellant here has disputed these orders, and understanding, I presume, that it was a test case, he has brought this case for the purpose of review.

In these circumstances I can have no doubt that the magistrates had jurisdiction to deal with the case, and the only question which can raise any difficulty is, whether they have proceeded under the proper statute? In point of fact they have acted under the Roads and Bridges Act of 1878. Now, under section 47 of the Roads and Bridges Act the Police Commissioners were the authority which came in place of the old road trustees, and they had a power of punishment conferred upon them, for by section 96 of the General Turnpike Act, incorporated in section 123 of the Roads and Bridges Act, it was declared, inter alia, that if any person should drive any horse or carriage of any description "upon any footpath or causeway on or by the side of any turnpike road made or set apart for the use or accommodation of foot-passengers," that person should forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding 50s. It appears to me to be perfectly clear upon this case that this piece of ground just outside the gutter of the old turnpike road passing through the burgh of Rutherglen, which has been proved as matter of fact, and which we must accept as having been proved, to be a footpath, and which the inhabitants have used as such for over forty years, is under those clauses 96 and 123 a footpath by the side of a turnpike road. And I cannot see how we can exclude the jurisdiction of those who have charge of the road from carrying out the provisions of the statute by which anybody who drives with a vehicle upon the footpath which is at the side of the turnpike road may be dealt with and punished.

It is quite true that as this is a burgh, and as practically this turnpike road forms part of a broad street running between rows of houses of the burgh, the Magistrates of Rutherglen might have dealt with it in another capacity, viz, in their capacity as magistrates of police, protecting the inhabitants of the burgh by making such regulations for the conduct of the traffic between the sides of that street as they might think proper. But I do not think that they are thereby excluded from dealing with this case in their capacity as having charge of the road going through the burgh. They having charge of the road going through the burgh are under those clauses entitled to enforce penalties against any person who drives on the footpath which is by the side of the turnpike road under their charge. Therefore I think that the appeal should be dismissed.

No. 27.
May 24, 1892.
Duffie v.
McCormick.

LORD YOUNG.—I think that in the view which your Lordship has expressed, and which, in my opinion, is the right view, the case is not without interest and importance.

I took the liberty of pointing out in the course of the argument that, in my opinion, we are not here concerned with any question of property or property title; we are concerned only with the fact that the High Street running through the burgh of Rutherglen consists of a carriageway of a certain breadth limited by gutters and kerbstones on either side; and on the side of these kerbstones, away from the carriageway, there is a strip of ground on either side of varying breadth, originally consisting of what, in the language of the place, and probably of other places, were called loanings, but which the proprietors of the ground from forty to sixty years ago gave up and threw into the road or street so as to form as much part of the High Street of Rutherglen as the carriageway in the centre. And it is set forth in the case, and we must take it as a fact, that for from forty to sixty years this strip of varying breadth has been maintained and used as a footpath. This footpath is of unusual breadth at some places. In one of those photographs which have been shewn to us it is stately and magnificent, the breadth being sufficient to admit of trees being planted with a passage upon either side. But we must take the fact that it has been used and maintained as a footpath.

We are further informed in point of fact that lately, “for some years back, certain drivers of brewers’ and bakers’ vans, chiefly from Glasgow, have occasionally been in the habit of crossing the gutters and kerbs separating them from the carriageway and driving along these loanings or footpaths, sometimes from one end to the other. This has increased to such an extent of late that the Commissioners, for the purpose of protecting the foot-passengers, sometime ago resolved that it should be discontinued by enforcing the statute, and one month’s public notice was given of this resolution.”

Now, the statute which it occurred to the Commissioners it was according to their duty to enforce in the interests of the public safety was the Roads and Bridges Act, which I will explain my view of, as it raises the only question of any considerable difficulty in the case. But before noticing it further, I merely wish to repeat emphatically what I have said more than once in the course of the argument, that it is not merely within the power, but according to the duty of the municipal authorities of a burgh with a police establishment, to make a very primitive separation—with which we are all familiar—between that part of the way which is devoted to carriage traffic and that part of it which is reserved for the safety of foot-passengers. It is their duty to do that, and that without

No. 27.

May 24, 1892.
Duffie v.
McCormick.

reference to any question of property or title. There is a street there; it is the duty of the magistrates—within their power and according to their duty—to see that the foot-passengers are protected by having a line of march for themselves, on to which vehicular traffic is not admitted. Now, if that be clear, the case comes to be without any public interest. The magistrates or the commissioners at a particular time may make the foot-passage too narrow; at another time they may make it too broad. The street has a certain breadth in point of fact from house to house, and it has to be divided between carriageway and foot-path, and it is for the magistrates to exercise their judgment from time to time as to how the division shall be made.

It had here occurred to them that the proper statute to proceed upon in order to maintain the footpath for the exclusive use of foot-passengers in the future, as it had been for the last from forty to sixty years, was to institute prosecutions under the Roads and Bridges Act.

Now, that came about in this way. The road leading through Rutherglen, and really forming the High Street of Rutherglen, was a turnpike road under the General Turnpike Act, and under the management of the Turnpike Road Trustees,—like many other public turnpike roads under the statute,—and managed by the Turnpike Road Trustees, which at different places passed through a burgh.

Now, no doubt, the police authority in the burgh have a duty to attend to the public safety within the burgh, but the Turnpike Road Trustees had also, in my opinion, a clear duty under clause 96 of the General Turnpike Act to see that any footpath on or alongside of a turnpike road was not endangered by carriage traffic being allowed to pass along it. By clause 96 anyone who endangers the public safety by driving a carriage upon a footpath alongside of a turnpike road, although not on it, is subject to a penalty. Now, who can enforce it? The Turnpike Road Trustees could have enforced it under the General Turnpike Act, in my opinion, even within burgh. That statute did not say,—and I cannot infer,—that the provision imposing a penalty for driving upon a footpath alongside of a turnpike road could not be enforced by the road trustees when the road happened to be within burgh. It is a turnpike road notwithstanding that it is within burgh—a turnpike road with a footpath alongside of it, and the penalty in clause 96 applies to anybody who endangers the public safety by driving vehicles upon that footpath.

Now, under section 47 of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, the Commissioners of Police of the burgh of Rutherglen have come in place of the Turnpike Road Trustees, and section 96 of the General Turnpike Act has been incorporated in section 123 of the Roads and Bridges Act. I am of opinion that the officer of the Police Commissioners may in the interests of the public safety prosecute under the Roads and Bridges Act for this offence, whereby the safety of foot-passengers is endangered, viz., by driving carts and carriages on the foot-paths set apart for foot-passengers. I assume for the reasons I have stated that this footpath, although of extraordinary breadth, was set apart in point of fact and maintained for the use of the foot-passengers, and that the magistrates are now only by this prosecution checking what they represent as a comparatively recent innovation, which in their judgment is detrimental to the safety of foot-passengers who use it. If they have acted indiscreetly in reserving so much to be protected against vehicular traffic for the safety of foot-passengers, they will correct that if they ascertain that such a course is according to the general feeling of the inhabitants of the place where they are acting as magistrates and guardians of the public safety. I have no reason to know what the prevailing public opinion upon that question is, but in the meantime I see no grounds upon which I can interfere with the efforts of the magistrates to promote the interests of the public safety by instituting prosecutions such as this to stop the traffic of vehicles along what is in fact a footpath. I am therefore of opinion that this appeal ought to be dismissed, there being, in my judgment, no error in point of law on the part of the magistrates who pronounced the conviction.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur in the result at which your Lordships have arrived.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the determination of the inferior Judge.

JOHN RHIND, S.S.C.—J. & A. HASTIE, Solicitors—Agents.

JOHN M'HATTIE, Complainer.—Ure—J. C. Watt.
THOMAS WYNESS (Superintendent of Police for the City of Aberdeen)
AND ANOTHER, Respondents.—C. J. Guthrie.

No. 28.

May 27, 1892.
M'Hattie v.
Wyness.

Warrant to apprehend—Indorsation—Act 11 and 12 Vict. c. 42.—A warrant to arrest a man in Aberdeen upon a charge of conspiracy was granted by the Lord Mayor of the City of London upon sworn information under the Act 11 and 12 Vict. c. 42. Before the warrant reached Aberdeen, and was indorsed by the magistrate in Aberdeen in terms of section 14 of the Act,* the police in Aberdeen, acting upon a telegram from the police in London, had arrested the man and imprisoned him.

In a bill of suspension and liberation the complainer pleaded that his arrest and imprisonment were without warrant.

The Court refused the bill, in respect that while the complainer might have a civil action for illegal arrest he was now in custody upon a warrant.

ON 24th May 1892 a warrant was granted by the Lord Mayor (Evans) of the City of London, to apprehend and bring to the Mansion House John M'Hattie, residing in George Street, Aberdeen, upon a charge of having in December last unlawfully and wickedly conspired with Alexander Stephen and other persons falsely and fraudulently to obtain from the British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company, Limited, and divers other insurance companies and insurers, large sums of money, with intent to cheat and defraud.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Young.
Lord Ruther-
furd Clark.
Lord Trayner.
Justiciary
Clerk.

The warrant, which was granted upon sworn information under the Act 11 and 12 Vict. c. 42, was despatched to Aberdeen in the hands of

* The Act 11 and 12 Vict. c. 42, sec. 14, enacts,—“If any person against whom a warrant shall be issued by any Justice of the Peace . . . within England . . . for any crime or offence against the laws . . . shall . . . reside or be . . . in . . . Scotland it shall be lawful for the Sheriff or Stewart-depute or substitute or any Justice of the Peace of the county or place where such person . . . shall be . . . to indorse (K) the said warrant . . . which warrant so indorsed shall be a sufficient authority to the person . . . bringing such warrant, and to all persons to whom such warrant was originally directed, and also to all Sheriffs, officers . . . and other peace officers of the county or place where such warrant shall be so indorsed, to execute the same within the county or place where it shall have been so indorsed by apprehending the person against whom such warrant shall have been granted, and to convey him into the county or place in England . . . where the Justice or Justices who first issued the said warrant shall have jurisdiction in that behalf, and to carry him before such Justice or Justices . . . to be there dealt with according to law . . .”

No. 28.
 May 27, 1892.
 M'Hattie v.
 Wyness.

Detective Outram, and upon the 25th of May it was indorsed by John Crombie, magistrate and Justice of Peace for the city of Aberdeen, in terms of section 14 of the Act 11 and 12 Vict. c. 42.

Meantime, on the 24th, M'Hattie had been arrested and confined in the Police Court prison upon a telegram from the London police to the police in Aberdeen, intimating that they were sending an officer to bring M'Hattie to the Mansion House.

On 25th May M'Hattie presented a bill of suspension and liberation against the Chief Constable of Aberdeen, and Inspector Outram, averring, inter alia,—"The procedure in cases where an arrested person is sought to be delivered to an English Court upon an indorsed warrant is for the holder of the warrant to have it indorsed in Scotland, upon which indorsation the warrant becomes in ordinary circumstances effectual for arrest."

The complainer pleaded, inter alia;—"The complainer is entitled to suspension and liberation, in respect his arrest and imprisonment were without warrant, illegal, and oppressive."

On 25th May Lord Young granted warrant of service of the bill on the respondents: "Meantime orders that the complainer should not be removed beyond the jurisdiction of the Court of Justiciary."

On 26th May Lord Young ordered "Detective Inspector Outram, of the City of London Police, presently in Aberdeen, to appear in the High Court of Justiciary, Edinburgh, to-morrow, and bring with him the warrant complained of in this bill."

At the hearing on 27th May it was argued for the complainer that there was no legal authority for his arrest and incarceration. The Lord Mayor's warrant could not possibly be said to be the foundation of diligence against him. He was simply arrested upon a telegram from England.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is said that the complainer was arrested on no warrant, and that he is therefore entitled to liberation. I cannot give effect to that contention. He is now apprehended and in custody upon a warrant. If there was anything illegal in his being taken and detained in Aberdeen without a warrant, he has his civil remedy against any person who has done that illegal act. But he is now in custody upon a warrant, and I am of opinion that we cannot interfere.

LORD YOUNG, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT refused the bill, and decerned.

DOVE & LOCKHART, S.S.C.—JOHN CLERK BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 29.
 May 27, 1892.*
 Blains v.
 Rankin.

JAMES BLAIN AND ANOTHER, Complainer.—Orr.
 JOHN MARQUIS RANKIN (Procurator-Fiscal of Court at Stranraer), Respondent.—C. N. Johnston.

Form of complaint—Summary Procedure Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. c. 53), form 2, Schedule A †—Defective statement of punishment craved.—In a com-

* Decided March 15, 1892.

† Schedule A prescribes first a form of complaint "for offence at common law." The conclusion of the prayer in that case is "to convict him of the said crime, and to adjudge him to suffer the pains of law."

The second form is for a statutory offence. It concludes "to convict him of the aforesaid contravention, and to adjudge him to suffer the penalties provided by the said Act (or Acts or any of them)."

under the Summary Procedure Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, persons were charged with the statutory offence created by the Act 3 and 4 Vict. c. 74, sec. 1, of stealing oysters. The punishment provided by the statute is "imprisonment not exceeding the term of one year." The body of the complaint bore no reference to any punishment, but the prayer concluded "to convict" the persons named "of the crime charged, and to adjudge them to suffer the pains of the law." The Sheriff-substitute convicted the accused, and sentenced them to forty days' imprisonment.

No. 29.

May 27, 1892.

Blains v. Rankin.

Conviction suspended on the ground that the complaint was irregular (1), as the prayer thereof was not in the form prescribed by the Summary Procedure Act for the case of a statutory offence, and (2) as the prayer did not limit the amount of punishment asked to the duration of imprisonment sanctioned by the Summary Procedure Act, viz., sixty days.

Question whether it was essential to specify in the body of the complaint the amount of punishment sanctioned by the statute. Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk) that it was not.

JAMES AND JOHN BLAIN, fishermen, Stranraer, were charged in the Sheriff Court of Galloway under a complaint which bore to proceed on the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887. The complaint set forth merely that the accused did, on a day labelled, and from an oyster fishing labelled, "steal 153 oysters and 296 oyster brood, contrary to the Act 3 and 4 Vict. cap. 74, sec. 1." This Act by its 1st section limits the punishment that may be inflicted to one year's imprisonment.

High Court.

Lord Justice-Clerk.

Lord Rutherford Clark.

Lord Trayner.

The prayer of the complaint, after craving the Sheriff to grant warrant to cite the accused, ran thus, viz., "and thereafter to convict them of the crime charged, and to adjudge them to suffer the pains of law."

The Sheriff-substitute (Watson) convicted the accused, and sentenced each of them to imprisonment for forty days.

The pursuers presented a bill of suspension, pleading;—(a) The said complaint is incompetent in respect it is not framed in terms of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864. (b) Said complaint is irrelevant in respect it does not set forth that the accused were liable for any statutory penalty, nor pray the Court to adjudge them to suffer any statutory penalty; and separatim, in respect it does not charge complainers with any offence known to the law. (c) In respect said conviction and sentence are not in the form prescribed by the Summary Procedure Act, 1864.

Argued for the suspenders;—The complaint must specify what penalties could competently follow conviction. If it did not the magistrate might be misled.¹ Even if the complaint were not open to objection on this ground, it was bad because its prayer asked for the infliction of the pains of law in the case of a statutory offence with a statutory punishment attached to it.² Further, the prayer of a complaint under the Summary Procedure Acts must restrict all punishments to the limits authorised by these Acts,³ viz., in the case of imprisonment to sixty days. The 20th section of the Criminal Procedure Act of 1887 was not applicable to such complaints as this.

Argued for the respondent;—A general reference to the penalties of the statute was sufficient where there was no alternative prescribed by the statute.⁴ Where the statute with its own statutory penalties was referred to as here in the body of the complaint, the phrase "pains of

¹ Thomson v. Wardlaw, Jan. 23, 1865, 5 Irvine, 45.

² Nicol v. McNeil, July 13, 1887, 14 R. 47, 1 White, 416; Bute v. More, Nov. 24, 1870, 9 Macph. 180, 1 Coup. 495.

³ Clark & Bendall v. Stuart, June 8, 1886, 13 R. (Just. Cases) 86, 1 White, 191; Chisholm v. Black & Morrison, June 12, 1871, 2 Coup. 49.

⁴ Galt v. Ritchie, July 16, 1873, 11 Macph. 971, 2 Couper, 470.

No. 29.
May 27, 1892.
Blains v.
Rankin.

law" in the prayer must be read with the same reference, and, as the complaint bore to be presented under the Summary Procedure Acts, must of necessity be read as restricted by the limitations of that Act.¹ If, in point of fact, the magistrate was not misled,—if the sentence imposed was within the Act,—then the proceedings were good.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The first objection taken here is to that part of the complaint which makes an accusation against the suspenders. It is said that it is not sufficient to aver that the thing done was done in contravention of the Act of Parliament, but that a statement of the penalty which has been incurred must be added.

As I am prepared to dispose of the case on another and a different ground, it is not necessary to decide that question, but I may say that the objection does not seem to me to be good. To sustain it would give this anomalous result, that a prosecutor proceeding under the Summary Procedure Act would be compelled to state the points against the accused at greater length than he is now required to do under an indictment.

But the second objection is much more formidable. The conclusion of such a complaint has always been a prayer craving the magistrate, after certain procedure, to inflict certain penalties. In the Statute of 1887 there is a clause (sec. 20) applicable to the corresponding part of an indictment, but it is not applicable to the prayer of a complaint under the Summary Procedure Acts.

The complaint is laid under the Summary Procedure Acts. The Act of 1864 is quite distinct in giving two forms of prayer, one applicable to an offence at common law, the other to a statutory offence. The former runs thus,—the magistrate is requested "to convict him of the said crime, and to adjudge him to suffer the pains of law." The form for a statutory offence is different. It is "to convict him of the aforesaid contravention, and to adjudge him to suffer the penalties provided by the said Act."

Here the prosecutor states his charge as a statutory charge, but in the prayer of the complaint he concludes in language applicable to an offence at common law. That is a distinct departure from statutory form. The question is whether the statutory requirement is a mere matter of form. I am satisfied that it is not a mere matter of form, but a matter of substance that the prosecutor should state that the accused should be adjudged to suffer the penalties provided by the Act.

It is plain that in this case the phrase "the pains of law" is ambiguous. What the person is liable to suffer under the statute is imprisonment for twelve months. The prosecutor who brings such a charge in the Summary Court is bound to certiorate the magistrate that he does not ask for the full penalty, which would be incompetent under the Summary Procedure Acts. That also is a matter of substance, and I think this conviction should be suspended.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I entirely agree with your Lordship on the points on which it is proposed to put our decision, but I reserve my opinion as to whether the charge here was rightly set forth.

THE COURT suspended the conviction.

P. PEARSON, S.S.C.—CROWN AGENT—Agents.

¹ Chisholm v. Black & Morrison, ut supra.

JOHN MACPHERSON, Appellant.—A. J. Young—Dewar.

No. 30.

ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL (Procurator-Fiscal for Burgh of Oban), Respondent.
—Salvesen.

May 27, 1892.*
Macpherson v.
Campbell.

Public-house—Licensed grocer—Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35), Form 3, Schedule A—“Give to be drunk or consumed on the premises.”—A customer called on a grocer in his licensed premises to settle an account, and to introduce a friend as a new customer. He asked that this friend should be supplied with half a glass of whisky. The grocer supplied the whisky as requested, and it was drunk by the person so introduced on the premises. The whisky was not paid for. Held (dub. Lord Trayner) that the grocer had committed a breach of his certificate.

A GROCER'S certificate under the Public-Houses Act of 1862 contains a condition that the holder “do not traffic in or give any spirits,” &c., “to be drunk or consumed on the” licensed premises. HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Ruther-
furd Clark.
Lord Trayner.

John Macpherson, licensed grocer in Oban, was convicted of a breach of this condition of his certificate in respect of the following facts, viz.: On 3d December 1891 Hugh M'Coll and Alexander M'Gregor, both farm-servants in the neighbourhood, went to Macpherson's premises. M'Gregor did so for the purpose of settling an account due by him to Macpherson, and of introducing M'Coll as a new customer. M'Gregor asked that M'Coll should be supplied with “a half,” stating that he wished to become a customer of Macpherson. By Macpherson's direction, Peter Mitchell, his shopman, thereupon supplied to M'Coll one-half glass of whisky of the value of twopence, which was drunk by M'Coll while standing at the counter. It was further proved that the liquor was not paid for, and that it was customary for Macpherson to treat customers, as had been done in this instance.

Macpherson obtained a case, in which the above facts were stated. The question of law was “whether the appellant, having without receiving payment therefor, given one half glass of whisky to be drunk on his licensed premises to a person who had resorted thereto for the purpose of doing business, did so give exciseable liquor to be drunk or consumed on the premises in the sense contemplated by the statute and the certificate, and did thereby commit a breach thereof.”

The appellant cited the cases of *Kay v. Gemmell*¹ and M'Petric v. Cadenhead.² This case, like those, he argued, was a case of giving by way of hospitality, or if not was a case of giving by way of sample, a thing not struck at by the Act.

Argued for the respondent;—This was not, like the cases cited, a giving to a friend as an act of hospitality. The grocer had evidently given the whisky in the exercise of his trade as a grocer. It was plain that the Act would very soon become a dead letter if a glass of whisky was given away with every pound of tea.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The case before us is one arising out of an alleged breach of certificate by a licensed grocer, in respect he did, within his licensed premises, traffic in or give exciseable liquor to a person named to be drunk on the premises.

The facts as stated bring out very clearly that the accused did give (I do not at present use that word in any technical sense) one half glass of whisky to be consumed on the premises, and that it was so consumed.

* Decided March 19, 1892.

¹ Nov. 13, 1884, 12 R. (Just. Cases) 14, 5 Coup. 535.

² March 19, 1885, 12 R. (Just. Cases) 35, 5 Coup. 661.

No. 30.

May 27, 1892.
Macpherson v.
Campbell.

I should have had no doubt that that fact constituted a breach of the certificate, unless there were some other facts set out disclosing some circumstance that would take the case out of the statute, e.g., that the whisky had been given to a person who had been brought into the shop in a fainting condition.

But certain cases have been decided which place the whole matter in a somewhat difficult position, and establish that the Act does not apply to the case of a grocer who gives whisky to be consumed on the premises in the exercise of hospitality.

These decisions do not commend themselves to my mind, but I am bound by them, and in any case in which whisky is so given as a piece of hospitality we must hold that there is no breach of the certificate. But do the facts here amount to anything of that kind? I think not.

Alexander M'Gregor brought Hugh M'Coll, who was likely to become a customer to the shop, and asked the appellant to supply M'Coll with half a glass of whisky. By Macpherson's direction, Peter Mitchell, his shopman, thereupon supplied to M'Coll one half glass of whisky of the value of two-pence, which was drunk by M'Coll while standing at the counter.

I see nothing in that statement which brings this case within the rule of the decided cases. I think that this is just a case in which a grocer, in breach of his certificate, has supplied whisky to be drunk on the premises. It was suggested in argument that this was a case in which whisky was given to an intending purchaser that he might taste it. I read it as a simple case of treating. It has been decided, and rightly and properly decided, that if a customer receives a small quantity of whisky to taste its flavour, that is not a contravention of the statute.

I am satisfied that this case does not fall under any of the decisions quoted to us.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree. I think that it has not been shewn that the drink here was given as a matter of hospitality; on the contrary, I think it has been shewn that it was not so given.

LORD TRAYNER.—If this question had arisen in this case for the first time, I should have had no difficulty in holding that there had been a breach of certificate. My difficulty now arises from the previous decisions, and from the principle which was laid down in those cases. I am, however, not disposed to carry the principle of those cases any further, and if your Lordships are able to distinguish the present case from them, I do not dissent.

THE COURT answered the question in the affirmative.

JAMES PURVES, S.S.C.—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 31.

July 14, 1892.
Eastburn v.
Wood.

ABRAHAM STATES EASTBURN AND ANOTHER, Appellants.—Rhind.
GEORGE MURE WOOD (Procurator-Fiscal of Justice of Peace Court of Edinburgh), Respondent.—Gillespie.

Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 50), sec. 57.—County Council—Bye-law for suppression of nuisance.—Terms of a bye-law which was held to be beyond the powers given to County Councils by section 57 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, to suppress by means of a bye-law nuisances not already punishable in a summary manner by virtue of any Act in force throughout a county.

ABRAHAM STATES EASTBURN, medical specialist, Glasgow, and Thomas Jones, billposter, Glasgow, were charged in the Justice of the Peace Court of Edinburgh, at the instance of the procurator-fiscal, upon a complaint which set forth that they had contravened section 1 of the bye-laws made by the County Council of Midlothian in virtue of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, section 57,* by affixing bills to certain wooden hoardings alongside a public road without consent of the owner or occupier in the county of Edinburgh. No. 31.

July 14, 1892.
Eastburn v.
Wood.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Young.
Lord Trayner.
Justiciary
Clerk.

The accused objected to the competency of the complaint, on the ground that the provisions of the section of the bye-laws founded on were illegal, in respect that they were beyond the powers conferred by the 57th section of the Local Government Act upon the County Council.

The Justices repelled the objection, and after a proof convicted the accused, and adjudged each of them to pay £1 of penalty, and in default to be imprisoned for seven days.

Eastburn and Jones craved a case, in which the following question, inter alia, was submitted for the opinion of the High Court:—"Whether the County Council were empowered by section 57 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, to make bye-law 1?"

Argued for the appellants;—The bye-law was ultra vires of the County Council. The 57th section of the Act of 1889 gave them power to make bye-laws for the suppression of "nuisances." A nuisance was something offensive, and there was no proof that the bills in question were offensive.

Argued for the respondent;—The powers given to the County Council by the section were very wide, and they had not exceeded them in framing the bye-laws. Anything that annoyed was a nuisance, and the disfigurement of buildings by bill-sticking was an annoyance amounting to nuisance.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—The question which is before us in this case is whether the County Council of Midlothian had power to make the bye-law No. 1, against

* The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 cap. 50), sec. 57, enacts,—“The council of a county may from time to time make such bye-laws as to them seem meet for the administration of the affairs of the county, for the prevention of vagrancy, and for prevention and suppression of nuisances not already punishable in a summary manner by virtue of any Act in force throughout the county, and may thereby appoint such penalties not exceeding in any case £5 as they deem necessary for the punishment of offences against the same.”

“Bye-Laws for the Suppression of Nuisances and Vagrancy, under the ‘Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889,’ section 57.

“1. Every person who writes upon, soils, defaces, or marks any wall, fence, hoarding, or building with chalk or paint or in any other way, or who without authority affixes or causes to be affixed to any church, chapel, or school-house, or, without the consent of the owner and occupier, to any other building, or to any wall, fence, hoarding, door, gate, pillar, post, tree, or notice board lawfully exhibited, any bill or other notice; and

“2. Every person who causes any hand-bill, waste or soiled paper, rags, or other similar material, to be strewn, laid down, or to fall upon any street, road, or other thoroughfare, or adjoining fences; and

“5. Every person found begging, or placing themselves or otherwise acting so as to induce, or for the purpose of inducing, the giving of alms, and all persons conducting themselves as vagrants, having no fixed place of residence, and no lawful means of gaining their livelihood within the county, shall be guilty of an offence under the ‘Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889,’ sec. 57, and shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings in each case.”

No. 31.

July 14, 1892.
Eastburn v.
Wood.

which the appellants have been held to have offended. It is an interesting case, because it is the first instance of the making of local legislation which has come before us. Under the 57th section of the Local Government Act the County Council is entitled to make bye-laws, in fact, to legislate in regard to certain matters within the county of Midlothian, viz., the prevention of vagrancy, and the prevention and suppression of nuisances within the county. They have made this piece of legislation upon which these two appellants were convicted, and we are asked to say whether it is in the power of the Council to pass such a bye-law. The first question is, whether we have power to determine that question? I am of opinion that we have the power. The question has been frequently raised and decided in the English Courts, and always in the view that the Courts have the power to consider whether the right to make any particular bye-law is within the jurisdiction of the County Council.

We are therefore asked if it was in the power of the County Council to make this bye-law. Their power depends upon the words of the 57th section of the Local Government Act. That section provides that the County Council may make "such bye-laws as to them seem meet for the administration of the affairs of the county for the prevention of vagrancy, and for prevention and suppression of nuisances not already punishable in a summary manner by virtue of any Act in force throughout the county." This is a limited power of general legislation granted to the County Council for the suppression of vagrancy and nuisances which are not otherwise punishable summarily by statute. Now, the County Council, in the first of the bye-laws framed by them to this end, enacted that—"Every person who writes upon, soils, defaces, or marks any wall, fence, hoarding, or building with chalk or paint or in any other way, or who without authority affixes or causes to be affixed to any church, chapel or school-house, or, without the consent of the owner and occupier, to any other building, or to any wall, fence, hoarding, door, gate, pillar, post, tree, or notice board lawfully exhibited, any bill or other notice," should be liable in a penalty.

Now, there are three enactments contained in this clause. The first has nothing to do with the question whether authority is given or not, or whether the consent of the owner and occupier is given, which elements are only applicable to the second and third enactments in the clause. Under the first, if anyone is so wicked as to write upon or mark walls with chalk, he is to be punished at once. Now, one would not say that that was a very happy specimen of legislation, and really penal legislation requires more consideration and more skill than has here been resorted to to express it.

But the particular enactment in clause 1 with which we are now concerned is the third, "or without the consent of the owner or occupier, affixes or causes to be affixed to any other building, or to any wall, fence, hoarding, door, gate, pillar, post, tree, or notice board lawfully exhibited, any bill or other notice." So that any person putting up any notice on a tree or dyke within the county of Midlothian, without the consent of the owner and occupier, is to be subject to a penalty of 40s.

Is it within the power of the County Council to make such an enactment? There is nothing said here about nuisance. I quite appreciate the desirability of putting a stop to what is popularly called the bill-sticking nuisance, and I do not think it would require any very great skill to frame an enactment to suppress it, but to say that anybody who puts up a bill upon any fence at the side of the road within the county of Midlothian is to be liable to a penalty of 40s., and in default of imprisonment, is extravagant as a piece of serious legislation. No. 31.

Nuisance may be brought into any case of bill-sticking by the character or size of the bill, the place selected for putting it up, or other reasons, but to say that every bill stuck upon a fence by the roadside is a nuisance is to say what cannot be maintained as a legal proposition. A notice put up on a fence by the roadside that a charity sermon is to be preached in the parish church for behoof of the destitute sick would be a bill put up in the county of Midlothian, and probably the owner and occupier of the lands enclosed within the fence might not have been convened to give their consent to the putting up of the notice, so that that would be an offence under this section. I may observe that the announcement of such a sermon would of itself be an offence under another of these bye-laws, viz., the 5th. That section provides that "Every person found begging," (it is not said where except within the county of Midlothian), "or placing themselves, or otherwise acting so as to induce, or for the purpose of inducing, the giving of alms," is to be liable to summary conviction, and a penalty of 40s. The purpose of a charity sermon is to induce the giving of alms, and the notice might make the person who put it up liable for the penalty. July 14, 1892.
Eastburn v.
Wood.

Now, I think the provisions of the 5th section are just as clearly beyond the powers of the County Council as those of the first, although it is not necessary for the Court to decide that point. The practical conclusion I arrive at is, that if the County Council are going to penally legislate upon bill-sticking, which may be a nuisance, they must really resort to someone with intelligence enough to frame the enactment. Bill-sticking may subject those transgressing to a penalty and imprisonment, and may be put down by a bye-law applicable to the case. The 5th bye-law, however, is not limited to any case. It refers to the county of Midlothian, and if the Convener of the county were to ask in his library for charity in support of any object, he would be liable in a penalty under the law as so expressed.

There is another enactment—the second—to which I should like to call attention (although it is not within the case), which has regard to what may be called the paper nuisance. It is a very serious one, especially in the streets of Edinburgh, where whole newspapers seem to be thrown down and allowed to blow about, and its suppression is worthy of attention. The second enactment runs thus—"Every person who causes any hand-bill, waste or soiled paper, rags, or other similar material to be strewn, laid down, or to fall upon any street, road, or other thoroughfare or adjoining fences," is to be liable in a penalty.

One of the first cases which occurs to one is that of a paper chase. Any boy laying down paper as scent at the part of a fence leading into a field and adjoining a thoroughfare could, under the enactment, be punished by fine or imprisonment although there was no nuisance whatever. That is altogether unreasonable, and the enactment might be quite easily expressed so as to repress the paper nuisance without using language which would comprehend such a case as that.

Therefore, upon the case before us, my opinion is that this local bye-law was beyond the powers given by the Act of 1889 to the County Council to suppress nuisances by means of a bye-law. That is sufficient to dispose of the case, and to set aside the conviction.

No. 31. LORD TRAYNER.—I am of opinion that this bye-law is beyond the powers of the County Council.

July 14, 1892.
Eastburn v.
Wood.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT quashed the conviction,

JOHN VEITCH, Solicitor—GEORGE M. WOOD, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 32.

GEORGE ADAM MILLER, Appellant.—A. J. Young—Cook.

July 18, 1892.
Miller v.
White.

JOHN WHITE (Procurator-Fiscal of Burgh of Dalkeith), Respondent.—M'Neill.

Public-house—Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35), sec. 5—Prosecution for selling spirits without a certificate against an innkeeper holding temporary licence from Commissioners of Inland Revenue—Oppression.—An innkeeper, whose licence expired on 15th May 1892, but whose occupancy of the inn, in virtue of the Removal Terms (Burghs) Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. c. 50), sec. 4, did not expire till the 28th, presented an application to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, with concurrence of two local Justices of the Peace, craving authority to sell exciseable liquors from the 15th till the 28th. The application was granted upon his paying a quarter's licence duty. On receiving notice from the chief constable that he was not entitled to sell without a certificate, he ceased to do so after the 17th. On the 20th he was charged and subsequently convicted by a magistrate, who was one of the Justices of the Peace who had concurred in the application to the Commissioners, for the offence of selling liquor on the 17th without a certificate. The Court sustained an appeal by him, holding that the prosecution was, in the circumstances, oppressive.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Young.
Lord M'Laren.
Ld. Wellwood.
Jnsticiary
Clerk.

GEORGE ADAM MILLER was tenant of Annfield Inn, Eskbank, Dalkeith, for nine years preceding Whitsunday 1892. His licence expired on 15th May 1892, but as the removal term from houses let on lease was by 49 and 50 Vict. c. 50, sec. 4, postponed to the 28th May, his occupancy of the inn did not expire until that date. As he had a considerable stock in trade on the premises, he on 13th May presented a petition to her Majesty's Commissioners of Inland Revenue (Excise), Somerset House, London, craving leave to carry on his usual public-house business from the 16th to the 28th May inclusive, so as to give him an opportunity of disposing of his stock upon the premises. The application had the following concurrence appended to it:—"We, William Watson, provost of Dalkeith, and Thomas Alison, Rose Hill, Dalkeith, two of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the county of Edinburgh, respectfully concur in the above petition, and pray that it may be granted. WILLIAM WATSON, J.P., THOMAS ALISON, J.P."

The petition and concurrence were duly lodged with the Commissioners. They intimated upon 14th May to Miller that the petition had been granted upon his paying a quarter's licence duty, and he accordingly paid it. He immediately intimated to the chief constable that he had done so, and that he intended to carry on his business until 28th May. On 16th May the chief constable wrote in reply, intimating "that notwithstanding Miller has paid a quarter's duty to the Inland Revenue, he has no certificate from the Justices, and, if he continues to sell, steps will be taken with the view to a prosecution. He has been warned accordingly."

Miller did not continue his business after the 17th May.

On 20th May Miller was served with a complaint at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of the burgh of Dalkeith, charging him with selling exciseable liquors without a certificate.

The complaint was heard on the 30th before Provost Watson, and the accused was found guilty of selling drink upon the 17th without a certificate, and fined. No. 32.

July 18, 1892.
Miller v.
White.

Miller appealed to the High Court of Justiciary. The appellant set forth the facts and proceedings above narrated, and stated, "that the police had been informed of each step taken, and that the appellant, on being apprised that they might object, did not open the inn after the 17th May 1892. Evidence was led on behalf of the present appellant, which shewed that it has been customary, not only in Edinburgh, but throughout Scotland, to carry on a retail business with an excise licence, for temporary purposes, without objection by the police. This is the first known case of a prosecution against the holder of an excise licence granted to him for a special purpose, and a limited time. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue give such a licence only if the application for it is indorsed or concurred in by two Justices of the Peace. The said Provost Watson, who along with another Justice concurred in the appellant's petition to the Commissioners and thus obtained the grant, sat in judgment upon the appellant for doing what the prayer in the petition asked that he should be empowered to do. Yet the said Provost Watson found the appellant guilty of an offence, and fined him 35s. and £2, 19s. expenses, and failing payment to suffer fourteen days' imprisonment. The defender considers himself aggrieved by said judgment, and now complains thereof, and seeks relief against the same on the ground of malice and oppression on the part of the magistrate, or of such deviation from the statutory enactment as prevented substantial justice being done, and for other reasons to be stated at the hearing hereof."

In his answers the respondent stated,—“It is not true, as stated, that there was evidence led which shewed that it has been customary, not only in Edinburgh, but throughout Scotland, to carry on a retail business with an excise licence for temporary purposes without objection by the police. The letter of the chief constable of 17th May 1892, referred to by the appellant, shews that such a custom does not prevail in the county of Midlothian. The licence alleged by the appellant to have been granted to him by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue is null and void.”

The respondent maintained that the licence granted by the Inland Revenue was null and void under sec. 5 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35).*

LORD YOUNG.—This is an unusual case. The removal term was recently in Scotland postponed from the 15th to the 28th May, and the 15th, the old term of removal, was that upon which licences expired, so that a tenant of an inn who has to remove at Whitsunday is left in a position of some hardship, because during that fortnight he cannot carry on his business. His stock in trade is there, and he cannot sell it, for his certificate and licence have expired. In this state of matters, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue seem to have thought it fitting to interpose for the protection of tenants in that position, by considering

* The Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35), sec. 5,—“No licence for the sale of spirits, wine, porter, ale, beer, cyder, perry, or other exciseable liquors by retail, whether to be drunk or consumed on the premises of the person licensed or not, shall be granted by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, or by any officer of Inland Revenue, to any person in Scotland who shall not produce to the said Commissioners or officer a certificate, granted in terms of this Act, enabling the party to obtain such licence, and every licence which shall be granted contrary to the terms of this Act shall be null and void to all intents and purposes.”

No. 32. an application by such persons, provided it is backed by two local magistrates, to continue the licence between the 15th and 28th, with a view to remove that hardship.

July 18, 1892.
Miller v.
White.

Now the appellant being in this position asked the provost and a local Justice to certify his application to the Board of Inland Revenue as a fitting one to be granted, with reference to his house and to him individually, and they certified accordingly, and the application was granted by the Inland Revenue, he paying a certain sum for it. He proceeded to act upon the permission, and immediately the procurator-fiscal proceeded to prosecute him as acting illegally—selling spirits unlawfully without a certificate. I think that if I had been the provost who signed as concurring in the petition humbly praying that the application should be granted, I should have thought such a prosecution unbecoming in the highest degree and oppressive, and should have declined to entertain it. But the provost seems to have been overcome by the technical idea that however oppressive and unbecoming he might think the prosecution, he was bound to convict if it was only proved that the formal statutory certificate by the Justices at a meeting had not been granted.

Now, I think, as I have said, that the prosecution was oppressive, and on that ground we have jurisdiction, and, in my opinion, a duty to set aside the conviction. I am then for sustaining the appeal.

LORD McLAREN and LORD WELLWOOD concurred.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and recalled the judgment.

GORDON PETER & SHAND, S.S.C.—J. W. CHESLER, Solicitor—Agents.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION, &c., 1891-92.

WINTER SESSION.

THOMAS JACK, Pursuer (Respondent).—Comrie Thomson—McLennan.
WILLIAM FLEMING AND OTHERS, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Ure—
A. S. D. Thomson.

No. 1.

Oct. 15, 1891.
Jack v. Flem-

Issue—Reparation—Slander—Concurrence in and adoption of the slander of another.—In an action of damages for slander against A and B, the pursuer alleged that on the occasion of his election to the eldership in a parish church, the defenders had deliberately and maliciously resolved to use means to prevent his ordination; that they had prepared, or caused to be prepared, and published a petition to the minister to be signed by members of the congregation, representing that the pursuer's appointment as an elder would be injurious to the interests of the church; that the defenders, acting in concert and in pursuance of their malicious design, proceeded to canvass certain members of the church for signatures to the petition; that the defenders called upon S to obtain his signature to the petition, and that A, in his presence, made certain false and calumnious and injurious statements regarding the pursuer; that B was then present and heard what A said, and concurred with him in said slanderous statement uttered in pursuance of their said malicious design.

The pursuer proposed the issues:—(1) Whether A made the false and calumnious statement in presence of S and B? and (2) whether B falsely and calumniously concurred in and adopted the said statement falsely and calumniously made by A?

Held that the second issue could not be allowed and that there should be one issue, viz., Whether the defenders, or either of them, and which of them, in presence and hearing of S, falsely and calumniously stated, &c.?

Held by Lord Stormonth Darling (Ordinary), and acquiesced in, that the pursuer was not bound to put in issue malice and want of probable cause, as the defenders were not privileged in canvassing for signatures to the petition.

Held by Lord Stormonth Darling, and acquiesced in, that in issues relating to statements by the defenders to the kirk-session want of probable cause must be put in the issue as well as malice.

THOMAS JACK, Houston, Renfrewshire, raised an action of damages against William Fleming, John Gourlay Harvey, and others for an alleged slander.

1st DIVISION.
Ld. Stormonth
Darling.

The pursuer averred that he had for years been a member of the Houston Parish Church, of which the defenders were also members; that the defenders had conceived malice and ill-will towards him in connection with certain proceedings taken in 1890 by the congregation regarding the election of a minister to the church; that in 1891 they seized upon the occasion of the pursuer's election to the eldership of the church as a convenient opportunity of injuring his character and gratifying their feelings of malice against him, and resolved to use every means in their power to prevent his ordination as an elder; that they accordingly falsely, calumniously, maliciously, and without probable cause, prepared and published throughout the parish a petition or representation to the minister against his ordination as an elder; and that the defenders, acting in concert and in pursuance of their malicious design, proceeded to canvas the whole members of the congregation known to them for signatures to the said petition.

No. 1.

Oct. 15, 1891.
Jack v. Fleming.

In cond. 6 the pursuer averred;—"In particular, the defenders William Fleming and John Gourlay Harvey, in their malicious endeavours to obtain signatures to the said petition, called upon Alexander Scott, gardener, Houston, at his house in Milliken Street there, on or about the 8th day of January 1891, for the purpose of securing his signature and the signature of his wife to the said petition. While there the said defender John Gourlay Harvey, in presence and hearing of the said Alexander Scott, and of Mrs Elizabeth Burt or Scott, his wife, falsely, calumniously, maliciously, and without probable cause, stated of and concerning the pursuer that pursuer had behaved most shamefully and disgracefully to" a girl named, "or did use words of like import, meaning thereby that the pursuer had been guilty of improper or immoral conduct towards" the girl named. "The said charge was absolutely and entirely groundless. Further, the said defender William Fleming was then and there present, heard what the said defender John Gourlay Harvey said, and concurred with the latter in said slanderous statement regarding the pursuer, uttered in pursuance of their said malicious design."

The pursuer further averred that in objections to the pursuer's appointment as an elder, lodged with the kirk-session, the defenders had falsely, maliciously, and without probable cause made injurious statements regarding him.

The defenders contended that in all the pursuer's issues malice and want of probable cause must be put in issue.

On 26th June 1891, the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling) appointed the following issues, inter alia, for the trial of the cause:—" (1) Whether, on or about the 8th day of January 1891, and at or near the house in Milliken Street, Houston, occupied by Alexander Scott, gardener there, the defender John Gourlay Harvey, in presence and hearing of the said Alexander Scott, of Mrs Elizabeth Burt or Scott, his wife, and of the defender William Fleming, or one or more of them, falsely and calumniously stated of and concerning the pursuer that the pursuer's conduct towards" a girl named "had been shameful, meaning thereby that the pursuer had committed or connived at immoral conduct towards" the girl named, "or did use words of like import of and concerning the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and damage? Damages laid at £500. (2) Whether at the time and place above libelled, the defender William Fleming falsely and calumniously concurred in and adopted the statement falsely and calumniously made by the defender John Gourlay Harvey of and concerning the pursuer, in presence and hearing of the parties named in the first issue, or one or more of them, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £100."*

* "OPINION.—The first question is whether, as regard issues 1 to 8 inclusive the pleadings disclose a case of privilege, so as to require the insertion of the word 'maliciously.' I am of opinion that they do not. The defenders, if the honestly believed that the pursuer's character was such as to unfit him for the

The issues relating to statements made by the defenders to the kirk-session contained the words "maliciously" and "without probable cause." No. 1.
 The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The second issue must be dis- Oct. 15, 1891.
 allowed. It was quite unprecedented in form. It did not necessarily ing. Jack v. Flemimply that the defender Fleming had been a party to the slander uttered by Harvey. The defenders did not again raise the question as to the insertion of the words "maliciously" and "without probable cause."

The pursuer argued that the issue sufficiently put before the jury the question which he desired to raise against Fleming.

LORD ADAM.—I think it is altogether out of the question to allow the issue in these terms, viz., whether the defender Fleming was guilty of slandering the pursuer merely by "concurring and adopting" a statement made by another of the defenders.

I agree with what was said by your Lordship during the discussion, that the issue must charge the defender with uttering the slander complained of in some way, though not necessarily with having uttered it in so many words.

I therefore think that the issue as it stands must be disallowed, and that the point raised thereby may be included in the first issue by making it run thus: "Whether on or about the 8th day of January 1891, and at or near, &c. . . . the defenders, John Gourlay Harvey and William Fleming, or either of them, and which, did falsely and calumniously state of and concerning the pursuer," &c. If there is a statement that the defenders Harvey and Fleming were acting in concert, I do not think it necessary to put in the issue that the one made use of the words complained of in presence of the other.

I think with that alteration the first issue will try the question which the pursuer desires to raise in the second issue.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. In regard to the issue I think we ought not to sanction what would be an innovation in the law of slander.

What is proposed here to be put in issue is whether the defender Fleming was "art and part" with another of the defenders in uttering the slander complained of. Both defenders ought to be charged with the uttering of the slander, and the jury will say whether the circumstances proved in regard to the second defender's conduct amount to an utterance of the slander by him.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT approved of, inter alia, the following issue for the trial of eldership, were within the protection of privilege in stating their objections to the kirk-session, but I do not think that they were under any protection in canvassing among the parishioners for signatures to a petition. The question whether the pursuer should be made an elder lay with the kirk-session, and not with the parishioners.

"With regard to issues 9, 10, 11, and 12, which relate to statements made to the kirk-session, it is admitted by the pursuer that they must contain the word 'maliciously,' but the defenders maintain that they should also contain the words 'and without probable cause.' The common case in which these words require to be inserted is where information is given to the criminal authorities. But that is not the only case; and the test seems to be whether the defenders were acting in the discharge of a public duty (see Croucher v. Inglis, 16 R. 774). Now, I think it may fairly be said that when a kirk-session, one of the recognised judicatories of the country, publicly invites objections to the ordination of certain persons as elders, it is a public duty on the part of any parishioner, who honestly entertains objections to their ordination, to state his objections in the proper quarter. I therefore think that these words must go in."

No. 1.

Oct. 15, 1891.
Jack v. Fleming.

the cause :—" Whether, on or about the 8th day of January 1891, and at or near the house in Milliken Street, Houston, occupied by Alexander Scott, gardener there, the defenders, John Gourlay Harvey and William Fleming, or either and which of them, in presence and hearing of the said Alexander Scott, and of Mrs Elizabeth Burt or Scott, his wife, or one of them, falsely and calumniously stated of and concerning the pursuer that the pursuer's conduct towards" a girl named "had been shameful, meaning thereby that the pursuer had committed or connived at immoral conduct towards . . . or did use words of like import of and concerning the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and damage? Damages against the defender John Gourlay Harvey laid at £500. Damages against the defender William Fleming laid at £100."

CUMMING & DUFF, S.S.C.—SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 2.

Oct. 17, 1891.
Dunsmore's
Trustee v.
Stewart.

ALEXANDER GORDON (Peter Dunsmore's Trustee), Appellant.—Clyde.
JAMES STEWART, Respondent.

Process—Caution for expenses—Bankruptcy—Undischarged bankrupt.—An undischarged bankrupt lodged a claim in the sequestration of another bankrupt. The trustee having rejected the claim, the claimant appealed to the Sheriff. Held that the claimant could not be allowed to proceed without finding caution for expenses.

1st Division.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

JAMES STEWART, who was an undischarged bankrupt, lodged a claim in the sequestration of Peter Dunsmore, spirit-dealer there, for the sum of £301, 5s. 2d., being the amount of two bills for £100 and £200. The trustee in the sequestration having rejected the claim, Stewart lodged an appeal to the Sheriff.

On 22d May 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Birnie) appointed parties to lodge minutes prepared in terms of the statute.

The revised minute for Stewart was in these terms,—“The appellant submits and avers that the bills on which his claim is founded were granted for value, and that therefore he is entitled to succeed in this appeal.”

The trustee's revised minute was to the effect that the claimant had acted as factor for the bankrupt and collected rents and other moneys belonging to him, and had all along failed to account to his trustee for his intromissions; that the bills on which the claim was made were given by the bankrupt to cover advances to be made by the claimant on behalf of the bankrupt in the management of his affairs, and not for cash advanced at their dates; that the claimant had made no advances and had all along failed to satisfy the trustee that the bankrupt was indebted to him in anything at the date of the bills or the sequestration; that on the contrary, on an accounting there was a large balance due by the claimant to the trustee, and the trustee had therefore rejected the claim.

On 29th June the Sheriff-substitute refused a motion by the trustee that Stewart be ordained to find caution for expenses.*

Dunsmore's trustee appealed, and in addition to the statements made in his minute, he stated that Stewart's trustee had been discharged, but that prior to his discharge he had considered the propriety of making the present claim and had decided not to do so.

* “NOTE.—The appellant's claim is founded on bills, and he is virtually a defender. No doubt he has failed to convince the trustee—who has no interest except to do justice—that the bills were granted for advances at their dates, but having in view the more recent decisions this is not to my mind sufficient to compel the appellant to find caution.”

Argued for the trustee;—Even assuming, as did the Sheriff-substitute, that Stewart must be considered as a defender, he ought, in the circumstances, to be ordained to find caution.¹ But that was not truly Stewart's position. He was claiming a sum of money, and was in the position of a pursuer suing a petitory action met by the two defences of compensation and no value given. The ordinary rule must then be applied, and he should be ordained to find caution.

There was no appearance for Stewart.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This claim by James Stewart is for the amount of certain bills granted to him by the bankrupt. The claimant is at present an undischarged bankrupt. It is true that there is no trustee at present acting in his sequestration, but it has been stated to us that the trustee when in office had this claim before him and resolved not to take action upon it.

The trustee is now discharged, but the beneficial right to the sum which the bankrupt now claims is in his creditors; the money, if recovered, would fall to be administered in some form for the benefit of his creditors, and this might be done by reviving the sequestration.

Now, in this state of matters, the question arises whether, if he desires to prosecute this claim the claimant must not find caution, and whether the claim can be treated otherwise than as a suit to recover money at the instance of an undischarged bankrupt. It is true the claim is made in a sequestration, but it is not the less a proceeding by an undischarged bankrupt to recover money. I think that the ordinary rule applies, viz., that the claimant must find caution, and I cannot see anything stated on record to take the present case out of that rule. The origin and substance of the claim are not very fully divulged by the claimant. He was very pointedly challenged on this subject, and under the interlocutor of 22d May 1891, which appointed the minutes of the parties to be exchanged and revised, he had very full opportunity of explaining the origin of the bills, but he has confined his statement on the subject to a bald statement that the bills were granted for value.

I think, therefore, that he must be ordained to find caution before he can proceed.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD McLAREN.—I am unwilling to disturb the finding of the Sheriff in regard to a matter so purely discretionary as is the question whether caution should be found by an undischarged bankrupt. The policy of our bankruptcy law, however, seems to give an almost unlimited right of appeal from the Sheriff, and as the case is competently brought before us, we are bound to exercise our jurisdiction to the best of our judgment. I see no reason in the circumstances of this case for deviating from the ordinary rule as to finding security for expenses, and I agree that Stewart must be ordained to find caution.

LORD KIRKNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 29th June 1891: Remit to the Sheriff-substitute to ordain the respondent, James Stewart, to find caution for expenses in common form."

JAMES AYTON, Solicitor, Agent.

¹ Stevenson v. Lee, June 4, 1886, 13 R. 913.

No. 3. THOMAS LEES (Inspector of Poor, North Berwick), Pursuer (Appellant).

—D.-F. Balfour—Graham Stewart.

Oct. 17, 1891.

Lees v. Kemp.

T. W. KEMP (Inspector of Poor, Haddington), Defender (Respondent).—Comrie Thomson—C. J. Guthrie.

Poor—Derivative settlement—Forisfamiliation—Imbecile.—A young man, twenty-two years of age, who had all his life been so weak in mind as to be unable for any work, except of the most simple kind, and that under supervision, and who had never earned anything for his own support, was, on the application of his father, a farm-servant, removed by the inspector of poor to the district asylum. At the date of his removal he was suffering from an acute attack of mania. He continued to live in the asylum, and the relieving parish raised an action to fix liability for his support on the parish of his own birth. Held (following the case of Fraser v. Robertson, 5 Macph. 819) that at the date of his removal he had not been forisfamiliated, and that he was still a member of his father's family, and therefore chargeable to his father's residential settlement.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Haddington.

MICHAEL BUCHAN was born on 26th August 1867, and was a son of Peter Buchan, a farm-labourer. Michael went with his father to reside at Balgone Barns, in the parish of North Berwick, at Whitsunday 1887, and on 18th June 1889 application was made by the father to the inspector of poor of the parish of North Berwick for parochial relief for Michael, and for his admission to the Haddington District Lunatic Asylum, on account of his being in a state of mental derangement, and after the usual procedure Michael was admitted as an inmate of the said asylum.

The inspector of North Berwick, having thus relieved the pauper, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Haddington against the inspector of Haddington, Michael's birth parish, for reimbursement of the sums disbursed on Michael's account, or that should in the future be disbursed. At the date of the action Michael was still in the asylum.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The said Michael Buchan, being incapable of acquiring a settlement, follows the settlement of his father. (2) In the circumstances stated, the defender should be assoilzied, with expenses.

It was admitted that Michael had never earned wages and had lived with his father from his birth to June 1889, except from November 1885 to February 1886, when he was in the asylum on account of an acute attack of mania; that neither Michael nor his father had a residential settlement in Haddingtonshire; and that on the occasion of his admission to the asylum in 1889 he was again suffering from mania.

A proof was led as to the mental condition of the pauper. He could read and write a little, and tell the time on a clock, could count with a few slips up to a hundred, and could tell one coin from another. As was admitted, he had never earned any money by his work, but had gone messages for his parents to shops, and done light field work, such as carrying manure in a basket. He could not use a wheelbarrow, as he always wheeled it to one side, nor could he learn to dig. The most favourable evidence as to the pauper's state adduced by the pursuer was that of Dr Ireland, for ten years superintendent of the Asylum for Idiots at Larbert. He said,—“There is no doubt these imbecile lads are often lazy and indolent, but if they are looked after they can often earn their living on a farm. I think, from what I heard, that Michael Buchan was capable of working sufficiently on a farm for his keep.” Dr Ireland added, however,—“I do not think he is able to maintain himself without supervision, and that applies to his whole life.”

The Sheriff-substitute (Shirreff), on 26th June 1891, pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds in point of fact (first) that Michael Buchan, designed in the petition, has been during his whole life an idiot or imbecile; (second) that he has never been able to earn anything for his own support; (third) that the said Michael Buchan has been during his whole life, prior to his removal to the Haddington District Asylum, where he now is, maintained by his father as a member of his family, except during the period of three months, from 25th November 1885, when he was maintained by the Parochial Board of Dunbar in the Haddington Asylum: Finds in point of law that, in these circumstances, the parish of his father's settlement is the parish bound to relieve the pursuer of the maintenance of Michael Buchan: Therefore sustains the defences, assoilzies the defender, and decerns," &c.*

No. 3.

Oct. 17, 1891.
Lees v. Kemp.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The pauper was in fact forisfamiated. He was still living with his father, but that did not prevent forisfamiation. Many men, e.g., sons of great peers or rich men, continued to live in their fathers' houses till they became old men, and were supported by their fathers. Could it be said that such people were not independent members of society, i.e., forisfamiated? All that Fraser's case¹ decided was that forisfamiation did not come with majority. That must be conceded. There must be ability to earn a livelihood, or, to put it conversely, a child would not be forisfamiated if he lived with his father because he could not live anywhere else. As a matter of fact this boy could have earned enough to support himself; Dr Ireland said so. If he was forisfamiated he was capable of having a settlement in his own right,² i.e., in this case the parish of birth.

Argued for the defender;—Even if forisfamiated, the pauper here could not have a settlement in his own right; he was, from lack of mind, a perpetual pupil. But, looking to the cases of Nixon and Cassels quoted on the other side, in which the circumstances of the pauper must be admitted to be very similar to those of the present case, more reliance was placed on the proposition that the pauper here never was in fact forisfamiated. Mere attainment of the age of majority would not effect forisfamiation, and it was hard to see what other element tending in that direction was presented by the case here. It was idle to say that a lad who could neither dig nor trundle a wheelbarrow could earn his living at country labour; and what farmer would employ a servant who would require another to supervise his work?

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Sheriff-substitute has decided this case on the ground that the pauper has never been able to earn enough to support himself, and that, I think, is the import of the evidence.

* "NOTE.— . . . Although he had attained the age of twenty-two years when he became chargeable to the parish of North Berwick, his father was still bound to support him. After he attained majority he did nothing to break the ties that 'united him to the family circle.' He was therefore 'still a child of the house in the ordinary sense of that expression, a member of the family of which his father was the head, and consequently his settlement still depended on that of his father.'—(Fraser v. Robertson, 6th June 1867, 5 Macph., p. 819, Lord Justice-Clerk, p. 823, 39 Scot. Jur. 455.)

"The only ground on which, in this action, the parish of Haddington is sought to be made liable for the maintenance of the lunatic is, that Haddington is his own parish of birth. As the Sheriff-substitute is humbly of opinion that the parish bound to support the lunatic is the parish of his father's settlement, the defender, as representing the parish of Haddington, is assoilzied."

¹ See Sheriff-substitute's note, supra.

² Nixon v. Rowand, Dec. 20, 1887, 15 R. 191; Cassels v. Somerville and Scott, June 24, 1885, 12 R. 1155.

No. 3. The case was heard on the 11th of the month of March. He has been in the service of the Sheriff-substitute during the whole of his youth, except when he was in the service of the Sheriff-substitute during the year 1888.

The case was heard on the 11th of the month of March. There is a copy of a similar petition which was presented to the Sheriff-substitute, and which was a petition for the recovery of the children of the petitioner. The petition of the petitioner was a petition for the recovery of the children of the petitioner. The petition of the petitioner was a petition for the recovery of the children of the petitioner.

Lord Broughmuir.—The petition of the petitioner was not impugned, and we must pronounce a decree in favour of the petitioner as expressed. I think with great confidence that the present case is ruled by the case of Foster.

Lord Macdonald.

Lord Macdonald.

The Court pronounced the interdict—“Find in fact in terms of the findings in fact in the interdict of the Sheriff-substitute against the respondents. There be leave to appeal.”

Lord Macdonald.—Edinburgh & Leith Children's Aid and Refuge Association.

No. 4.

Case No. 1888.
Interdict v.
Interdict v.
Interdict v.
Interdict v.
Interdict v.
Interdict v.
Interdict v.
Interdict v.

Arthur Delaney, Petitioner.—James Stirling, Respondent.
James Stirling and Others, Respondents of Edinburgh and Leith Children's Aid and Refuge Association.—J. C. L. v. J. C. L.

Parent and Child—Custody of Children—Interdict—Responsibility of parents.—In a petition by a father against S., the original founder of the Association for destitute children, and certain directors appointed by her, to have them ordained to restore his three children who had been taken by S. to Nova Scotia, the Court, on 7th June 1889, ordained the defenders to deliver the children to their father on or before the first sederunt-day in October, and further appointed them to report to the Court on 18th July what steps had been taken in pursuance of the order. The directors (who alone appeared in the petition), thereupon instituted proceedings in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia against S., from which she was ultimately discharged, it being held that she had taken all the steps which could be expected of her to find the children without success. A detective officer, who was afterwards employed by the directors, having reported that his search for the children had been fruitless, and that he saw no practical way of following it up, the respondents, on 20th October 1891, moved that, in respect that they had done everything in their power to recover the children, the interlocutor of 7th June 1889 ought to be recalled.

The Court held that the respondents had done everything which could in the circumstances be expected of them to recover the children, but sicet procedure in the petition hoc statu in order that either party might move further in it in the event of fresh information being obtained in regard to the children.

1st Division. (Sequence of case reported 16 R. 753.)

In June 1888 Arthur Delaney, painter, presented a petition against Miss Stirling, the original founder of the Edinburgh and Leith Children's Aid and Refuge, and the directors of the Refuge, praying that they should be ordained to deliver to him his three children, whom he alleged that they had removed to Nova Scotia. The directors of the Association alone appeared in the petition.

On 7th June 1889 the Court pronounced an interlocutor ordaining the whole parties called as respondents to deliver the children to the petitioner, and that on or before the first sederunt-day in October, and further appointed them to report to the Court on 18th July what steps had been taken in pursuance of the order. No. 4.

In July 1889 the directors appeared, and stated that they had sent their secretary out to Nova Scotia to search for the children, but the search had been unavailing. In a minute they stated that they proposed to take legal proceedings for delivery of the children against Miss Stirling, who had gone to Nova Scotia. Oct. 20, 1891.
Delaney v. Directors of Edinburgh and Leith Children's Aid and Refuge.

On 14th July 1891 the petitioner lodged a note, in which he stated that these proceedings * had not resulted in the recovery of the children, and craved the Court to ordain the respondents to enable the petitioner and his law-agent to proceed to America and to search for the children over a reasonable time, or otherwise to ordain the respondents individually to proceed to America. The Court allowed the directors till 17th July to consider what they would do further in compliance with the order of June 1889, and upon 17th July 1891 they lodged a minute proposing to employ detectives in further search.

On 17th July the Court interponed authority to this minute, "the respondents to report to the Court by the first sederunt-day in October."

A Canadian detective officer, Mr Mellish, was accordingly employed, and on 9th September he issued his report. After a full narration of the efforts unsuccessfully made by him to trace the children, from which it appeared that he had found different persons with whom the children had at different times lived, he stated,—“I am convinced that the several changes effected in their respective residences of late were made with the deliberate intention of avoiding location in case of inquiry, and I know of nothing further I can do except grope somewhat aimlessly without anything to work upon.”

The report having been boxed to the Court in terms of the interlocutor of 17th July, counsel for the respondents moved that in respect they had done everything in their power to recover the children, the interlocutor of 7th June 1889 should be recalled.

This motion was opposed by counsel for the petitioner, who moved that the respondents be ordained to bring the judgment of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia (which was not unanimous) under the review of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

The petitioner contended that having failed to carry out a general order to deliver up the children, it was incumbent upon the directors to suggest some further procedure to have the order carried out.¹

LORD ADAM.—This petition is before us upon a report by a detective officer who was sent out by the respondents to search for the children under an order of the Court.

I cannot say that the report is satisfactory, but so far as I can gather from its terms the detective officer has done all he could, and he tells us that he does not see any other means of following up his search.

* The proceedings referred to were raised in the form of an application to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia at Halifax, dated 23d July 1889. After sundry procedure judgment was pronounced against Miss Stirling on 21st February 1891, and a writ of attachment for contempt of Court was issued against her. She was liberated on bail, and after an opportunity had been given to her of answering interrogatories, the Court, upon 8th July 1891, by a majority of two Judges to one, found her answers satisfactory; that she had purged the contempt declared against her, and accordingly discharged her.

¹ The Queen v. Barnardo, 1889, L. R., 23 Q. B. D. 305, and 1890, L. R., 24 Q. B. D. 283.

No. 4.

Oct. 21, 1891.
*James v.
 Directors of the Nova Scotia Prison Board.*
See also page 10.

As far, then, as that report goes, I cannot see any practical course which can be adopted to make further search successful.

It has been suggested to us by counsel for the petitioner that in view of the fact that the judgment of the Supreme Court in Nova Scotia was not unanimous we ought to order the respondents to appeal it to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

The judgment of the Court of Nova Scotia has, however, by a majority of two Judges to one, declared that Miss Stirling has satisfactorily answered the interrogatories put to her by the Court, and has purged herself of the contempt of which she was formerly found guilty. I do not then see how we could take any further proceedings as regards the judgment which would be effectual.

It is not suggested from the bar that any other effectual course could be taken.

For my own part, I should be very willing to give the fullest assistance to the father in his search for these children. It seems very remarkable that this lady, who may be actuated by benevolent motives, should take the children outwink the jurisdiction of the Court, and should then allow them to disappear in the wilds of Nova Scotia without also being able to say where they are to be found.

I think, however, that the directors have bona fide done all that they can be expected to do.

In my opinion this petition ought not to be sent out of Court, for it may be that further information will come to the father or the directors which may make it competent and proper for them to make another motion in the petition.

We ought then, I think, to pronounce no further order in the meantime.

THE LORD PRESIDENT, LORD McLAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having resumed consideration of the case, together with the report, sist procedure under the petition loc statim."

E. D. YOUNG, W.S.—R. C. GRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 5.

Oct. 21, 1891.
*Taylor v.
 Maclellans.*

H. & E. TAYLOR, Pursuers (Appellants).—Asher—Ure.
P. & W. MACLELLAN, Defenders (Respondents).—Jameson—Dickson.
Et c contra.

Contract—Delivery—Unforeseen accidents preventing delivery.—Where a person has contracted to deliver goods, which are not part of his own stock in trade, and are known not to be, and has taken due care in placing his order for these goods with a manufacturer, he will not be responsible for any delay in the delivery that may be caused by unforeseen circumstances, such as strikes, or sickness among workmen.

A firm of iron-merchants in Glasgow contracted to supply the iron work of certain buildings, at prices which were such as to shew to persons in the trade that the iron was to be got abroad. No time was fixed for delivery, but it was part of the contract that the prices specified should include charges for "delivery at the job at such times as may be required by the masons." The iron-merchants made due arrangements with a well-known firm of ironmasters in Belgium for supply of the goods required. The ordinary and reasonable time required for the production of the iron, after specifications had been received, was six weeks. The iron not having been delivered for several weeks after that date the parties who had contracted with the iron-merchants raised an action of damages against them for loss incurred in consequence of this delay. In defence it was pleaded that the delays were due to strikes, and to the heat of the weather, which had been so great as to produce sickness among the workmen in Belgium. These facts being shewn to have caused the delay complained of, held that the goods had been duly and timeously delivered in terms of the contract.

No. 5.

Oct. 21, 1891.
Taylors v.
Maclellans.

In March 1888 P. & W. Maclellan, iron-merchants, Glasgow, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow for payment of a sum of £244, 16s. 9d. against H. & E. Taylor, spirit-merchants in Glasgow, being the price of certain iron-work beams and girders supplied to them for use in building three houses in Glasgow.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

The only defence to this action was a plea of compensation in respect of a sum of damages which the defenders said was due to them for loss sustained by them owing to delay in the completion of the buildings caused by the failure of Maclellans to deliver the iron in time.

To constitute this claim Taylors raised an action in December 1888 for £700 of damages for the loss alleged to have been thus suffered by them. They stated that there had been delay in the delivery of the iron, for which the Maclellans were responsible, and pleaded;—(1) The sum sued for being the balance of the loss which the pursuers have sustained through the defenders' breach of contract in failing timeously to deliver the goods contracted for, decree should be granted, with interest and expenses, as craved.

The defenders admitted that there had been some delay, but stated that the ordinary period allowed for delivery, viz., six or eight weeks, "was not a reasonable time in the circumstances. Explained that what is a reasonable time in a contract of the kind in ordinary circumstances is by custom (which custom the pursuers know or ought to have known), subject to an extension, if strikes, weather, or other similar causes beyond the control of persons in the position of defenders hinder the work. The following circumstances which occurred in this case, in accordance with said custom, excused the defenders from giving delivery sooner than they did. The girders, &c., were to be made and brought from Belgium, and were liable to the ordinary delays and risks of the trade there, including strikes. The pursuers and their architect were aware of this at the time of entering into the contract. Considerable delay occurred in the manufacture of the girders, &c., in consequence of strikes occurring among the men employed by the manufacturers of such work in Belgium, and also of the excessive heat prevailing at the time the goods were being manufactured, causing the work to be interrupted. But for these and other similar causes the goods would have been delivered within the usual time allowed by custom of trade in the ordinary case, which is within six or eight weeks of the date of final order."

They pleaded;—(3) The defenders having given delivery within a reasonable time, having reference to the circumstances, they should be absolved, with expenses.

The actions were conjoined and a proof was allowed.

The contract, which was constituted by a letter of offer and a letter of acceptance, contained no direct obligation to deliver within any specified time. The letter of offer began with a schedule of estimates, and then contained this sentence,—“The prices for the above to include all charges for carriage to and delivery at the job at such times as may be required by the mason, who will take delivery of joists and beams, and lay the same.” The object of this clause was admitted in evidence to be not that the Taylors should have a right to demand delivery the moment the masons were ready, but simply to regulate the mode of delivery after the Maclellans were prepared to deliver, so that their work might not be blocked by the whole iron being delivered at once. In the usual course

No. 5.

Oct. 21, 1891.
Taylors v.
Maclellans.

goods would be delivered in six or eight weeks after specification. The prices stipulated were such as to shew any architect of experience that he was not buying goods lying in stock in Glasgow, which could be delivered at any time, but goods which had to be ordered from, manufactured in, and imported from, Belgium. The iron girders and other material required were specified for about 15th June, but were not delivered till the end of September, being thus about six weeks longer in being delivered than was usual. The defenders proved their averments as to the causes of delay.

The Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray), after findings in fact to the effect already stated, found in law “. . . (5) that the parties Maclellan have proved a custom of trade that the buyer in such cases takes the risk of delay from strikes and other unforeseen causes beyond the seller's control; (6) that the parties Maclellan have proved that in the present case the delay arose from such causes; therefore in the action Maclellans v. Taylors decerns as craved, and in the counter action assolizies the defenders.”

Taylors appealed. They argued that no custom of trade had been as a matter of fact proved, and that the delay had not been shewn to be due to the strikes and great heat to which the defenders ascribed it. On the law they argued that, as Maclellans had undertaken to deliver in a reasonable time, they must do so. If Belgium was suffering from strikes and excessive heat, then they should have gone elsewhere. It might be usual to get such goods in Belgium, but that was not the only market. If it had been intended that they should not take such risks, they should have inserted the recognised stipulations to that effect which were quite familiar.

Argued for the Maclellans;—The contract implied delivery in “reasonable” time. The question was, is that reasonable in ordinary circumstances, or reasonable in the circumstances which had come into existence at the date when the contract should have been performed? Authority said the latter was the sound meaning.¹

LORD YOUNG.—The question upon the whole matter is whether Messrs Maclellan can be held to be guilty of breach of contract in respect of the delay which occurred here. They, in the ordinary way, resorted to quite proper people in the place to which resort is commonly and familiarly had under similar circumstances, and the delay occurred there in the manner which has been explained.

Can we affirm in point of fact that they were guilty of undue delay or chargeable with undue delay in the execution of the contract, so that they were in breach of contract and were liable in damages? I am of opinion that upon the evidence we cannot affirm that. I do not quite like the expression “usage of trade” as applied in the present case. The particular language is not of first-class importance, if we know what it means, but I would rather avoid the use of the expression “usage or custom of trade,” as applicable to the circumstances of this case. When such goods as these have to be got, or are commonly got, from abroad, the causes of delay which are incident to their being procured are prima facie to be taken into account, and not unreasonably, upon the question whether the party, who is acting in the usual manner, is to have undue delay imputed to him or not. I would rather deal with the question as a question whether these causes of delay, which are proved to have occurred here not in an exceptional manner at all, may be taken into account in considering whether the party is chargeable with breach of contract. I think that they ought to be taken into account. It is said that he might have gone elsewhere. So he might, and the usual or at least not unfamiliar causes of delay might have occurred in any quarter. Had he, instead of going to Belgium, gone to some other country, there might have been no strike in Belgium, and no heat there such as to prevent men from working, and these calamities might have occurred in the place to which he resorted. I think there is no specialty in his having gone to Belgium. The same thing might have happened if he had given his order in Glasgow.

¹ Hick v. Rodocanachi, Sons, & Co., L. R. [1891], 2 Q. B. 626.

No. 5.

Oct. 21, 1891.

Taylors v.
Maclellans.

The question is whether the fact of the quite intelligible and by no means unfamiliar causes of delay occurring in Belgium at the works to which he in ordinary course resorted makes any difference, and I think it makes none. He was acting in the execution of the contract in the usual manner, with all the energy in his power, and this delay, not very great in itself, and for which no one till now has claimed damages, occurred.

I arrive then at the same conclusion as the learned Sheriff-substitute, preferring, however, to find in point of fact that the Messrs Maclellan were not guilty of undue delay, or in other words, that the undue delay imputed to them has not been established, and that they were not in undue delay in supplying and delivering the articles contracted for, and were not in breach of contract in that respect. If that is found in point of fact, then the ground of action here is negatived without any finding upon usage or custom of trade at all.

I think that such a finding ought to be pronounced, with the result that the Messrs Maclellan shall have decree for the amount sued for by them in their action, and that they shall be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action of damages against them.

LORD TRAYNER.—I have come to the same conclusion. The claim made by Messrs Maclellan being admitted, the question now to be determined is, whether the counter claim made by the Messrs Taylor for damages in respect of the failure of the Messrs Maclellan to fulfil their contract has been established. The failure alleged against them is that there was undue delay in delivering the goods which they had contracted to deliver. In considering that question the first thing to look at is the contract itself, because, if the Messrs Maclellan have there undertaken to deliver the iron furnishings in question within a specified time, they are bound to deliver within that time or answer for the consequences. In my opinion, Messrs Maclellan did not bind themselves by the contract between them and the Messrs Taylor to deliver the iron furnishings within or before any particular date.

There is no time for delivery specified. If that is a correct view of the contract, then the only obligation incumbent on the Messrs Maclellan was to deliver the goods within a reasonable time. It appears that the Messrs Maclellan took from four to eight weeks longer in the delivery of the goods than would have been the case, or would have been reasonable, in ordinary circumstances. This delay was occasioned by strikes prevailing in Belgium, where the furnishings in question were being made. Now, I concur in the opinion expressed in the case of Hick v. Rodocanachi that where a party is bound to fulfil a contract not within a specified but within a reasonable time, the reasonableness of the time taken is to be considered in connection with the circum-

No. 5.

Oct. 21, 1891.
Taylors v.
Maclellans.

goods would be delivered in six or eight weeks after specification. The prices stipulated were such as to shew any architect of experience that he was not buying goods lying in stock in Glasgow, which could be delivered at any time, but goods which had to be ordered from, manufactured in, and imported from, Belgium. The iron girders and other material required were specified for about 15th June, but were not delivered till the end of September, being thus about six weeks longer in being delivered than was usual. The defenders proved their averments as to the causes of delay.

The Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray), after findings in fact to the effect already stated, found in law “. . . (5) that the parties Maclellan have proved a custom of trade that the buyer in such cases takes the risk of delay from strikes and other unforeseen causes beyond the seller's control; (6) that the parties Maclellan have proved that in the present case the delay arose from such causes; therefore in the action Maclellans v. Taylors decerns as craved, and in the counter action assolis the defenders.”

Taylors appealed. They argued that no custom of trade had been as a matter of fact proved, and that the delay had not been shewn to be due to the strikes and great heat to which the defenders ascribed it. On the law they argued that, as Maclellans had undertaken to deliver in a reasonable time, they must do so. If Belgium was suffering from strikes and excessive heat, then they should have gone elsewhere. It might be usual to get such goods in Belgium, but that was not the only market. If it had been intended that they should not take such risks, they should have inserted the recognised stipulations to that effect which were quite familiar.

Argued for the Maclellans;—The contract implied delivery in “reasonable” time. The question was, is that reasonable in ordinary circumstances, or reasonable in the circumstances which had come into existence at the date when the contract should have been performed? Authority said the latter was the sound meaning.¹

LORD YOUNG.—The question upon the whole matter is whether Messrs Maclellan can be held to be guilty of breach of contract in respect of the delay which occurred here. They, in the ordinary way, resorted to quite proper people in the place to which resort is commonly and familiarly had under similar circumstances, and the delay occurred there in the manner which has been explained.

Can we affirm in point of fact that they were guilty of undue delay or chargeable with undue delay in the execution of the contract, so that they were in breach of contract and were liable in damages? I am of opinion that upon the evidence we cannot affirm that. I do not quite like the expression “usage of trade” as applied in the present case. The particular language is not of first-class importance, if we know what it means, but I would rather avoid the use of the expression “usage or custom of trade,” as applicable to the circumstances of this case. When such goods as these have to be got, or are commonly got, from abroad, the causes of delay which are incident to their being procured are prima facie to be taken into account, and not unreasonably, upon the question whether the party, who is acting in the usual manner, is to have undue delay imputed to him or not. I would rather deal with the question as a question whether these causes of delay, which are proved to have occurred here not in an exceptional manner at all, may be taken into account in considering whether the party is chargeable with breach of contract. I think that they ought to be taken into account. It is said that he might have gone elsewhere. So he might, and the usual or at least not unfamiliar causes of delay might have occurred in any quarter. Had he, instead of going to Belgium, gone to some other country, there might have been no strike in Belgium, and no heat there such as to prevent men from working, and these calamities might have occurred in the place to which he resorted. I think there is no specialty in his having gone to Belgium. The same thing might have happened if he had given his order in Glasgow.

¹ Hick v. Rodocanachi, Sons, & Co., L. R. [1891], 2 Q. B. 626.

No. 5.

Oct. 21, 1891.
Taylors v.
Maclellans.

The question is whether the fact of the quite intelligible and by no means unfamiliar causes of delay occurring in Belgium at the works to which he in ordinary course resorted makes any difference, and I think it makes none. He was acting in the execution of the contract in the usual manner, with all the energy in his power, and this delay, not very great in itself, and for which no one till now has claimed damages, occurred.

I arrive then at the same conclusion as the learned Sheriff-substitute, preferring, however, to find in point of fact that the Messrs Maclellan were not guilty of undue delay, or in other words, that the undue delay imputed to them has not been established, and that they were not in undue delay in supplying and delivering the articles contracted for, and were not in breach of contract in that respect. If that is found in point of fact, then the ground of action here is negated without any finding upon usage or custom of trade at all.

I think that such a finding ought to be pronounced, with the result that the Messrs Maclellan shall have decree for the amount sued for by them in their action, and that they shall be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action of damages against them.

LORD TRAYNER.—I have come to the same conclusion. The claim made by Messrs Maclellan being admitted, the question now to be determined is, whether the counter claim made by the Messrs Taylor for damages in respect of the failure of the Messrs Maclellan to fulfil their contract has been established. The failure alleged against them is that there was undue delay in delivering the goods which they had contracted to deliver. In considering that question the first thing to look at is the contract itself, because, if the Messrs Maclellan have there undertaken to deliver the iron furnishings in question within a specified time, they are bound to deliver within that time or answer for the consequences. In my opinion, Messrs Maclellan did not bind themselves by the contract between them and the Messrs Taylor to deliver the iron furnishings within or before any particular date.

There is no time for delivery specified. If that is a correct view of the contract, then the only obligation incumbent on the Messrs Maclellan was to deliver the goods within a reasonable time. It appears that the Messrs Maclellan took from four to eight weeks longer in the delivery of the goods than would have been the case, or would have been reasonable, in ordinary circumstances. This delay was occasioned by strikes prevailing in Belgium, where the furnishings in question were being made. Now, I concur in the opinion expressed in the case of Hick v. Rodocanachi that where a party is bound to fulfil a contract not within a specified but within a reasonable time, the reasonableness of the time taken is to be considered in connection with the circum-

No. 1.

Oct. 15, 1891.
Jack v. Fleming.

the cause :—" Whether, on or about the 8th day of January 1891, and at or near the house in Milliken Street, Houston, occupied by Alexander Scott, gardener there, the defenders, John Gourlay Harvey and William Fleming, or either and which of them, in presence and hearing of the said Alexander Scott, and of Mrs Elizabeth Burt or Scott, his wife, or one of them, falsely and calumniously stated of and concerning the pursuer that the pursuer's conduct towards " a girl named " had been shameful, meaning thereby that the pursuer had committed or connived at immoral conduct towards . . . or did use words of like import of and concerning the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and damage? Damages against the defender John Gourlay Harvey laid at £500. Damages against the defender William Fleming laid at £100."

CUMMING & DUFF, S.S.C.—SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 2.

Oct. 17, 1891.
Dunsmore's
Trustee v.
Stewart.

ALEXANDER GORDON (Peter Dunsmore's Trustee), Appellant.—Clyde.
JAMES STEWART, Respondent.

Process—Caution for expenses—Bankruptcy—Undischarged bankrupt.—An undischarged bankrupt lodged a claim in the sequestration of another bankrupt. The trustee having rejected the claim, the claimant appealed to the Sheriff. Held that the claimant could not be allowed to proceed without finding caution for expenses.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

JAMES STEWART, who was an undischarged bankrupt, lodged a claim in the sequestration of Peter Dunsmore, spirit-dealer there, for the sum of £301, 5s. 2d., being the amount of two bills for £100 and £200. The trustee in the sequestration having rejected the claim, Stewart lodged an appeal to the Sheriff.

On 22d May 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Birnie) appointed parties to lodge minutes prepared in terms of the statute.

The revised minute for Stewart was in these terms,—“ The appellant submits and avers that the bills on which his claim is founded were granted for value, and that therefore he is entitled to succeed in this appeal.”

The trustee's revised minute was to the effect that the claimant had acted as factor for the bankrupt and collected rents and other moneys belonging to him, and had all along failed to account to his trustee for his intromissions; that the bills on which the claim was made were given by the bankrupt to cover advances to be made by the claimant on behalf of the bankrupt in the management of his affairs, and not for cash advanced at their dates; that the claimant had made no advances and had all along failed to satisfy the trustee that the bankrupt was indebted to him in anything at the date of the bills or the sequestration; that on the contrary, on an accounting there was a large balance due by the claimant to the trustee, and the trustee had therefore rejected the claim.

On 29th June the Sheriff-substitute refused a motion by the trustee that Stewart be ordained to find caution for expenses.*

Dunsmore's trustee appealed, and in addition to the statements made in his minute, he stated that Stewart's trustee had been discharged, but that prior to his discharge he had considered the propriety of making the present claim and had decided not to do so.

* “ NOTE.—The appellant's claim is founded on bills, and he is virtually a defender. No doubt he has failed to convince the trustee—who has no interest except to do justice—that the bills were granted for advances at their dates, but having in view the more recent decisions this is not to my mind sufficient to compel the appellant to find caution.”

Argued for the trustee;—Even assuming, as did the Sheriff-substitute, No. 2.
that Stewart must be considered as a defender, he ought, in the circumstances, to be ordained to find caution.¹ But that was not truly Stewart's Oct. 17, 1891.
position. He was claiming a sum of money, and was in the position of Dunsmore's
a pursuer suing a petitory action met by the two defences of compensa- Trustee v. Stewart.
tion and no value given. The ordinary rule must then be applied, and he should be ordained to find caution.

There was no appearance for Stewart.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This claim by James Stewart is for the amount of certain bills granted to him by the bankrupt. The claimant is at present an undischarged bankrupt. It is true that there is no trustee at present acting in his sequestration, but it has been stated to us that the trustee when in office had this claim before him and resolved not to take action upon it.

The trustee is now discharged, but the beneficial right to the sum which the bankrupt now claims is in his creditors; the money, if recovered, would fall to be administered in some form for the benefit of his creditors, and this might be done by reviving the sequestration.

Now, in this state of matters, the question arises whether, if he desires to prosecute this claim the claimant must not find caution, and whether the claim can be treated otherwise than as a suit to recover money at the instance of an undischarged bankrupt. It is true the claim is made in a sequestration, but it is not the less a proceeding by an undischarged bankrupt to recover money. I think that the ordinary rule applies, viz., that the claimant must find caution, and I cannot see anything stated on record to take the present case out of that rule. The origin and substance of the claim are not very fully divulged by the claimant. He was very pointedly challenged on this subject, and under the interlocutor of 22d May 1891, which appointed the minutes of the parties to be exchanged and revised, he had very full opportunity of explaining the origin of the bills, but he has confined his statement on the subject to a bald statement that the bills were granted for value.

I think, therefore, that he must be ordained to find caution before he can proceed.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am unwilling to disturb the finding of the Sheriff in regard to a matter so purely discretionary as is the question whether caution should be found by an undischarged bankrupt. The policy of our bankruptcy law, however, seems to give an almost unlimited right of appeal from the Sheriff, and as the case is competently brought before us, we are bound to exercise our jurisdiction to the best of our judgment. I see no reason in the circumstances of this case for deviating from the ordinary rule as to finding security for expenses, and I agree that Stewart must be ordained to find caution.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 29th June 1891: Remit to the Sheriff-substitute to ordain the respondent, James Stewart, to find caution for expenses in common form."

JAMES AYTON, Solicitor, Agent.

¹ Stevenson v. Lee, June 4, 1886, 13 R. 913.

No. 3. THOMAS LEES (Inspector of Poor, North Berwick), Pursuer (Appellant).

—D. F. Balfour—Graham Stewart.

Oct. 17, 1891. T. W. KEMP (Inspector of Poor, Haddington), Defender (Respondent).—
Lees v. Kemp. Comrie Thomson—C. J. Guthrie.

Poor—Derivative settlement—Forisfamiliation—Imbecile.—A young man, twenty-two years of age, who had all his life been so weak in mind as to be unable for any work, except of the most simple kind, and that under supervision, and who had never earned anything for his own support, was, on the application of his father, a farm-servant, removed by the inspector of poor to the district asylum. At the date of his removal he was suffering from an acute attack of mania. He continued to live in the asylum, and the relieving parish raised an action to fix liability for his support on the parish of his own birth. Held (following the case of Fraser v. Robertson, 5 Macph. 819) that at the date of his removal he had not been forisfamiliated, and that he was still a member of his father's family, and therefore chargeable to his father's residential settlement.

2d Division.
 Sheriff of
 Haddington.

MICHAEL BUCHAN was born on 26th August 1867, and was a son of Peter Buchan, a farm-labourer. Michael went with his father to reside at Balgone Barns, in the parish of North Berwick, at Whitsunday 1887, and on 18th June 1889 application was made by the father to the inspector of poor of the parish of North Berwick for parochial relief for Michael, and for his admission to the Haddington District Lunatic Asylum, on account of his being in a state of mental derangement, and after the usual procedure Michael was admitted as an inmate of the said asylum.

The inspector of North Berwick, having thus relieved the pauper, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Haddington against the inspector of Haddington, Michael's birth parish, for reimbursement of the sums disbursed on Michael's account, or that should in the future be disbursed. At the date of the action Michael was still in the asylum.

The defender pleaded ;—(1) The said Michael Buchan, being incapable of acquiring a settlement, follows the settlement of his father. (2) In the circumstances stated, the defender should be assoilzied, with expenses.

It was admitted that Michael had never earned wages and had lived with his father from his birth to June 1889, except from November 1885 to February 1886, when he was in the asylum on account of an acute attack of mania ; that neither Michael nor his father had a residential settlement in Haddingtonshire ; and that on the occasion of his admission to the asylum in 1889 he was again suffering from mania.

A proof was led as to the mental condition of the pauper. He could read and write a little, and tell the time on a clock, could count with a few slips up to a hundred, and could tell one coin from another. As was admitted, he had never earned any money by his work, but had gone messages for his parents to shops, and done light field work, such as carrying manure in a basket. He could not use a wheelbarrow, as he always wheeled it to one side, nor could he learn to dig. The most favourable evidence as to the pauper's state adduced by the pursuer was that of Dr Ireland, for ten years superintendent of the Asylum for Idiots at Larbert. He said,—“There is no doubt these imbecile lads are often lazy and indolent, but if they are looked after they can often earn their living on a farm. I think, from what I heard, that Michael Buchan was capable of working sufficiently on a farm for his keep.” Dr Ireland added however,—“I do not think he is able to maintain himself without supervision, and that applies to his whole life.”

The Sheriff-substitute (Shirreff), on 26th June 1891, pronounced the interlocutor :—“Finds in point of fact (first) that Michael Buchan, de tioner, and that on or before the first sederunt-day in October, and further appointed them to report to the Court on 18th July what steps had been taken in pursuance of the order.

In July 1889 the directors appeared, and stated that they had sent their secretary out to Nova Scotia to search for the children, but the search had been unavailing. In a minute they stated that they proposed to take legal proceedings for delivery of the children against Miss Stirling, who had gone to Nova Scotia.

No. 4.
Oct. 20, 1891.
Delaney v.
Directors of Edinburgh
and Leith
Children's Aid
and Refuge.

On 14th July 1891 the petitioner lodged a note, in which he stated that these proceedings* had not resulted in the recovery of the children, and craved the Court to ordain the respondents to enable the petitioner and his law-agent to proceed to America and to search for the children over a reasonable time, or otherwise to ordain the respondents individually to proceed to America. The Court allowed the directors till 17th July to consider what they would do further in compliance with the order of June 1889, and upon 17th July 1891 they lodged a minute proposing to employ detectives in further search.

On 17th July the Court interponed authority to this minute, "the respondents to report to the Court by the first sederunt-day in October."

A Canadian detective officer, Mr Mellish, was accordingly employed, and on 9th September he issued his report. After a full narration of the efforts unsuccessfully made by him to trace the children, from which it appeared that he had found different persons with whom the children had at different times lived, he stated,—“I am convinced that the several changes effected in their respective residences of late were made with the deliberate intention of avoiding location in case of inquiry, and I know of nothing further I can do except grope somewhat aimlessly without anything to work upon.”

The report having been boxed to the Court in terms of the interlocutor of 17th July, counsel for the respondents moved that in respect they had done everything in their power to recover the children, the interlocutor of 7th June 1889 should be recalled.

This motion was opposed by counsel for the petitioner, who moved that the respondents be ordained to bring the judgment of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia (which was not unanimous) under the review of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

The petitioner contended that having failed to carry out a general order to deliver up the children, it was incumbent upon the directors to suggest some further procedure to have the order carried out.¹

LORD ADAM.—This petition is before us upon a report by a detective officer who was sent out by the respondents to search for the children under an order of the Court.

I cannot say that the report is satisfactory, but so far as I can gather from its terms the detective officer has done all he could, and he tells us that he does not see any other means of following up his search.

* The proceedings referred to were raised in the form of an application to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia at Halifax, dated 23d July 1889. After sundry procedure judgment was pronounced against Miss Stirling on 21st February 1891, and a writ of attachment for contempt of Court was issued against her. She was liberated on bail, and after an opportunity had been given to her of answering interrogatories, the Court, upon 8th July 1891, by a majority of two Judges to one, found her answers satisfactory; that she had purged the contempt declared against her, and accordingly discharged her.

¹ The Queen v. Barnardo, 1889, L. R., 23 Q. B. D. 305, and 1890, L. R., 24 Q. B. D. 283.

No. 4.

Oct. 20, 1891.

Delaney v.
Directors of Edinburgh
and Leith
Children's Aid
and Refuge.

As far, then, as that report goes, I cannot see any practical course which can be adopted to make further search successful.

It has been suggested to us by counsel for the petitioner that in view of the fact that the judgment of the Supreme Court in Nova Scotia was not unanimous we ought to order the respondents to appeal it to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

The judgment of the Court of Nova Scotia has, however, by a majority of two Judges to one, declared that Miss Stirling has satisfactorily answered the interrogatories put to her by the Court, and has purged herself of the contempt of which she was formerly found guilty. I do not then see how we could take any further proceedings as regards the judgment which would be effectual.

It is not suggested from the bar that any other effectual course could be taken.

For my own part, I should be very willing to give the fullest assistance to the father in his search for these children. It seems very remarkable that this lady, who may be actuated by benevolent motives, should take the children outwith the jurisdiction of the Court, and should then allow them to disappear in the wilds of Nova Scotia without also being able to say where they are to be found.

I think, however, that the directors have bona fide done all that they can be expected to do.

In my opinion this petition ought not to be sent out of Court, for it may be that further information will come to the father or the directors which may make it competent and proper for them to make another motion in the petition.

We ought then, I think, to pronounce no further order in the meantime.

The LORD PRESIDENT, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having resumed consideration of the case, together with the report, sist procedure under the petition hoc statu."

E. D. YOUNG, W.S.—R. C. GRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 5.

Oct. 21, 1891.

Taylors v.
Maclellans.

H. & E. TAYLOR, Pursuers (Appellants).—Asher—Ure.
P. & W. MACLELLAN, Defenders (Respondents).—Jamcson—Dickson.
Et c contra.

Contract—Delivery—Unforeseen accidents preventing delivery.—Where a person has contracted to deliver goods, which are not part of his own stock in trade, and are known not to be, and has taken due care in placing his order for these goods with a manufacturer, he will not be responsible for any delay in the delivery that may be caused by unforeseen circumstances, such as strikes, or sickness among workmen.

A firm of iron-merchants in Glasgow contracted to supply the iron work of certain buildings, at prices which were such as to shew to persons in the trade that the iron was to be got abroad. No time was fixed for delivery, but it was part of the contract that the prices specified should include charges for "delivery at the job at such times as may be required by the masons." The iron-merchants made due arrangements with a well-known firm of ironmasters in Belgium for supply of the goods required. The ordinary and reasonable time required for the production of the iron, after specifications had been received, was six weeks. The iron not having been delivered for several weeks after that date, the parties who had contracted with the iron-merchants raised an action of damages against them for loss incurred in consequence of this delay. In defence it was pleaded that the delays were due to strikes, and to the heat of the weather, which had been so great as to produce sickness among the workmen in Belgium. These facts being shewn to have caused the delay complained of, held that the goods had been duly and timeously delivered in terms of the contract.

No. 5.

Oct. 21, 1891.

Taylors v.
Maclellans.

In March 1888 P. & W. Maclellan, iron-merchants, Glasgow, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow for payment of a sum of £244, 16s. 9d. against H. & E. Taylor, spirit-merchants in Glasgow, being the price of certain iron-work beams and girders supplied to them for use in building three houses in Glasgow.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

The only defence to this action was a plea of compensation in respect of a sum of damages which the defenders said was due to them for loss sustained by them owing to delay in the completion of the buildings caused by the failure of Maclellans to deliver the iron in time.

To constitute this claim Taylors raised an action in December 1888 for £700 of damages for the loss alleged to have been thus suffered by them. They stated that there had been delay in the delivery of the iron, for which the Maclellans were responsible, and pleaded;—(1) The sum sued for being the balance of the loss which the pursuers have sustained through the defenders' breach of contract in failing timeously to deliver the goods contracted for, decree should be granted, with interest and expenses, as craved.

The defenders admitted that there had been some delay, but stated that the ordinary period allowed for delivery, viz., six or eight weeks, "was not a reasonable time in the circumstances. Explained that what is a reasonable time in a contract of the kind in ordinary circumstances is by custom (which custom the pursuers know or ought to have known), subject to an extension, if strikes, weather, or other similar causes beyond the control of persons in the position of defenders hinder the work. The following circumstances which occurred in this case, in accordance with said custom, excused the defenders from giving delivery sooner than they did. The girders, &c., were to be made and brought from Belgium, and were liable to the ordinary delays and risks of the trade there, including strikes. The pursuers and their architect were aware of this at the time of entering into the contract. Considerable delay occurred in the manufacture of the girders, &c., in consequence of strikes occurring among the men employed by the manufacturers of such work in Belgium, and also of the excessive heat prevailing at the time the goods were being manufactured, causing the work to be interrupted. But for these and other similar causes the goods would have been delivered within the usual time allowed by custom of trade in the ordinary case, which is within six or eight weeks of the date of final order."

They pleaded;—(3) The defenders having given delivery within a reasonable time, having reference to the circumstances, they should be assoilzied, with expenses.

The actions were conjoined and a proof was allowed.

The contract, which was constituted by a letter of offer and a letter of acceptance, contained no direct obligation to deliver within any specified time. The letter of offer began with a schedule of estimates, and then contained this sentence,—“The prices for the above to include all charges for carriage to and delivery at the job at such times as may be required by the mason, who will take delivery of joists and beams, and lay the same.” The object of this clause was admitted in evidence to be not that the Taylors should have a right to demand delivery the moment the masons were ready, but simply to regulate the mode of delivery after the Maclellans were prepared to deliver, so that their work might not be blocked by the whole iron being delivered at once. In the usual course

No. 4.

Oct. 20, 1891.
Delaney v.
Directors of Edinburgh
and Leith
Children's Aid
and Refuge.

As far, then, as that report goes, I cannot see any practical course which can be adopted to make further search successful.

It has been suggested to us by counsel for the petitioner that in view of the fact that the judgment of the Supreme Court in Nova Scotia was not unanimous we ought to order the respondents to appeal it to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

The judgment of the Court of Nova Scotia has, however, by a majority of two Judges to one, declared that Miss Stirling has satisfactorily answered the interrogatories put to her by the Court, and has purged herself of the contempt of which she was formerly found guilty. I do not then see how we could take any further proceedings as regards the judgment which would be effectual.

It is not suggested from the bar that any other effectual course could be taken.

For my own part, I should be very willing to give the fullest assistance to the father in his search for these children. It seems very remarkable that this lady, who may be actuated by benevolent motives, should take the children outwith the jurisdiction of the Court, and should then allow them to disappear in the wilds of Nova Scotia without also being able to say where they are to be found.

I think, however, that the directors have bona fide done all that they can be expected to do.

In my opinion this petition ought not to be sent out of Court, for it may be that further information will come to the father or the directors which may make it competent and proper for them to make another motion in the petition.

We ought then, I think, to pronounce no further order in the meantime.

The LORD PRESIDENT, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having resumed consideration of the case, together with the report, sist procedure under the petition hoc statu."

E. D. YOUNG, W.S.—R. C. GRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 5.

Oct. 21, 1891.
Taylors v.
Maclellans.

H. & E. TAYLOR, Pursuers (Appellants).—Asher—Ure.
P. & W. MACLELLAN, Defenders (Respondents).—Jamson—Dickson.
Et c contra.

Contract—Delivery—Unforeseen accidents preventing delivery.—Where a person has contracted to deliver goods, which are not part of his own stock in trade, and are known not to be, and has taken due care in placing his order for these goods with a manufacturer, he will not be responsible for any delay in the delivery that may be caused by unforeseen circumstances, such as strikes, or sickness among workmen.

A firm of iron-merchants in Glasgow contracted to supply the iron work of certain buildings, at prices which were such as to shew to persons in the trade that the iron was to be got abroad. No time was fixed for delivery, but it was part of the contract that the prices specified should include charges for "delivery at the job at such times as may be required by the masons." The iron-merchants made due arrangements with a well-known firm of ironmasters in Belgium for supply of the goods required. The ordinary and reasonable time required for the production of the iron, after specifications had been received, was six weeks. The iron not having been delivered for several weeks after that date, the parties who had contracted with the iron-merchants raised an action of damages against them for loss incurred in consequence of this delay. In defence it was pleaded that the delays were due to strikes, and to the heat of exceptional manner at all, may be taken into account in considering whether the party is chargeable with breach of contract. I think that they ought to be taken into account. It is said that he might have gone elsewhere. So he might, and the usual or at least not unfamiliar causes of delay might have occurred in any quarter. Had he, instead of going to Belgium, gone to some other country, there might have been no strike in Belgium, and no heat there such as to prevent men from working, and these calamities might have occurred in the place to which he resorted. I think there is no specialty in his having gone to Belgium. The same thing might have happened if he had given his order in Glasgow.

No. 5.

Oct. 21, 1891.

Taylors v.
Maclellans.

The question is whether the fact of the quite intelligible and by no means unfamiliar causes of delay occurring in Belgium at the works to which he in ordinary course resorted makes any difference, and I think it makes none. He was acting in the execution of the contract in the usual manner, with all the energy in his power, and this delay, not very great in itself, and for which no one till now has claimed damages, occurred.

I arrive then at the same conclusion as the learned Sheriff-substitute, preferring, however, to find in point of fact that the Messrs Maclellan were not guilty of undue delay, or in other words, that the undue delay imputed to them has not been established, and that they were not in undue delay in supplying and delivering the articles contracted for, and were not in breach of contract in that respect. If that is found in point of fact, then the ground of action here is negatived without any finding upon usage or custom of trade at all.

I think that such a finding ought to be pronounced, with the result that the Messrs Maclellan shall have decree for the amount sued for by them in their action, and that they shall be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action of damages against them.

LORD TRAYNER.—I have come to the same conclusion. The claim made by Messrs Maclellan being admitted, the question now to be determined is, whether the counter claim made by the Messrs Taylor for damages in respect of the failure of the Messrs Maclellan to fulfil their contract has been established. The failure alleged against them is that there was undue delay in delivering the goods which they had contracted to deliver. In considering that question the first thing to look at is the contract itself, because, if the Messrs Maclellan have there undertaken to deliver the iron furnishings in question within a specified time, they are bound to deliver within that time or answer for the consequences. In my opinion, Messrs Maclellan did not bind themselves by the contract between them and the Messrs Taylor to deliver the iron furnishings within or before any particular date.

There is no time for delivery specified. If that is a correct view of the contract, then the only obligation incumbent on the Messrs Maclellan was to deliver the goods within a reasonable time. It appears that the Messrs Maclellan took from four to eight weeks longer in the delivery of the goods than would have been the case, or would have been reasonable, in ordinary circumstances. This delay was occasioned by strikes prevailing in Belgium, where the furnishings in question were being made. Now, I concur in the opinion expressed in the case of Hick v. Rodocanachi that where a party is bound to fulfil a contract not within a specified but within a reasonable time, the reasonableness of the time taken is to be considered in connection with the circum-

No. 5.

Oct. 21, 1891.
Taylors v.
Maclellans.

goods would be delivered in six or eight weeks after specification. The prices stipulated were such as to shew any architect of experience that he was not buying goods lying in stock in Glasgow, which could be delivered at any time, but goods which had to be ordered from, manufactured in, and imported from, Belgium. The iron girders and other material required were specified for about 15th June, but were not delivered till the end of September, being thus about six weeks longer in being delivered than was usual. The defenders proved their averments as to the causes of delay.

The Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray), after findings in fact to the effect already stated, found in law “. . . (5) that the parties Maclellan have proved a custom of trade that the buyer in such cases takes the risk of delay from strikes and other unforeseen causes beyond the seller's control; (6) that the parties Maclellan have proved that in the present case the delay arose from such causes; therefore in the action Maclellans v. Taylors decerns as craved, and in the counter action assolis the defenders.”

Taylors appealed. They argued that no custom of trade had been as a matter of fact proved, and that the delay had not been shewn to be due to the strikes and great heat to which the defenders ascribed it. On the law they argued that, as Maclellans had undertaken to deliver in a reasonable time, they must do so. If Belgium was suffering from strikes and excessive heat, then they should have gone elsewhere. It might be usual to get such goods in Belgium, but that was not the only market. If it had been intended that they should not take such risks, they should have inserted the recognised stipulations to that effect which were quite familiar.

Argued for the Maclellans;—The contract implied delivery in “reasonable” time. The question was, is that reasonable in ordinary circumstances, or reasonable in the circumstances which had come into existence at the date when the contract should have been performed? Authority said the latter was the sound meaning.¹

LORD YOUNG.—The question upon the whole matter is whether Messrs Maclellan can be held to be guilty of breach of contract in respect of the delay which occurred here. They, in the ordinary way, resorted to quite proper people in the place to which resort is commonly and familiarly had under similar circumstances, and the delay occurred there in the manner which has been explained.

Can we affirm in point of fact that they were guilty of undue delay or chargeable with undue delay in the execution of the contract, so that they were in breach of contract and were liable in damages? I am of opinion that upon the evidence we cannot affirm that. I do not quite like the expression “usage of trade” as applied in the present case. The particular language is not of first-class importance, if we know what it means, but I would rather avoid the use of the expression “usage or custom of trade,” as applicable to the circumstances of this case. When such goods as these have to be got, or are commonly got, from abroad, the causes of delay which are incident to their being procured are prima facie to be taken into account, and not unreasonably, upon the question whether the party, who is acting in the usual manner, is to have undue delay imputed to him or not. I would rather deal with the question as a question whether these causes of delay, which are proved to have occurred here not in an

¹ Hick v. Rodocanachi, Sons, & Co., L. R. [1891], 2 Q. B. 626.

ALLAN'S TRUSTEE, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Ure.
 THOMAS ALLAN & SONS, Defenders (Respondents).—W. C. Smith.

No. 6.

Oct. 23, 1891.
 Allan's Trust-
 tee v. Allan & Sons.

Process—Reclaiming Note—Failure to send copies of reclaiming note—6 Geo. IV. c. 120 (Judicature Act, 1825), sec. 18.—The 18th section of the Judicature Act, 1825, enacts that a party shall be entitled to reclaim “provided that such party shall, within twenty-one days from the date of the interlocutor” against which he reclaims, print and box the reclaiming note, &c., “and shall at the same time give notice of his application for review by delivery of six copies of the note” to the agent of his opponent.

A reclaiming note was printed, boxed, enrolled on the Single Bills of the Second Division, and sent to the roll. The six copies of the reclaiming note were not sent to the respondents' agents till four days after the case had been sent to the roll. The respondents' agents had no intimation of the reclaiming note, and no knowledge of its having been presented, till the same period had elapsed. Held, on the authority of Campbell v. Campbell, March 7, 1868, 6 Macph. 563 (dub. Lord Justice-Clerk), that the provisions of the statute were directory merely and not imperative, and that it was in the power of the Court, if no prejudice were suffered by the respondent, to relieve the reclaimer of the consequences of his neglect. Motion by the respondent to dismiss reclaiming note refused.

Process—Expenses—Separate discussion on expenses.—Per Lord Young,—“I think that the most expedient course is that we should consider and decide the question of expenses when we are forming and expressing our opinion on the merits.”

In an action by Allan's trustee against Thomas Allan & Sons a judgment disposing of the whole merits of the case was pronounced by the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) on 8th September 1891. A reclaiming note against his Lordship's judgment was printed and boxed by the trustee in the ordinary course; it appeared in the Single Bills of the Second Division on the first sederunt-day of the Winter Session, the 15th October, and was sent to the roll. On the 19th, the respondents' agents desiring to make up their account of expenses, applied to the clerk of the process in the Outer-House for the process, and then for the first time learned that a reclaiming note had been presented. So soon as the attention of the reclaimer's agents was called to the matter, they sent six copies of the reclaiming note to the opposite agents, and explained that it was purely through inadvertence that they had not done so sooner.

The respondents presented a note to the Lord Justice-Clerk craving him to move the Court to dismiss the note as incompetent. They referred to the distinct terms of the statute,¹ and argued that this point had been determined by decisions² against the competency of a reclaiming note in such circumstances. *Campbell's case*³ was in the other direction, but it was justified on the ground that the “application for review” was held to be enrolment on the Single Bills, and if the copies were delivered by that time the statute was satisfied. [LORD YOUNG referred to Mackay, i. 553, and particularly to the statement that “the recent decisions and the strong inclination of the Court is against sustaining objections of this nature.”] That statement had no warrant; the case of Muir,⁴ in which a

¹ 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 18.

² Bell v. Warden, July 2, 1830, 8 S. 1007, 2 Scot. Jur. 516; Pollock v. Harkness, July 7, 1835, 13 S. 1072, 7 Scot. Jur. 493; Fraser v. Steven's Trustees, June 6, 1839, 1 D. 886, 11 Scot. Jur. 487; Taylor v. Macdonald, Feb. 10, 1844, 6 D. 637, 16 Scot. Jur. 306.

³ Campbell v. Campbell, 1868, 6 Macph. 563, 40 Scot. Jur. 290.

⁴ Muir v. Muir, Oct. 17, 1874, 2 R. 26.

No. 1.

Oct. 15, 1891.
Jack v. Fleming.

the cause :—" Whether, on or about the 8th day of January 1891, and at or near the house in Milliken Street, Houston, occupied by Alexander Scott, gardener there, the defenders, John Gourlay Harvey and William Fleming, or either and which of them, in presence and hearing of the said Alexander Scott, and of Mrs Elizabeth Burt or Scott, his wife, or one of them, falsely and calumniously stated of and concerning the pursuer that the pursuer's conduct towards " a girl named " had been shameful, meaning thereby that the pursuer had committed or connived at immoral conduct towards . . . or did use words of like import of and concerning the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and damage ? Damages against the defender John Gourlay Harvey laid at £500. Damages against the defender William Fleming laid at £100."

CUMMING & DUFF, S.S.C.—SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 2.

Oct. 17, 1891.
Dunsmore's
Trustee v.
Stewart.

ALEXANDER GORDON (Peter Dunsmore's Trustee), Appellant.—Clyde.
JAMES STEWART, Respondent.

Process—Caution for expenses—Bankruptcy—Undischarged bankrupt.—An undischarged bankrupt lodged a claim in the sequestration of another bankrupt. The trustee having rejected the claim, the claimant appealed to the Sheriff. Held that the claimant could not be allowed to proceed without finding caution for expenses.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

JAMES STEWART, who was an undischarged bankrupt, lodged a claim in the sequestration of Peter Dunsmore, spirit-dealer there, for the sum of £301, 5s. 2d., being the amount of two bills for £100 and £200. The trustee in the sequestration having rejected the claim, Stewart lodged an appeal to the Sheriff.

On 22d May 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Birnie) appointed parties to lodge minutes prepared in terms of the statute.

The revised minute for Stewart was in these terms,—“ The appellant submits and avers that the bills on which his claim is founded were granted for value, and that therefore he is entitled to succeed in this appeal.”

The trustee's revised minute was to the effect that the claimant had acted as factor for the bankrupt and collected rents and other moneys belonging to him, and had all along failed to account to his trustee for his intromissions ; that the bills on which the claim was made were given by the bankrupt to cover advances to be made by the claimant on behalf of the bankrupt in the management of his affairs, and not for cash advanced at their dates ; that the claimant had made no advances and had all along failed to satisfy the trustee that the bankrupt was indebted to him in anything at the date of the bills or the sequestration ; that on the contrary, on an accounting there was a large balance due by the claimant to the trustee, and the trustee had therefore rejected the claim.

On 29th June the Sheriff-substitute refused a motion by the trustee that Stewart be ordained to find caution for expenses.*

Dunsmore's trustee appealed, and in addition to the statements made in his minute, he stated that Stewart's trustee had been discharged, but that prior to his discharge he had considered the propriety of making the present claim and had decided not to do so.

* “ NOTE.—The appellant's claim is founded on bills, and he is virtually a defender. No doubt he has failed to convince the trustee—who has no interest except to do justice—that the bills were granted for advances at their dates, but having in view the more recent decisions this is not to my mind sufficient to compel the appellant to find caution.”

Argued for the trustee ;—Even assuming, as did the Sheriff-substitute, No. 2.
 that Stewart must be considered as a defender, he ought, in the circumstances, to be ordained to find caution.¹ But that was not truly Stewart's Oct. 17, 1891.
 position. He was claiming a sum of money, and was in the position of Dunsmore's
 a pursuer suing a petitory action met by the two defences of compensa- Trustee v. Stewart.
 tion and no value given. The ordinary rule must then be applied, and he should be ordained to find caution.

There was no appearance for Stewart.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This claim by James Stewart is for the amount of certain bills granted to him by the bankrupt. The claimant is at present an undischarged bankrupt. It is true that there is no trustee at present acting in his sequestration, but it has been stated to us that the trustee when in office had this claim before him and resolved not to take action upon it.

The trustee is now discharged, but the beneficial right to the sum which the bankrupt now claims is in his creditors ; the money, if recovered, would fall to be administered in some form for the benefit of his creditors, and this might be done by reviving the sequestration.

Now, in this state of matters, the question arises whether, if he desires to prosecute this claim the claimant must not find caution, and whether the claim can be treated otherwise than as a suit to recover money at the instance of an undischarged bankrupt. It is true the claim is made in a sequestration, but it is not the less a proceeding by an undischarged bankrupt to recover money. I think that the ordinary rule applies, viz., that the claimant must find caution, and I cannot see anything stated on record to take the present case out of that rule. The origin and substance of the claim are not very fully divulged by the claimant. He was very pointedly challenged on this subject, and under the interlocutor of 22d May 1891, which appointed the minutes of the parties to be exchanged and revised, he had very full opportunity of explaining the origin of the bills, but he has confined his statement on the subject to a bald statement that the bills were granted for value.

I think, therefore, that he must be ordained to find caution before he can proceed.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am unwilling to disturb the finding of the Sheriff in regard to a matter so purely discretionary as is the question whether caution should be found by an undischarged bankrupt. The policy of our bankruptcy law, however, seems to give an almost unlimited right of appeal from the Sheriff, and as the case is competently brought before us, we are bound to exercise our jurisdiction to the best of our judgment. I see no reason in the circumstances of this case for deviating from the ordinary rule as to finding security for expenses, and I agree that Stewart must be ordained to find caution.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—" Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 29th June 1891 : Remit to the Sheriff-substitute to ordain the respondent, James Stewart, to find caution for expenses in common form."

JAMES AYTON, Solicitor, Agent.

¹ Stevenson v. Lee, June 4, 1886, 13 R. 913.

No. 7.

Oct. 24, 1891.
 Stocker v.
 Liquidators of the Coustons-
 holm Paper
 Mills Co.,
 Limited.

The liquidators reclaimed, and argued;—Opportunity had been given to the petitioner to have matters set right when the list was settled, and when decree for the amount of his call was pronounced. These interlocutors were final, and he must therefore remain on the list and pay his call. [LORD TRAYNER.—But a reclaiming note against either of these interlocutors would not, if he had been successful, have removed him from the register.] He might even yet have a remedy by suspension. [LORD TRAYNER.—But there again he could not get the register amended.] Surely a person who had allowed a decree for money to go out against him was barred from reviewing the grounds of that decree except by suspension. Even the remedy under the 35th section of the Act of 1862 must be asked within a reasonable time, or it might be lost.¹

Argued for the petitioner;—Section 35 of the Act of 1862 was still in force. Under the old procedure that remedy might be asked at any time, or certainly after a considerable time (in Hart's case² two years), and after decree for calls had been made.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—By this Statute of 1886 it became lawful for the Court to remit to one of the Lord Ordinaries to take the same procedure as under the Statute of 1862 was taken by the Court itself. It was provided by section 6 that all orders or judgments by the Lord Ordinary should be subject to review by reclaiming note within fourteen days.

That was all that was done by that section. The proceedings in the liquidation were transferred to the Outer-House, and what was done there by the Lord Ordinary was subjected to review by reclaiming note. But nothing more was done; and in particular that section did not deprive a party from taking the benefit of any clause of the Act of 1862 exactly as he might have done if the Act of 1886 had not been passed.

If a person would not have been barred by anything that might have happened in the Inner-House under the Act of 1862 from presenting such a petition as this, it cannot make any difference to that that the liquidation has been transferred by the later statute to the Outer-House, and a remedy given by reclaiming note against any orders or judgments of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD YOUNG, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

ALEX. MORISON, S.S.C.—CARMICHAEL & MILLER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 8.

Oct. 27, 1891.
 Milligan v.
 Muir & Co.

THOMAS MILLIGAN, Pursuer (Appellant).—Ralston.
 ROBERT MUIR & Co., Defenders (Respondents).—Jameson.—Fleming.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Risk known to servant—Unfenced machinery—Knowledge of foreman.—A lad of sixteen was employed to drive a copper-cutting machine by turning a handle which worked the fly-wheel and so set the gearing of the machine in motion. The ordinary way of driving the wheel was that this lad and another stood one on each side of the handle and turned it. While he was engaged in this work the lad's hand was crushed in the cogged or pinion wheels attached to the fly-wheel, and he raised an action against his employers at common law, and, alternatively, under the Employers Liability Act for damages.

He averred that the machine was situated close to the wall, the point of the handle being only eighteen inches from it; that at the time of the accident there was a "considerable quantity of sheets of copper laid against the wall . . . on the side of the handle on which" he should have stood, that in consequence he "could not use the handle, but had to help to turn the fly-wheel by catching the rim. He worked in this manner in sight and with the knowledge of the foreman all day, and was not forbidden to do so. He had been previously working it in the same way, which was the only possible method open to pursuer, and that with foreman's knowledge." His hand slipped off the fly-wheel, as he alleged, was caught between the pinion or cogged wheels and the spur wheel, and was crushed. He further averred that there was a duty on the defenders to have the machinery fenced, and that if it had been fenced the accident would not have happened.

¹ Buckley, p. 111 (6th edn.).

² Hart's case, 1868, L. R., 6 Eq. 512.

No. 8.

Oct. 27, 1891.
 Milligan v.
 Muir & Co.

Held (1) that he had not stated a relevant case of fault against his employers in his averments as to the presence of the sheets of copper; (2) that the averment of the foreman's knowledge of his actings was not relevant to support a case under the Employers Liability Act; and (3) that, as the machine was driven by hand, and as there was no danger in the use of it, there was no obligation to fence it.

THOMAS MILLIGAN, a lad of sixteen years of age, was employed in the workshop of Robert Muir & Company, brassfounders in Glasgow. His work was at a copper-cutting machine, which he and another lad, Dunlop, drove by turning a handle attached to a fly-wheel; this fly-wheel was geared to the other wheels of the machine which brought certain circular cutters into play. There was no mechanical power used to drive the wheel. On 16th April Milligan's hand was caught between the fly-wheel and some of the other wheels of the machine and hurt.

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of
 Lanarkshire.

To recover damages he raised an action in the Sheriff Court against his employers. He averred that "the copper-cutting machine is situated quite close to the wall. The point of the handle, which is on the rim of the wheel, is only eighteen inches from the wall. On the date in question there was a considerable quantity of sheets of copper laid against the wall opposite the machine and the handle of the machine, and also on the side of the handle on which pursuer would have stood. The boy Dunlop, who was considerably taller than pursuer, was working the handle on one side, and pursuer was placed on the other side of the handle facing him. Owing to the presence of masses of copper pursuer could not use the handle, but had to help to turn the fly-wheel by catching the rim. He worked in this manner in sight and with the knowledge of the foreman all day, and was not forbidden to do so. He had been previously working it in the same way, which was the only possible method open to pursuer, and that with foreman's knowledge." He further averred;—"The occurrence of this, or any similar accident, could have been easily prevented and rendered impossible by having the machine properly fenced and protected." . . . "It was the duty of, and incumbent on, the defenders, in terms of the Factory and Workshops Act, to have had the machinery fenced or protected, which could easily have been done at a trifling expense, and without interfering with the usefulness and working of the machinery. Had this reasonable precaution been adopted, the work would have been perfectly safe, and injury rendered impossible. Further, it is usual and customary for such machines to be so fenced."

He pleaded;—(1) Pursuer having been injured as before narrated through the fault or negligence at common law of the defenders, or those for whom they are responsible, he is entitled to decree in terms of the first of the alternative conclusions of the petition, with expenses. (2) Pursuer having been injured through the fault of the defenders, or those for whom they are responsible, under the Employers Liability Act,

No. 3.

Oct. 17, 1891.
Lees v. Kemp.

The history of the pauper may be stated very shortly. He has been in the state described by the Sheriff-substitute during the whole of his youth, except for the two periods during which he suffered from acute mania.

The case of Fraser cited by the Sheriff-substitute rules this case. There a person in a similar condition was held never to have been forisfamiliaried, and therefore to be still a member of the family of which the father was the head. The parish of the father's settlement was accordingly held to be the parish liable for the maintenance of the pauper. I think the Sheriff-substitute's judgment here is sound.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The authority of Fraser's case was not impugned, and we must pronounce a decision in accordance with the views there expressed. I think with your Lordship that the present case is ruled by the case of Fraser.

LORD TRAYNER concurred.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact in terms of the findings in fact in the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against: Therefore dismiss the appeal," &c.

LYLE & WALLACE, Solicitors—H. & H. TOD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 4.

Oct. 20, 1891.
Delaney v.
Directors of Edinburgh
and Leith
Children's Aid
and Refuge.

ARTHUR DELANEY, Petitioner.—Ross Stewart.

JAMES COLSTON AND OTHERS (Directors of Edinburgh and Leith Children's Aid and Refuge), Respondents.—J. C. Lorimer.

Parent and Child—Custody of children—Charitable institution—Responsibility of directors.—In a petition by a father against S., the original founder of a home for destitute children, and certain directors appointed by her, to have them ordained to restore his three children who had been taken by S. to Nova Scotia, the Court, on 7th June 1889, ordained the defenders to deliver the children to their father on or before the first sederunt-day in October, and further appointed them to report to the Court on 18th July what steps had been taken in pursuance of the order. The directors (who alone appeared in the petition) thereupon instituted proceedings in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia against S., from which she was ultimately discharged, it being held that she had taken all the steps which could be expected of her to find the children without success. A detective officer, who was afterwards employed by the directors, having reported that his search for the children had been fruitless, and that he saw no practical way of following it up, the respondents, on 20th October 1891, moved that, in respect that they had done everything in their power to recover the children, the interlocutor of 7th June 1889 ought to be recalled.

The Court held that the respondents had done everything which could in the circumstances be expected of them to recover the children, but sisted procedure in the petition hoc statu in order that either party might move further in it in the event of fresh information being obtained in regard to the children.

1st DIVISION.

(SEQUEL of case reported 16 R. 753.)

In June 1888 Arthur Delaney, painter, presented a petition against Miss Stirling, the original founder of the Edinburgh and Leith Children's Aid and Refuge, and the directors of the Refuge, praying that they should be ordained to deliver to him his three children, whom he alleged that they had removed to Nova Scotia. The directors of the Association alone appeared in the petition.

On 7th June 1889 the Court pronounced an interlocutor ordaining the whole parties called as respondents to deliver the children to the peti off shafting and running dangerously, so that people passing or working at or near it run risk of being hurt. It is not alleged that, if it was worked by hand in the ordinary way, there would be any danger, and there could not well be, for in ordinary working the boys must both be outside the large fly-wheel, and clear of the cogged wheels. No. 8.

Oct. 27, 1891.
Milligan v. Muir & Co.

Then it is said that he was doing what he did with the foreman's knowledge. But it is not said that the foreman had ordered him to act as he did. The mere fact that a foreman sees a workman doing a piece of work in an unusual way, and does not interfere, is scarcely a ground for holding the foreman's master liable for the consequences of what the workman does, if it results in injury to him. Such a case is plainly not covered by the Employers Liability Act.

I am therefore of opinion that the pursuer has stated no relevant case, and that the action should be dismissed.

LORD YOUNG, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT found that the pursuer had not set forth facts relevant to support the conclusions of the petition, and dismissed the action.

W. A. HYSLOP, W.S.—DRUMMOND & REID, W.S.—Agents.

ROBERT GREER, Pursuer (Appellant).—Jameson—Deas.
 ALEXANDER TURNBULL & COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—
C. J. Guthrie—Younger.

No. 9.

Oct. 27, 1891.
Greer v. Turnbull & Co.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Injury not connected with the fault alleged as ground of accident.—A workman in the employment of a firm of engineers was working a crane in their moulding-shop. In this shop was a moulding-pit about twelve feet deep. While working at the crane the workman had his thumb caught in the pinion-wheel of the crane and injured. To recover damages for this injury he raised an action against his employers, in which he averred that between the moulding-pit and the crane "at the nearest point there is only some nineteen inches or so of space"; that "in turning round the crane it became necessary for pursuer to pass along the edge of the moulding-pit, which was uncovered, and as the room left to pass was so small that the crane handle overhanging the pit, he stumbled on the edge of the pit, and, in an endeavour to regain his balance, his left hand was caught in the wheels of the crane and the thumb torn off." He also averred that the pit should have been covered and was not.

Held that the pursuer had disclosed no relevant case, the accident being, according to his own statement, due to his stumble, and that stumble not being alleged to be due to the narrowness of the space between the crane and the pit, or to the fact of the pit being uncovered.

ROBERT GREER, an ironmoulder in the employment of Alexander Turnbull & Company, engineers and valve masters at Bishopbriggs, raised an action of damages in the Sheriff Court against them for injuries received in their employment on 14th February 1891. He was engaged in working a crane in their moulding-shop at the time of the accident, lifting by means of the crane some moulding-boxes from one part of the shop to another. 2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

Of this crane he averred,—“It is placed in line with two columns supporting the roof of the moulding-shed, and within about 19 inches of one of these columns. In the same moulding-shed there is a circular moulding-pit about 12 feet deep and about 8 feet in diameter, and between this pit and the crane at the nearest point there is only some 19 inches or so of

No. 4.

Oct. 20, 1891.
 Delaney v.
 Directors of Edinburgh
 and Leith
 Children's Aid
 and Refuge.

As far, then, as that report goes, I cannot see any practical course which can be adopted to make further search successful.

It has been suggested to us by counsel for the petitioner that in view of the fact that the judgment of the Supreme Court in Nova Scotia was not unanimous we ought to order the respondents to appeal it to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

The judgment of the Court of Nova Scotia has, however, by a majority of two Judges to one, declared that Miss Stirling has satisfactorily answered the interrogatories put to her by the Court, and has purged herself of the contempt of which she was formerly found guilty. I do not then see how we could take any further proceedings as regards the judgment which would be effectual.

It is not suggested from the bar that any other effectual course could be taken.

For my own part, I should be very willing to give the fullest assistance to the father in his search for these children. It seems very remarkable that this lady, who may be actuated by benevolent motives, should take the children outwith the jurisdiction of the Court, and should then allow them to disappear in the wilds of Nova Scotia without also being able to say where they are to be found.

I think, however, that the directors have bona fide done all that they can be expected to do.

In my opinion this petition ought not to be sent out of Court, for it may be that further information will come to the father or the directors which may make it competent and proper for them to make another motion in the petition.

We ought then, I think, to pronounce no further order in the meantime.

The LORD PRESIDENT, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having resumed consideration of the case, together with the report, sist procedure under the petition hoc statu."

E. D. YOUNG, W.S.—R. C. GRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 5.

Oct. 21, 1891.
 Taylors v.
 Maclellans.

H. & E. TAYLOR, Pursuers (Appellants).—Asher—Ure.
 P. & W. MACLELLAN, Defenders (Respondents).—Jamson—Dickson.
Et c contra.

Contract—Delivery—Unforeseen accidents preventing delivery.—Where a person has contracted to deliver goods, which are not part of his own stock in trade, and are known not to be, and has taken due care in placing his order for these goods with a manufacturer, he will not be responsible for any delay in the delivery that may be caused by unforeseen circumstances, such as strikes, or sickness among workmen.

A firm of iron-merchants in Glasgow contracted to supply the iron work of certain buildings, at prices which were such as to shew to persons in the trade that the iron was to be got abroad. No time was fixed for delivery, but it was part of the contract that the prices specified should include charges for "delivery at the job at such times as may be required by the masons." The iron-merchants made due arrangements with a well-known firm of ironmasters in Belgium for supply of the goods required. The ordinary and reasonable time required for the production of the iron, after specifications had been received, was six weeks. The iron not having been delivered for several weeks after that date, the parties who had contracted with the iron-merchants raised an action of damages against them for loss incurred in consequence of this delay. In defence it was pleaded that the delays were due to strikes, and to the heat of

It is not said that the stumbling of the pursuer was occasioned by anything for which the defenders are responsible. The passage on which the pursuer stumbled was (so far as the pursuer's averments go) exactly as it had been all the time he had been in the defenders' employment. It was not insufficient for the purpose for which it was used; it was not encumbered or obstructed by anything which should not have been there. The pursuer's stumbling must therefore have arisen from pure accident or from negligence on his part. There is no averment that the passage was at all unusual or different, either as regards its width or position, from similar passages in other and similar works. There is no averment that the pursuer or anyone else had complained of the passage in any way or at any time. The first part of the defenders' alleged fault seems to me, in these circumstances, to disclose no ground of action against the defenders.

No. 9.

Oct. 27, 1891.
Greer v. Turnbull & Co.

The second ground alleged is that the moulding-pit was not covered. But the want of covering did not lead to the injury sustained by the pursuer. Had he fallen into the pit and broken his arm or his leg, or otherwise sustained injury through such a fall, the want of covering would plainly have been important. But it does not appear that if the pit had been covered the result would have been different. Having stumbled, the pursuer would naturally grasp at the nearest thing to enable him to regain his balance and prevent his falling; and this is what he did, with the unfortunate result that he lost his thumb.

It was suggested that if the pit had been covered he would not have grasped at the crane for support, but would have allowed himself to fall on the covering of the pit. But this is mere speculation, and is not averment. Had it been averred it would not have altered my opinion as to the relevancy of the pursuer's averments. I think the record discloses that the pursuer's injuries of which he complains were the result of his having stumbled on the narrow passage, and that neither the condition of the passage nor of the adjoining moulding-pit had anything to do with such injuries, and, at all events, did not cause them.

In the view I take of the case it is not necessary to consider the effect of the averment that frequent complaints had been made about the pit being uncovered. If the uncovered condition of the pit did not cause the injuries or lead to them, and I think it did not, then, although the defenders were held to be in fault in not having the pit covered, there would still be no ground of action against them, as the fault alleged did not produce or lead to the injury complained of. But it may be noticed farther that the pursuer's averment that the pit should have been covered is qualified by the words, "when not in use." The pursuer does not aver that the pit was not in use at the time he fell. I do not, however, put any weight on this criticism of the record, as it could have been amended if such an amendment would have made the pursuer's averments relevant. I am of opinion, however, that the pursuer's averments do not set forth any relevant case against the defenders.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD YOUNG, and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT found that the pursuer had not set forth facts relevant to support the conclusions of the action, and dismissed the same.

SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—J. & J. ROSS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 5.

Oct. 21, 1891.
Taylors v.
Maclellans.

goods would be delivered in six or eight weeks after specification. The prices stipulated were such as to shew any architect of experience that he was not buying goods lying in stock in Glasgow, which could be delivered at any time, but goods which had to be ordered from, manufactured in, and imported from, Belgium. The iron girders and other material required were specified for about 15th June, but were not delivered till the end of September, being thus about six weeks longer in being delivered than was usual. The defenders proved their averments as to the causes of delay.

The Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray), after findings in fact to the effect already stated, found in law “. . . (5) that the parties Maclellan have proved a custom of trade that the buyer in such cases takes the risk of delay from strikes and other unforeseen causes beyond the seller's control; (6) that the parties Maclellan have proved that in the present case the delay arose from such causes; therefore in the action Maclellans v. Taylors decerns as craved, and in the counter action assolis the defenders.”

Taylors appealed. They argued that no custom of trade had been as a matter of fact proved, and that the delay had not been shewn to be due to the strikes and great heat to which the defenders ascribed it. On the law they argued that, as Maclellans had undertaken to deliver in a reasonable time, they must do so. If Belgium was suffering from strikes and excessive heat, then they should have gone elsewhere. It might be usual to get such goods in Belgium, but that was not the only market. If it had been intended that they should not take such risks, they should have inserted the recognised stipulations to that effect which were quite familiar.

Argued for the Maclellans;—The contract implied delivery in “reasonable” time. The question was, is that reasonable in ordinary circumstances, or reasonable in the circumstances which had come into existence at the date when the contract should have been performed? Authority said the latter was the sound meaning.¹

LORD YOUNG.—The question upon the whole matter is whether Messrs Maclellan can be held to be guilty of breach of contract in respect of the delay which occurred here. They, in the ordinary way, resorted to quite proper people in the place to which resort is commonly and familiarly had under similar circumstances, and the delay occurred there in the manner which has been explained.

Can we affirm in point of fact that they were guilty of undue delay or chargeable with undue delay in the execution of the contract, so that they were in breach of contract and were liable in damages? I am of opinion that upon the evidence we cannot affirm that. I do not quite like the expression “usage of trade” as applied in the present case. The particular language is not of first-class importance, if we know what it means, but I would rather avoid the use of the expression “usage or custom of trade,” as applicable to the circumstances of this case. When such goods as these have to be got, or are commonly got, from abroad, the causes of delay which are incident to their being procured are prima facie to be taken into account, and not unreasonably, upon the question whether the party, who is acting in the usual manner, is to have undue delay imputed to him or not. I would rather deal with the question as a question whether these causes of delay, which are proved to have occurred here not in an

¹ Hick v. Rodocanachi, Sons, & Co., L. R. [1891], 2 Q. B. 626.

LORD ADAM.—As I understand, the order of service has been intimated No. 10. and served. There is no doubt that in the ordinary case such an order when served stops all further procedure in the Court of Session, and removes the case Oct. 27, 1891.
to the House of Lords. The question of the competency of the appeal appears Edinburgh to me to be a matter for the Judicial Committee of the House of Lords, and I Northern cannot assume that this appeal is so utterly and entirely incompetent that we are Tramways Co.
entitled to disregard the order of service. I am therefore of opinion that there v. Mann.
can be no further procedure in the Court of Session, and that Lord Low should not pronounce any further order.

LORD M'LAREN.—I have always understood that an order for service of an appeal stops all further procedure in the Court below, the theory of our common law being that a cause cannot be in two places at the same time. It may be possible under a statute to proceed with a case in two Courts at the same date, but there is no statutory provision of that kind applicable to the case before us, and therefore I think that meantime there can be no procedure in the case in the Court of Session. The question of the competency of the appeal is a matter for the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THEREAFTER Lord Low pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord
Ordinary having reported the case to their Lordships of the First Division, on the motion for an order on the defenders to lodge the account referred to in the interlocutor of 30th June 1891, and as advised by their Lordships, refuses the pursuers' said motion, in respect of the appeal by the defenders to the House of Lords and order for service thereon."

GRAHAM, JOHNSTON, & FLEMING, W.S.—A. & G. V. MANN, S.S.C.—Agents.

ANDREW GRAY, Pursuer (Respondent).—P. Blair.

JAMES WEIR, Defender (Appellant).—C. J. Guthrie—Crabb Watt.

No. 11.

Oct. 28, 1891.
Gray v. Weir.

Reparation—Wrongous use of Diligence—Sequestration in security of rent—Warrant to carry back furniture removed by tenant.—The tenant of a house, without having paid the rent of £5 for the current half year, and before the termination of his tenancy, removed part of his furniture to a farm five miles distant, of which he had taken a lease. The removal was carried out in an open manner, and the landlord, who lived in the same tenement, had been previously informed that the tenant intended to remove before the term, though not of the precise day on which he would do so. As soon as the landlord heard that the tenant had removed he wrote to him threatening proceedings, unless the rent were paid by a certain date, but this letter failed to reach the tenant until after that date owing to the negligence of the person to whom the landlord had given it to post. On the day mentioned the landlord, believing that his letter had reached the tenant in due course, raised a summons of sequestration against him, averring that he had removed his effects "without finding security for the rent, and without intimation to the pursuer." The landlord also lodged a minute craving warrant, in respect the tenant "had removed the subjects of hypothec," to carry the same back to his house. The Sheriff thereupon granted warrant as craved, and on the next day a sheriff-officer proceeded to the tenant's new abode, and was in the act of bringing the furniture back to the landlord's house when the proceedings were stopped by the tenant paying the rent and expenses.

In an action at the instance of the tenant, the Court held that the warrant had been executed without cause, and therefore that its execution was illegal, and that the landlord was liable in damages.

No. 5.

Oct. 21, 1891.
Taylors v.
Maclellans.

stances existing at the time of fulfilment rather than the circumstances existing when the contract is made. Taking into account the circumstances which are proved to have existed here, I think the Messrs Taylor have failed to shew that there was any undue delay in the fulfilment of the contract in question, and that their claim for damages on account of undue delay cannot be sustained.

I will only add that in my opinion the custom of trade on which the Messrs Maclellan relied to some extent is not proved.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I agree with both your Lordships in the opinion expressed that this is not a case to be treated at all as one regarding established custom of trade. This is the case of a contract made to deliver certain goods without any time being specified, and that leads to the conclusion that the time taken for delivery must be a reasonable time. If reasonable time is exceeded, then damages for breach of contract will be due. Now, it is essential that one who makes such a contract, as in this case, to deliver within a reasonable time, shall exercise due care in making arrangements for fulfilling the contract. If he does anything which is unreasonable, if he acts in such a way as to cause likely and serious risk that the contract may not be fulfilled within a reasonable time, then he shall be responsible for that failure to act duly in carrying out the contract. But I am of opinion that there was perfectly reasonable care taken here. The orders were given to a well-known manufacturer, and the person giving the orders had at that time no reasonable ground for holding that any serious or exceptional delay would occur. Then comes the question, if one is satisfied that reasonable care was taken in placing the contract, whether the time occupied was reasonable in the sense of being reasonable in the circumstances. It is, of course, quite plain that in the ordinary case usage would bring about in such contracts a general term which would be held sufficient. In this case the general term would be something like six weeks or two months. But, then, extraordinary circumstances may arise, such as a strike or a fire, or some very serious accident to machinery, or an epidemic among workmen engaged in a large factory, which might fairly be a reasonable excuse for exceeding the ordinary time; and the question here, I think, is just this, whether we have sufficient evidence to satisfy us that there were such extraordinary circumstances occurring, and whether these extraordinary circumstances occurring were sufficient to prevent Messrs Maclellan from being in fault, and beyond reasonable time in delivering at the time they did, so much beyond what would have been the ordinary time. I am satisfied upon the evidence that there is no ground for holding that they were in breach of contract in delivering so late as they did. The late delivery was due to extraordinary circumstances which they were not bound to anticipate. Therefore I agree with your Lordships that the judgment should be as proposed by Lord Young.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find (1) that by the offer, No. 7/1 of process, and the acceptance, No. 26 of process, P. & W. Maclellan agreed to supply, and H. & E. Taylor to buy, the iron therein referred to; (2) that the said iron was duly and timeously delivered in terms of the contract; therefore of new in the action P. & W. Maclellan v. H. & E. Taylor, decern as craved, and in the counter action, H. & E. Taylor v. P. & W. Maclellan, assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action."

SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—J. & J. Ross, W.S.—Agents.

they were illegal, and the defender is liable in damages; assesses the damages at the sum of £6, 5s.,” &c. No. 11.

The defender appealed, and argued;—The pursuer here had removed the subjects of the defender's hypothec without having paid or found security for his rent, and without having given the defender notice of the date of his removal. The proceedings taken were therefore within the defender's legal right, and he was justified in using them, and was not liable in damages.¹ Oct. 28, 1891.
Gray v. Weir.

The pursuer argued;—The defender had been made aware that the pursuer was going to remove before the term, and the removal was carried out in a perfectly open manner. The defender was in these circumstances bound to have given the pursuer notice before taking these extreme proceedings against him.² The defender could have got his rent by asking for it, and the execution of the warrant was unnecessary and wrongful. Damages were therefore due.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—At the date of the occurrence on which the action is founded the pursuer was the tenant of a small house belonging to the defender in the town of Aberdeen. The tenancy was for half a year, expiring at the ensuing Whitsunday, and at that Whitsunday the amount due as rent would have been £5. The pursuer, during the currency of the term, concluded a bargain for taking a farm in the immediate neighbourhood, with entry before Whitsunday. Accordingly, some weeks before that term he took possession of the farm, and proceeded to remove his furniture there from the house in Aberdeen. It appears that the removal of the furniture was begun on Tuesday, 22d April, but was not completed in one day, part of the furniture being removed on the Tuesday, and the remainder on the following Saturday. While the defender was getting settled in his new farm he was interrupted by the arrival of a sheriff-officer, who, in his absence, but in the presence of his wife, produced a warrant, and proceeded to carry back the furniture to Aberdeen. It appears that, while on his way thither, the officer met the pursuer, and that the rent was then and there paid.

This action is brought on account of the wrong that is said to have been done the pursuer by the removal of his furniture in these circumstances.

The warrant for removal obtained from the Sheriff followed on and was incidental to an application for sequestration of the pursuer's effects made to the Sheriff on 25th April. It was set out in the summons of sequestration “that the defender (i.e. the present pursuer) has removed his effects from said house without finding security for the rent, and without intimation to the pursuer.” In order to obtain a warrant to carry back the furniture it was necessary that a special statement should be made, and accordingly this minute was lodged by the present defender. “In respect the defender has removed the subjects of hypothec to Banchory Hillock, Banchory-Devenick, warrant is craved to carry same back,” &c., and upon that the Sheriff wrote,—“Grants warrant as craved.”

In order to consider rightly the question which has arisen in this action, it is necessary to note that the warrant obtained by the defender falls within the class of warrants which are not obtained as matters of course, and are not the

¹ Dove Wilson's Sheriff Court Practice (4th ed.) 488; Ersk. Inst. ii. 6, 58-60; Rankine on Leases, 344; Donald v. Leitch, March 17, 1886, 13 R. 790.

² Johnston v. Young, Oct. 27, 1890, 18 R. (Just. Cases) 6.

No. 11.
Oct. 28, 1891.
Gray v. Weir.

ordinary right of the creditor. He requires to support his application for such a warrant by a special statement of facts. The duty of the Judge to whom such an application is made is illustrated by the case of Johnston v. Young, and I mention that case merely as one throwing light on the proceedings which are necessary in order to obtain such a warrant.

That being the nature of the warrant and the conditions under which it is granted, it belongs to the class of cases in which the creditor acts at his own peril, and anyone seeking redress on account of such a warrant having been used against him need not allege malice and want of probable cause, but merely that the diligence was used wrongfully. That, then, is the issue which has been tried by the Sheriff, and we have to decide whether the Sheriff-principal is right in holding that the defender is liable. The ground of his judgment is tersely expressed in these terms:—"Finds in law that the said proceedings having been carried out without notice and without cause, they were illegal, and the defender is liable in damages." I prefer to split that finding into two, finding in fact that the proceedings were without notice, and that they were without cause. It is quite certain that they were without notice, but I desire, following the example of Lord Rutherford Clark in Johnston v. Young, to guard myself against laying down that in all cases it is necessary that notice should be given. One can picture cases of clandestine removings in which to give notice would be to defeat the legitimate purpose of the application, and therefore Lord Rutherford Clark says that the question whether notice is required is one of circumstances, and that it can only be dispensed with safely in exceptional cases.

The absence of notice to the tenant accordingly is a salient feature in the case, though it is not conclusive against the defender, but the main question is whether the proceedings were "without cause." I am clearly of opinion that they were. In this case the pursuer and defender lived close together, occupying houses which were part of the same building, on the opposite sides of a passage; they were acquainted and on sufficiently friendly terms. The defender was aware that the pursuer was going to leave before the term, that having been made matter of conversation between them. It had indeed been suggested in conversation, and the suggestion had been encouraged by the defender, that the outgoing tenant of Banchory Hillock might take the premises vacated by the pursuer, and remain as tenant in his place after the term. It is therefore demonstrated that the defender possessed the knowledge that the pursuer was going to move before the term. It is quite true that he did not know the precise day on which the removal was to take place, but no importance attached to the precise day. The sufficient fact is that the removal which had been spoken of, and looked forward to, was a removal during the tenancy.

These are the circumstances of the removal. There was nothing in it of a clandestine character. It was deliberately carried out. On Tuesday 22d April one lorry conveyed part of the furniture to Banchory Hillock, and of this the defender's household were cognisant, and were spectators. The remainder of the furniture followed on the next Saturday. Where was it removed to? It was only removed to a distance of five miles. The circumstances of the pursuer rendered him perfectly able, and he was apparently perfectly willing, to pay the rent, and it is obvious that if the defender had adopted the common sense plan of asking him for the money, or for security, he would have got it.

The case does not seem to me to be one of peculiar delicacy at all. The defender's proceedings were, in my opinion, adopted altogether without cause, and accordingly a legal wrong was done to the pursuer. I think indeed that the defender may congratulate himself on the moderate amount of damages fixed by the Sheriff, because a more unfortunate introduction to his new farm than he gave the pursuer can hardly be imagined. As, however, the question of the amount of the damages has not been canvassed, I propose that we should affirm the findings in fact of the Sheriff-substitute down to and including the 11th, but should add an additional finding to the effect that the warrant was executed without cause. I therefore propose substantially that we should adhere to the judgment of the Sheriff.

No. 11.

Oct. 28, 1891.
Gray v. Weir.

LORD ADAM.—This seems to me to be an unfortunate case, both because the sum in dispute is small,—only £5 of damages having been awarded by the Sheriff,—and also because I think that if the letter from the defender to the pursuer had been delivered, instead of being kept in the messenger's pocket, the rent would have been paid, and so there would have been no summons of sequestration, no carrying away of the pursuer's furniture, and no subsequent action.

In dealing with the case my opinion is entirely in accord with that of your Lordship. I do not doubt that the defender, as landlord, had the right, in the first place, to sequester the pursuer's furniture, and, in the second place, if it was removed to have it brought back, unless good cause were shewn why his right should not be enforced. No objection can be taken to his acting in respect of his having applied for a warrant to have the goods brought back, but then, when a landlord applies for such a warrant without notice to the tenant, he is bound to state the special circumstances in which it is craved, and I think no such circumstances were set forth in this case, and if he had set forth a true account of the circumstances in which the tenant had removed his furniture, a warrant would not have been granted. I concur in thinking that it cannot be said that in all cases it is necessary for a landlord to give his tenant notice that he intends to apply for a warrant to have his goods brought back. Where a tenant made a midnight flitting, or carried off his goods in some other clandestine manner, the Sheriff would, I think, be bound to grant a warrant though no notice of the application had been made to the tenant, and there may be other cases where notice might not be necessary. But if special circumstances are not set forth, such a warrant ought not to be granted without notice to the tenant having been made. I quite agree with what was said in the case of Johnston v. Young, as to the duty of the person applying for a warrant, and the duty of the Judge granting it.

In the present case no statement was made of special circumstances. It is quite true, as was pointed out by Mr Guthrie, that on the face of the application for sequestration it was set out that the tenant had removed his effects without giving intimation to the landlord, or finding security for the rent. Even if these facts had been set out in the minute, I should not have thought them sufficient to justify the granting of the warrant without notice to the tenant. There was nothing in these facts to shew that there had been any attempt to defeat the landlord's hypothec. If, after receiving notice, the tenant had not been prepared to pay the rent, the Sheriff-substitute would have been entitled to grant the warrant, but no opportunity was given to the tenant to pay his rent, his effects were just seized. I do not think that if the circumstances had been disclosed to the Sheriff he would have granted the warrant for their seizure, and

No. 11. therefore I agree that their seizure was wrongful, and that the pursuer is entitled to have redress.

Oct. 28, 1891.
Gray v. Weir.

LORD M'LAREN.—The question which we have to consider is not quite the same as that which was considered in the case of Johnston v. Young, because in that case the Court of Justiciary had to consider whether the Sheriff was entitled to grant a warrant for the removal of effects on the statements made before him. We are considering whether the statement made before the Sheriff was one which the defender can justify; but the observations of the Judges, and especially those in which the Court all agreed, are of great value in elucidating the present case.

I think the first matter for inquiry to be, what is the ordinary right of a real creditor using the diligence of sequestration? His right in the ordinary case is to have the goods of his debtor inventoried and sequestrated, and thereby he converts the general security given him by the law into a special security applicable to the goods named in the inventory. Until sequestration is applied for the tenant is entitled to remove particular effects and replace them by others of equal value. There is no objection to his changing one article for another, provided he does not impair the value of the landlord's security.

The landlord's other remedy is rather distinct from his ordinary right, and arises only when there is danger of his right of hypothec being defeated. It is not doubtful that a landlord may apply for interdict against a contemplated removal of his goods by the tenant, and may also obtain a warrant to bring them back if they have been removed.

In all cases where an application to a Judge or Magistrate is necessary for the purpose of asserting the right of a creditor, the law holds the creditor responsible for the statements on which a warrant is obtained. In this case the parties accept the findings in fact in the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor as sufficient for the decision of the case, and I should like to call attention to the 3d, 5th, and 7th findings. The third finding is to the effect that the defender knew that the pursuer intended to remove before the term, but did not know the particular day on which the removing was to take place. The fifth finding bears that the pursuer effected his removal in an open manner, and the seventh is to the effect that a letter from the defender to the pursuer, intimating that he proposed to apply for a warrant to remove the pursuer's furniture in default of payment, did not reach the pursuer till after the warrant had been put in force. Now, if these facts had been disclosed to the Sheriff-substitute when he was asked for the warrant, would it have been granted? I think not. I may answer that question by saying that it would have been impossible to grant it consistently with the decision in the case of Johnston v. Young, because that case is to the effect that the remedy of bringing back a tenant's furniture is only to be granted on proper cause shewn, and when it is necessary to secure the creditor's rights. Proper cause was not shewn in this case, the only statement made being that the tenant had removed his effects without finding security for the rent and without intimation to the landlord. The Sheriff held, and was probably entitled to hold, that the removal had been clandestine, and that the tenant had refused to find security for the rent, the fact being that the landlord never asked the tenant to do so.

It appears to me that the proceedings complained of would never have taken place if the letter from the defender, which unfortunately miscarried, had reached the pursuer in time. While that letter shews that the defender entered on these proceedings in good faith, and would probably be conclusive in his favour, if it was necessary for the pursuer to aver that he was actuated by malice, yet the state of the law applicable to cases of this kind appears not to relieve the landlord from responsibility for the fact that no intimation of the intended proceedings was made to the tenant. No. 11.

Oct. 28, 1891.
Gray v. Weir.

I agree with your Lordship that this is a clear case of the improper use of diligence entitling the debtor to damages, and I also agree that the Sheriff has fixed on a very small sum of damages, so that I find it difficult to understand what was the defender's motive in bringing the case here.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff of 9th June 1891: Found in fact in terms of the first eleven findings in fact contained in the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 30th April 1891: Quoad ultra recalled said interlocutor: Found in fact that the warrant for removal was executed without cause: Found in law that the execution of said warrant was illegal, and that the defender was liable in damages: Assessed the damages in accordance with the judgment of the Sheriff at £6, 5s., and decerned.

HAGART & BURN MURDOCH, W.S.—WISHART & MACNAUGHTON, W.S.—Agents.

MRS ELIZABETH S. WILLIAMS OR ROSS AND SPOUSE, Pursuers (Reclaimers). No. 12.

—Salvesen—Wilson.

HIS HIGHNESS SIR BHAGVAT SINHJEE, THAKOR SAHIB OF GONDAL, Defender (Respondent).—D.-F. Balfour—Dickson.

Oct. 29, 1891.
Rosses v.
H. H. Sir
Bhagvat
Sinhjee.

Foreign—Obligation ex delicto—Law of the obligation, not lex fori, will govern —Parent and Child—Aliment.—A person suing for damages ex delicto in respect of an act committed abroad has no action unless that act is by the law of the place where it is committed a wrong inferring a legal remedy.

An Englishwoman raised an action in Scotland against a domiciled Indian concluding for damages for alleged seduction and for aliment for a child alleged to be the fruit of the seduction. The seduction was alleged to have taken place in England. By the law of England a woman has no action for damages on the ground of seduction, and the only means by which she can recover aliment is by an application to a Justice of the Peace, if she be a single woman, under the Bastardy Act (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 65). In this case the woman made no such application, and married before the child was born, more than two years before raising her action in Scotland. Held that she could not maintain an action on either head in Scotland.

MRS ELIZABETH SARAH WILLIAMS OR ROSS, AND GEORGE ROSS, her husband, with whom she resided in London, raised an action on 23d September 1890 against His Highness Sir Bhagvat Sinhjee, the Thakor Sahib of Gondal, in the Province of Gujarat and Presidency of Bombay, K.C.S.I., LL.D., concluding for (first) a sum of £10, 10s.; (second) £50 per annum; and (third) £2000. 2D DIVISION.
Ld. Stormonth
Darling.

The defender, who was a sovereign prince, had come to Scotland in 1886, and attended the medical classes in the University of Edinburgh. In 1887 he went to London to attend the celebration of the jubilee of Her Majesty the Queen, and lived in a furnished house there from the beginning of May till the end of July 1887. He then went back to his own dominions, and returned subsequently to Scotland, where he was living when the action was raised.

When he took his house in London, the prince took into his service some of the servants of the owner of the house, and among them the pur-

No. 12.

Oct. 29, 1891.

Rosses v.
H. H. Sir
Bhagvat
Sinhjee.

suer, who was a housemaid. In her action she averred that on 21st May 1887 the defender, "partly by physical force and partly by reason of the ascendancy which his rank and station in life and his power and position as her master had given him over her, overcame her scruples, and succeeded in seducing her. By the use of threats, and by blandishments and promises, he induced her to renew the act of connection at intervals during his residence in London." At the time of the seduction she averred that she was engaged to her husband. She alleged that, as the result of the seduction, she became pregnant. On 8th September she married her husband, who was, till his marriage, a private in the Artillery, and on 13th February 1888, she was delivered of a child of which she averred that the defender was the father.

The sums concluded for were claimed, the first as inlying expenses, the second for the aliment and education of the child, and the third as damages for seduction. She pleaded the seduction as entitling her to decree.

The defender denied the pursuers' material averments, and stated;—"By the law of England neither of the pursuers has any right or title to sue for damages in respect of seduction of the female pursuer, and any person who has seduced the female pursuer is not liable in damages to the pursuers, either jointly or separately. By the said law the defender is not liable either for inlying expenses to the pursuer or for aliment for an illegitimate child."

He pleaded;—(2) The questions between the parties fall to be determined by the law of England; and in respect of the said law, which excludes the pursuers' claims, the defender should be assoilzied. (3) No title to sue.

The Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling) allowed the defender a proof as to his statement of English law.

Mr H. H. Asquith, Q.C., was called to depone to the English law, and said:—" (Q.) According to the English law, where a woman has been seduced and given birth to a bastard child, what legal relation, if any, subsists between her and the man who seduced her, with regard to inlying expenses? (A.) None whatever; there is no obligation of any kind on the man to pay inlying expenses. (Q.) In the same circumstances, is there according to English law any obligation—apart from express contract—for maintenance and education of the bastard? (A.) None whatever. (Q.) Is there any action for seduction of a woman in England? (A.) Not at the suit of the woman. The only action for seduction known to the English law is an action at the suit of the parent or employer of the person seduced, the foundation of the action being the supposed loss of the woman's services to her parent or employer. (Q.) And the consequent damage thereby suffered by the parent or employer? (A.) That is so. The woman as such has no right of action. (Q.) Is it essential for the maintenance of such an action to shew that the woman seduced was in the service of the plaintiff? (A.) It is essential to shew that she was in the service of the plaintiff, both at the time of the seduction and at the time of her subsequent confinement. . . . Cross.—(Q.) Is seduction recognised as a wrong by the law of England: is it a tort for which an action may lie? (A.) It is not recognised as a wrong to the woman who is seduced, but, if followed by certain consequences, it is recognised as a wrong to the parent or employer. (Q.) Do you suggest that the quality of the act depends upon the existence of the person to whom the remedy is given? (A.) I suggest that the wrongfulness of the act does depend upon the person who is complaining of it. (Q.) Is it your view that according to the English law, if a single woman happens to be an orphan, not in the employment of any person, the seduction of such a woman is not a wrong? (A.) Certainly, that is perfectly clear. (Q.) Is it not the more correct way to put it, that it is not a wrong for which the law of England gives a remedy? (A.) The law of England gives a remedy for every wrong. By the Court.—(Q.) For every legal wrong? (A.) Yes, or to put it in other words, nothing is a wrong according to the law of England for which that law provides no remedy. . . . (Q.) Is that principle consistently applied—the action being, as you say, one for loss of services—is the measure of the damage awarded by the Courts at all connected with the extent of the loss sustained by the loss of services? (A.) Very remotely, and I think as a rule not at all. (Q.) Is it relevant to lead evidence that the father has been disgraced by his daughter's shame in aggravation of the damages? (A.) It is. (Q.) And are the facts of the seduction as regards the arts employed and the methods used by the seducer relevant on the question of damages? (A.) They are. (Q.) Quite irrespective of whether there has been actual loss of services, provided the necessary relationship exists? (A.) As I have already explained, there must be either actual or constructive loss of services, otherwise no evidence at all is relevant. . . . There is a proceeding, created by what we call in England the Bastardy Acts, whereby a single woman who has been seduced may apply to Justices of Petty Sessions for a summons against the person she alleges to be the father, and the Justices may thereupon after hearing evidence, if they think fit and in the exercise of their discretion, make an order upon the person who appears to them to be the father of the child to pay a certain sum not exceeding 5s. or something like that per week, for its maintenance up to a certain time. These provisions are embodied in the Acts 35 and 36 Vict. cap. 65, and 36 Vict. cap. 9. I refer to these statutes as containing the law upon the subject.”

Mr Brodie-Innes, a barrister in England and a member of the Scottish bar, was held as concurring in omnibus with Mr Asquith.

The Lord Ordinary, on 4th July 1891, pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds that the acts complained of took place in England, and that it is proved that the law of England recognises no claim at the instance of the pursuers, or either of them, in respect of inlying expenses, aliment, or damages for seduction; finds that there are no other relevant allegations on record entitling the pursuers to damages; therefore dismisses the action, and decerns.”*

* “OPINION.—The pursuers of this action are a married couple domiciled in England, and the defender is an Indian Prince, temporarily resident in Scotland. The pursuers' allegations are that the defender, while residing in London during the summer of 1887, seduced the female pursuer, who was then a servant in his house, and that in consequence, on 13th February 1888, she gave birth to a child of which the defender is the father. The conclusions of the summons are for inlying expenses and aliment, and a sum of £2000 in name of damages.

“The claim is made in somewhat remarkable circumstances, for the pursuers' story is that Mrs Ross yielded to the advances of the defender at a time when she was engaged to her present husband, that they married while she was pregnant, that they at first registered the child as the husband's, though they afterwards had this entry cancelled and registered it as illegitimate, and that Mrs Ross wrote letters to the defender in which she not only concealed the fact of her marriage, but represented that her affianced husband had given her up in consequence of the birth of the child. These circumstances are by no means favourable to the pursuers' claim, but they do not, except indirectly, affect the questions which I have now to decide, viz.—(1) Whether the rights of parties

No. 12.
Oct. 29, 1891.
Rosses v.
H. H. Sir
Bhagvat
Sinhjee.

No. 12.

Oct. 29, 1891.

Rosses v.
H. H. Sir
Bhagvat
Sinhjee.

The pursuer reclaimed;—Mr Asquith's evidence, when fairly read, meant that seduction was a wrongful act in England, "not justifiable," fall to be determined by the law of England, and (2) what that law is with regard to them.

"It will be convenient that I should take the second question first.

"It is established by the uncontradicted evidence of Mr Asquith, Q.C., and Mr Brodie-Innes that, by the law of England, a woman who has been seduced has no right of action against her seducer, and that the only action for seduction known to the English law is an action at the suit of the parent or employer of the person seduced, the foundation of the action being the loss of the woman's services to her parent or employer. It follows from this that the plaintiff must be able to shew that the woman was in his service, actual or constructive, at the time of the seduction, and also at the time of her confinement; and this of course excludes the notion of any right of action at the instance of a husband who has married the woman after her seduction. Further, it appears that by the common law of England the mother of a bastard child has no claim against the father for inlying expenses or aliment, and that the only statutory right to such payments is that conferred by the Acts 35 and 36 Vict. c. 65, and 36 Vict. c. 9—a right which is strictly limited to the case of a single woman. Neither the male nor the female pursuer would thus have a right of action in England against the defender (assuming the truth of all they say) in respect of inlying expenses, aliment, or seduction. That being so, one can quite understand the desire of the pursuers, apart from the circumstances of the defender's temporary residence here, to bring their action in Scotland.

"But the question remains whether the rights of parties fall to be determined by the law of England. I am of opinion that they do.

"It is, I think, a principle of the law of Scotland, in accordance with the weight of opinion among writers on international law, that no action can be maintained in the Courts of this country on account of a wrongful act committed within the jurisdiction of a foreign country, unless the act is wrongful by the law of the country where it was committed as well as by the law of this country. That is the principle of Lord Shand's judgment in the case of Goodman v. The London and North-Western Railway Co., March 6, 1877, 14 S. L. R. 449, where the widow of a domiciled Scotsman who had been killed on the line of an English railway founded jurisdiction against the company and brought an action of damages three years after the accident. Lord Shand held that, the grounds of action having arisen entirely in England, the rights and liabilities of parties must be regulated by English law, and that, as by that law the action was not now maintainable, it must be dismissed. The case is indeed a fortiori of the present, for the statute law of England, by Lord Campbell's Act (9 and 10 Vict. c. 93), did recognise a right of action at the instance of the pursuer, and only limited its exercise in point of time. In the present case there is not, and there never was, any right of action in England at the instance of the pursuers against the defender.

"Lord Shand's judgment was not reclaimed, for the case was compromised. But I am not aware of any decision in Scotland to the contrary. It was contended that the case of M'Larty v. Steele, 8 R. 435, is to an opposite effect. That was a case of slander uttered in Penang by one domiciled Scotsman against another, and the Court disallowed a counter issue, putting the question whether according to the law of Penang, no reparation for oral slander was due unless special damage was proved. But the judgment, as I read it, proceeded on the footing that slander was a wrong both by the law of Penang and the law of Scotland, and that the kind of damage necessary to be proved was a matter incidental to the remedy, which always falls to be determined by the lex fori.

"The same principle affords an explanation of the case of Scott v. Seymour 1862, 32 L. J. 61, which was an action brought by one British subject against another for an assault committed at Naples, and in which the law of Naples was unsuccessfully pleaded as excluding the action. Mr Justice Wightman expressed the opinion that damages might be recoverable in England, even although the remedy for that wrong was given not to the woman but to her father or employer. The fact that the amount of damages might be affected by the woman's shame and the nature of the seductive arts shewed that the act done to her was a wrong. Now, the law was that to support a pursuer in an action under such circumstances the lex fori must give a right of action, and the question of remedy was for it; provided only that the act complained of was a wrong, i.e. "not justifiable" in the country in which it was committed. That was undoubted law,¹ and was sufficient for the purposes of this action, for this act was "not justifiable" by the law of England. Opinion had indeed gone further, and laid it down that the lex fori would rule both the question of the nature of the act and the form of the remedy.² M' Larty v. Steele bore out the argument now submitted.³ The Lord Justice-Clerk pointed out that although action might be refused unless special damage was proved, that did not establish that the thing complained of—verbal slander—was lawful. In that sense seduction was unlawful in England, although not actionable by the woman. In *Horn's case*⁴ too a claim for solatium was allowed by the Scots Court on an accident occurring in England, although the English law does not allow any claims in respect of solatium. The decision in *Goodman's case*⁵ was of little authority. It was a judgment by a single Judge; the defenders had had so little confidence in its soundness that they had paid £700 when a reclaiming note had been presented. As regarded the aliment, there was admitted by Mr Asquith to be an obligation in England, and the defender could not evade that by leaving the country.

No. 12.
Oct. 29, 1891.
Rosses v.
H. H. Sir
Bhagvat
Sinhjee.

The defender argued;—The law knew no such thing as a wrong in the abstract.⁶ Therefore as the woman could not sue on this act it was, so far as she was concerned, no wrong. A wrong must be either the invasion of a jus or the withholding of a right, and the woman by the law of England could not say that of seduction. Lord Shand in Goodman's case had taken a sound view of the law, and that view was borne out by the English law both as laid down by Westlake in the passages referred to, and as laid down in collision cases.⁷ The doctrine that the lex fori governed was long since exploded.⁸ It would regulate the form and the quantum though no damages were recoverable in Naples. But the other Judges rested their decision on the narrower, and, as I venture to think, the safer ground, that the plea failed to shew that damages might not be recoverable as incidental to the proceedings alleged to be pending in the Neapolitan Courts. That case cannot, therefore, be regarded as an authority for the proposition that the law of England will sustain an action of damages for an act which is not wrongful by the law of the country in which it was committed. If it were so regarded, it would be inconsistent with the later English case of Phillips v. Eyre, 1869, 4 L. R., Q. B. 225, and 1870, 6 L. R., Q. B. 1.

"I therefore hold, that in so far as the pursuers' claims relate to matters for which they would have no right of action in England, they cannot maintain an action here, and quoad ultra, that their averments are irrelevant."

¹ Westlake, secs. 166 and 199, and authorities.

² Mr Justice Wightman in Scott v. Seymour, cited by Lord Ordinary, and in 1 H. and C. 219; Lord Jeffrey in Callendar v. Milligan, June 20, 1849, 11 D. 1174, 21 Scot. Jur. 463; Savigny, sec. 374, Guthrie's edn., pp. 251 and 253-5; see also Story, secs. 556-7.

³ Jan. 22, 1881, 8 R. 435.

⁴ July 13, 1878, 5 R. 1055.

⁵ Goodman v. London and North-Western Railway Co., March 6, 1877, 14 S. L. R. 449.

⁶ Addison on Torts, pp. 1 and 136.

⁷ The "Maria Moxham," 1876, L. R., 1 Prob. Div. 109.

⁸ Bar, pp. 272, 360, 429.

No. 12.

Oct. 29, 1891.

Rosses v.
H. H. Sir
Bhagvat
Sinhjee.

of the remedy and all the litis ordinatória, but the litis decisoria must be ruled by the law of the delict, i.e. the lex loci actus. *Horn's case*¹ adopted the English rule that the act must be a wrong, both where it was committed and where the remedy was sought, so did M'Larty's case,² the former holding that the items to be taken into account in estimating the quantum of the remedy must be determined by the lex fori, the latter claiming for the forum the right to control the proof of the wrong, i.e. to say what was good evidence.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This a somewhat peculiar case, and it is desirable, before expressing an opinion on the law, that the facts should be exactly specified and laid down.

The defender is an Indian Prince, who was for some time resident in London. He had taken a furnished house there, and took over the staff of servants who were in the house at the time. The pursuer was a female servant in the house, and her case alleges that by his acts he succeeded in seducing her from virtue, and that in consequence she became the mother of a child of which he is the father. She states that at the time of the seduction she was engaged to be married, and she was married when she was five months advanced in pregnancy. The Indian Prince having come back from India, where he had gone for a short time, and having come to live in Edinburgh, she sues him for inlying expenses, for aliment for the child, and for damages in respect of her seduction.

On that state of facts two questions arise, as stated by the Lord Ordinary, viz. :—“(1) Whether the rights of parties fall to be determined by the law of England, and (2) what that law is with regard to them.”

Evidence has been led as to the law of England, the evidence of Mr Asquith, Q.C., and of Mr Brodie-Innes, who is a member both of the English bar and of this bar. No evidence was led to contradict what these gentlemen said, and we must therefore take that as being the law of England on the subject.

Now, that law is that the pursuer has in England no right at all to sue for anything, except, under certain conditions and limitations, for aliment. Up to a recent date she would have had no rights at all. The only way in which any reparation for seduction can be recovered in England is by means of an action raised by the father or employer of the woman for loss of service, in consequence of the state into which she has been brought by her seducer having prevented her from giving service in her employment or in the family. Up to the Statute of 35 and 36 Vict. that was the only action that could be brought in respect of the consequences of seduction. By that statute a right was given to recover aliment in a particular way, but that right was only given to a single woman.

That being so, the defender having come to Scotland, has the pursuer any right to sue him here? She has no right under the statute, for she is no longer a single woman. As she has not that right, she has none at all, for that is the only right conferred upon a woman in her position.

The question is, does the case fall to be determined by the law of England or by the law of Scotland? I think by the law of England. The Lord Ordinary has gone over with care a number of decisions, which throw some light on the principles that must rule this case. In the opinion which he has expressed on these cases I entirely concur. The decision of the Court in the case of Scott v. Seymour is very much in favour of the view I have expressed. No doubt

Mr Justice Wightman, whose opinion is entitled to great respect, expressed an opinion that the law of England should be the law to determine whether damages could or could not be recovered; but the judgment in the case did not bear out that view, and one of his brethren expressly dissented from it.

No. 12.

Oct. 29, 1891.

Rosses v.

H. H. Sir

Bhagvat

Sinhjee.

There was one case in this Court cited which comes very near the present, viz, the case of Goodman. That was an important judgment, although it was by a single Judge, Lord Shand. The case was somewhat peculiar,—a woman sued for damages in respect of the death of her husband upon an English railway line. She was only entitled to do so in England if she raised her action within three years. Having allowed these three years to run out, she raised her action in Scotland. Lord Shand held “that the grounds of action having arisen entirely in England, the rights and liabilities of parties must be regulated by English law, and that, as by that law the action was not now maintainable, it must be dismissed.”

I take these words of Lord Shand, and, omitting the word “now,” they express exactly my view of the present case. This action is “not maintainable, and must be dismissed.”

LORD YOUNG.—By the law of England the pursuer had no action for damages for the illicit intercourse which is alleged to have taken place, even supposing it were seduction, taking that in the sense in which it is always taken in England, that he deprived her of her virtue. By the law of England he had done her no wrong. I am speaking only of the seduction. I lay aside, in the meantime, the claim for aliment.

Now, three years after the alleged illicit intercourse, two years after the birth of the baby, she brings an action of damages in Scotland. Nothing had occurred between them after the birth of the child until the action was brought. There was nothing therefore to give her a right of action, unless his coming to Scotland did so. If he left England without there being any ground of action against him, his coming to Scotland could never give rise to any such ground. That is the whole matter.

With respect to the aliment, she had no claim against him for that either. There is a statute in England by which, if she remained single, she might, by application to a Justice of the Peace, have got a moderate aliment. She made no such application, and the law of England gave her no other right. Then when she was five months gone with child she married a soldier. That raised an insuperable barrier to her getting any bastardy order, for she was then no longer a single woman. She has no claim then which she can make good by proceeding under the statute, and she has no other. The claim must be under the statute, or not at all, and it is excluded under the statute by the circumstances of the case.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I also concur. The ground on which I proceed is stated by the Lord Ordinary with as much clearness as I could possibly express it.

The leading conclusion is for a large sum of damages. The action therefore is an action for reparation for a wrong. I am satisfied, as I think all your Lordships are, both on principle and on authority, that an act, in order that it should give rise to action as being a wrong, must be recognised as a wrong giving rise to a legal remedy by the law of the place where it was committed. If the

No. 12.

Oct. 29, 1891.
 Rosses v.
 H. H. Sir
 Bhagvat
 Sinha.

be so, then this action is excluded, for the act which is alleged as the foundation of this action was committed in England, and is not recognised by the law of England as a wrong, in the sense or to the effect of giving rise to a remedy. If it is not a wrong in that sense by the law of England, it can never become a wrong from the fact that the doer of it has since come to Scotland.

The second point, the claim for aliment, is as clear. The only right given by the law of England to claim aliment for a bastard child is a right given by statute, but that right is limited to claims at the instance of a woman who is single. This pursuer is not a single woman, and therefore cannot claim the benefit of that statute.

THE COURT adhered.

THOMAS M'NAUGHT, S.S.C.—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 13.

Oct. 29, 1891.
 Stephens,
 Mawson, &
 Goss v. Mac-
 leod & Co.

STEPHENS, MAWSON, & GOSS, Pursuers (Appellants).—Asher—Dickson.
 MACLEOD & COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—D.-F. Balfour—Ure.

The "Cassia."

Ship—Charter-party—Demurrage—Custom of port.—A charter-party stipulated that the steamship "Cassia" should proceed to "Portugalete, or any other usual ore loading place in the River Nervion, not above Luchana, as ordered by merchants' agents on arrival," and there load a cargo of iron ore, "after being berthed in turn." The vessel was ordered to go to Portugalete. The rules for regulating the turns of vessels loading there provided that their turn should be taken from the official list of arrivals. On 17th June the "Cassia" arrived at Portugalete, and was duly entered in the turn list. The shipmaster was ordered by the merchants to load the ship at a particular loading place to which a certain class of ore was brought by railway from a certain ore deposit named "Penuco." In consequence of other ships which had previously arrived being loaded from the same deposit, the "Cassia" had to wait her turn, and was not berthed for loading till 27th June. Another vessel which had arrived after the "Cassia" and had received a later number on the turn list had been berthed on 21st June at a different loading place to receive another class of ore from a different deposit, and finished loading on the 24th. In an action for demurrage by the owners of the "Cassia" against the charterers, held (diss. Lord Young) that according to the terms of the charter-party the "Cassia" should have been berthed on 21st June, and that the charterers were liable to the owners for demurrage.

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of
 Lanarkshire.

By charter-party, dated 7th June 1890, Messrs Stephens, Mawson, & Goss, owners of the steamship "Cassia," chartered that vessel to Messrs J. & A. Wylie, Troon.

The charter-party stipulated, inter alia, that the "Cassia" should "proceed to Portugalete, or any other usual ore loading place in the River Nervion, not above Luchana, as ordered by merchants' agents on arrival, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and there load in the customary manner from the factors of the said merchants a full and complete cargo of iron ore, . . . and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to Glasgow. . . . Steamer to be loaded at the rate of not less than 400 tons per working day as customary (Sundays and holidays excepted), after being berthed in turn, . . . and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lay-days at 16s. 8d. per hour."

The vessel was ordered to Portugalete to load a cargo of iron ore for Macleod & Company, Glasgow.

Portugalete was the lowest reach on the River Nervion, about eight miles below the town of Bilbao. It formed part of the port of Bilbao, which extended from the mouth of the river to the town and beyond it. At Portugalete there were several places at which iron ore was deposited in readiness for vessels, and these different ore deposits were connected by rail with their respective loading wharves. Various iron ores were brought down from different mines to different places of deposit and loading by the Bilbao River and Cantabrian Railway Company, Limited. Since 1872 the railway company had, with consent of the public authorities, published rules for regulating the turns of vessels loading at the wharves, inter alia,—" (1) The turn for loading vessels will be taken from the official list of arrivals, each vessel being entered on the company's turn list according to the number given as from the semaphore station at Galea Point. . . . (4) No vessel will be considered as being ready to load or available to take turn unless she has been duly advised to load by the shipper of the mineral, and that all necessary official and customs papers have been lodged at the office of the company's stationmaster at Sestao, also that there exists a sufficient quantity of mineral in the deposit to load a full and complete cargo, or such a quantity as may be asked for by the captain. (5) When two or more vessels are presented and in turn to load mineral from the same deposits, the company will use its discretion as to allowing more than one of such vessels to load at the same time."

No. 13.

Oct. 29, 1891.

Stephens,
Mawson, &
Goss v. Mac-
leod & Co.

The "Cassia."

By telegram, dated 11th June 1890, Macleod & Company advised F. L. Macleod, their agent at Bilbao, of the sailing of the "Cassia" for Portugalete. On 12th June the order to load the cargo was given by him to Victor de Chavarri, Bilbao, the owner of the mine from which the cargo was to be supplied, and was at once intimated by the latter to the Bilbao River and Cantabrian Railway Company, by whom the ore was to be carried from a deposit named "Penuco" to the loading wharf connected with it.

On 17th June 1890 the "Cassia" arrived in Bilbao Bay, and passed the government semaphore station at Galea Point. She received a number as the fourth steamer that had arrived by the first tide. On the same day the master of the ship intimated by letter to Messrs Macleod & Company's agent that the ship was now ready to receive cargo.

The Bilbao River and Cantabrian Railway Company received a note of the official list of arrivals in Bilbao Bay, and in accordance therewith made up their turn list of vessels. The "Cassia" was duly entered in the turn list in accordance with her number. The master was thereafter ordered by the agent for Macleod & Company to load his vessel at the wharf connected with the Penuco deposit. At this wharf there were already three steamers loading or waiting to be loaded with Penuco ore.

On 19th June the steamer "Ingoldsby" entered the harbour, and was advised to load at a deposit named "Rubio." She was berthed for loading on 21st June, and finished loading on the 24th.

On 21st June the master of the "Cassia" wrote Macleod & Company's agent as follows:—"Finding that the s.s. 'Ingoldsby,' of Cardiff, who arrived @ this port on the 19th inst., a later date than my steamer 'Cassia,' who arrived on the 17th inst., is now under tips @ Portugalete and has commenced loading, I hereby give you notice that the s.s. 'Cassia' time will commence from noon on the 21/6/90, as per charter-party, at Glasgow, June 7th, and that I shall also protest and hold you responsible for all detention that may ensue."

On 22d June the steamer "Petunia," which had arrived at the harbour on the 20th, and had been advised to load from a deposit named "Severino," was berthed for loading. She finished loading on the 26th.

On 25th June the steamer "Navarra," which had arrived on the 19th, and had been advised to load from the deposit named "Martinez," was berthed for loading. She finished loading on the 26th.

On 25th June the master of the "Cassia" intimated to Mr Macleod that the "Cassia's" time would expire at noon to-morrow, 26/6/90, and

No. 13. that after that date he would claim demurrage according to terms of charter-party.

Oct. 29, 1891.

Stephens,

Mawson, &

Goss v. Mac-

leod & Co.

The "Cassia."

On 27th June, about 8 A.M., the "Cassia" was berthed for loading from the Penuco deposit. The loading was completed between 6 and 8 P.M. on the following day. The vessel's carrying capacity was 1500 tons.

Stephens, Mawson, & Goss raised in October 1890 an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire against Messrs Macleod & Company (who had undertaken liability for any demurrage that might be due) for £116, 13s. 4d. as demurrage. The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 5) "The vessel was ordered to load at Portugalete, and her time for loading in regular turn commenced at noon on 21st June, but she was not berthed until about 8 A.M. on 27th June, and accordingly she was detained for five days and twenty hours beyond the time when she should have been berthed in her regular turn. The loading was completed about 8 P.M. on 28th June, being about seven days eight hours after the arrival of her turn. Had the vessel been berthed in her turn, and been loaded at the rate of 400 tons each day, she would have been loaded not later than noon on 26th June, or about fifty-six hours sooner than she was actually completed. It is believed and averred, however, that had she been berthed in turn, the vessel would have been loaded within a period not greater than that actually occupied, and, accordingly, demurrage is due for the full period claimed."

The defenders pleaded;—The said vessel having been berthed in due turn according to the custom of the port, and having been loaded within the lay-days provided for by the charter-party, defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

The proof disclosed the facts above narrated. The master of the "Cassia" admitted that he had previous experience of the practice of loading vessels at Bilbao.

It was explained that the railway trucks could not be filled at Penuco deposit with sufficient speed to load more than one vessel at a time.

On 5th May 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers' ship 'Cassia' arrived at Bilbao River to fulfil the contract contained in the charter-party, No. 8/1 of process, on the 17th of June 1890, and completed loading a cargo of iron ore at Portugalete, as ordered, upon Saturday, 28th June, at 8 P.M.: Finds that, according to the custom of the port, she was in turn for being berthed, and was berthed at 8 A.M. on June 27th, and that she was thus loaded within the lay-days provided by the charter-party, her carrying capacity being 1500 tons; therefore assoilzies the defenders."*

* "NOTE.—This case appears to be a clear one. In the reading of clauses in charter-parties as to loading and discharging, the custom of the port is an implied term, even if not expressed, and the question for consideration is whether, by the practice of the port of Bilbao, or the loading places on the River Nervion, to which this vessel was chartered, and which it is assumed are included in that port, the turn of the 'Cassia' arrived on the 21st June, as alleged by the pursuers, or not until the 27th. It seems to me that the only ground on which the former contention can be supported involves the proposition that the defenders were bound to alter their loading orders, and supply a different kind of ore, or ore from a different 'deposit' or mine from that which they had provided for the 'Cassia' before her arrival, and for which she had been booked. For the evidence sufficiently instructs that the regular practice of the port is for vessels to take their turn at the particular 'deposit' or loading place to which they are ordered, and that, if several vessels are waiting for cargo from the same loading place, the last comer must just be served in its rotation. It is hardly suggested that the charterers should be deprived of their

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—The turn of the “Cassia” was fixed by the official number she received on passing Galea Point. The first rule of the Bilbao Company shewed this to be so even according to the custom of the port. The “Cassia’s” turn arrived when a berth became vacant on 21st June, and from that date the defenders were liable in demurrage. Even if the delay was held to be caused by the custom of the port, that custom was contrary to the express terms of the charter-party, and therefore did not apply.¹

No. 13.

Oct. 29, 1891.

Stephens,
Mawson, &
Goss v. Mac-
leod & Co.

The “Cassia.”

Argued for the respondents;—In order to get a berth for the ship when she arrived arrangements had to be made beforehand in regard to the particular deposit at which she was to be loaded. The fourth and fifth rules of the Bilbao Company shewed that it was in their power to send a vessel to take her turn at a particular deposit. The “Cassia” was berthed in her turn according to the custom of the port, and the appellants were therefore not entitled to demurrage.²

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The defenders in this case chartered a steamer called the “Cassia” from the pursuers. The charter-party stipulated that the vessel should “proceed to Portugalete, or any other usual ore loading place in the River Nervion, not above Luchana, as ordered by merchants’ agents on arrival, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and there load in the customary manner from the factors of the said merchants a full and complete cargo of iron ore.” The stipulation as to berthing is that the steamer is “to be loaded at the rate of not less than 400 tons per working day, as customary (Sundays and holidays excepted), after being berthed in turn.”

The facts of the case as they occurred in their order are these. The “Cassia” proceeded on her voyage and arrived opposite the signal station at Galea Point on 17th June 1890. There she received a number for berthing, No. 4. She then anchored and waited to be berthed. On the same day as she arrived the master gave notice to the defenders by letter stating that the “Cassia” was now choice of a cargo, and have their arrangements with the mineral owners deranged, in order that the ship may be loaded at another ‘deposit’ which happens to be immediately available. But it is said that the defenders should have known, and did know, that the turn list for the deposit of ore to which the ‘Cassia’ was ordered was very full, and that her detention was probable. Detention in this way is not in any fair or reasonable sense attributable to the merchant. The delay is occasioned by the state of the port, and, unless he has guarded against it by his bargain, falls upon the ship, which is only entitled to be berthed in turn at the place where alone the cargo arranged for her can be loaded. The defenders were bound to have a ready cargo, and it is not disputed that they had one at a certain place; but if, at a port where there are various ores, and various loading places or deposits for these ores, a ship-owner means to get dispatch by being allowed to load that ore which happens to be lying at a vacant loading place, irrespective of the merchant’s previous arrangements, he must surely stipulate for it. I cannot accept the view that under this charter-party, and the practice of the river, the merchant was bound to supply such ore as would give the ship regular turn in the sense for which the pursuer contends. That view ignores the requirements of the consignee to whom the charterer may have sold his cargo, and there is no attempt to prove that all the ores shipped in Bilbao River are equally useful to all buyers in all parts of the world, or even at Glasgow, whither the ‘Cassia’ was to proceed.”

¹ Dall’ Orso v. Mason & Co., Feb. 4, 1876, 3 R. 419; Holman v. Peruvian Nitrate Co., Feb. 8, 1878, 5 R. 657.

² Postlethwaite v. Freeland, June 7, 1880, L. R., 5 App. Cas. 509; King v. Hind, April 27, 1883, L. R. Ireland, 12 Q. B., C. P. and Exch. Div. 113.

No. 13.

Oct. 29, 1891.
 Stephens,
 Mawson, &
 Goss v. Mac-
 leod & Co.

The "Cassia."

ready to receive cargo, and that his time would commence according to the charter-party. On 21st June he found that certain vessels which had arrived later than his ship, and received later numbers for berthing when they passed the signal station, had been put into berth in order to receive cargo, although he had not got a berth. He therefore wrote the defenders stating this fact, and giving notice "that the s.s. 'Cassia' time will commence from noon on the 21/6/90 as per charter-party at Glasgow, June 7th, and that I shall also protest and hold you responsible for all detention that may ensue." And on 25th June he again wrote,—"Please take notice that the above steamer 'Cassia's' time will expire at noon to-morrow, 26/6/90,—after which date I shall claim demurrage according to terms of charter-party."

But the defenders maintain that under a certain custom of the port, although certain vessels which arrived later than the "Cassia" were put in to be loaded before her, the charterers of the vessel are not liable for her detention, because according to that custom each vessel which arrived at the port was sent to be loaded at a particular deposit, and the number of vessels at the deposit to which the "Cassia" was sent was such that she could not be berthed till the 27th of June.

I am of opinion that the defenders' contention cannot be given effect to. The charter-party provides that the vessel is to be "berthed in turn," and there is nothing to shew that this implies anything more than the ordinary meaning of the phrase, viz., that the vessel was to get a berth according to the number she received on entering the port. It is said that the ship captain ought to have known that there were certain rules in use at the port for regulating the loading of vessels "in turn," especially rule 5, shewing that these words had a different meaning from the one they ordinarily bear. But I think that rule has got nothing to do with the question. It bears upon the face of it to be a regulation merely to enable the authorities at the port to decide whether two vessels can both be loaded at the place at which they present themselves at the same time, or whether one must wait until the other is loaded. That does not to me appear to be at all inconsistent with the right of shipowners to demurrage if vessels coming into port after their vessel are put to berth before it.

I therefore think that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute should be recalled. I do not go into the matter at greater length as I have perused the opinion of Lord Trayner in which the case is fully stated. I quite agree with that opinion, and have therefore confined myself to these general observations.

LORD YOUNG.—The Sheriff very properly points out that the port with the custom of which we are here concerned is the port of Bilbao. The town itself, which is the ancient capital of Biscay, is situated on the River Nervion, about ten miles up from the mouth, and the port, which is the principal port in the north of Spain, extends from the town down the whole course of the river to the sea. Portugalete is the name of the lowest reach of the river, and to it iron, which is the principal export, is (for the convenience of larger vessels) carried by the Bilbao River Railway Company and shipped from wharves apparently provided by the railway company, and maintained and conducted with the sanction and under the supervision of the harbour authorities. The limits to which the name Portugalete applies, if definite, have not been proved, but it is proved that there are at this place, whatever the length of it, several loading places for iron with distinguishing names or numbers, and assigned respectively to different mineowners or iron exporters with a view to the convenience of the export trade of the port. Nor are the loading places thus provided confined to Portugalete, but extend up the river towards the town of Bilbao. One at least of the witnesses speaks to "a number of loading places in the river," necessarily above Portugalete, and it is noticeable that the charter-party immediately in question provides that the ship shall "proceed to Portugalete or any other usual ore loading place in the River Nervion, not above Luchana, as ordered by merchants' agents on arrival." This shews clearly enough that the loading was to be where the merchants' agent ordered after the arrival of the ship, provided only that the place should not be above Luchana.

No. 13.

Oct. 29, 1891.
 Stephens,
 Mawson, &
 Goss v. Mac-
 leod & Co.
 The "Cassia."

It is proved that the merchants' agent on receipt of the telegram announcing the sailing of the ship on 11th June, ordered Mr Victor de Chavarri, of Bilbao, to have the stipulated cargo ready against the time of her arrival, and to see that it was shipped as soon as the vessel was in its due order according to the custom of the port berthed to receive it. It is also proved that this was done in due and ordinary course without the delay of an hour.

The place of deposit and loading assigned by the harbour authorities to Chavarri was known as the "Penuco deposit," and on the arrival of the ship in the river the master was ordered to have it berthed there as soon as its turn came. It so happened that there were three ships in turn before her, but these were loaded and dispatched without any avoidable delay, and when her (the "Cassia's") turn came she was berthed and loaded with all possible expedition. This is proved, and nothing to the contrary is even suggested.

The action is based on the averment that the "Cassia's" "time for loading in regular turn commenced at noon on 21st June, but she was not berthed until about 8 A.M. on 27th June," and if the averment is true the action is well founded, and otherwise not. If her turn did not come till the 27th there is no reason for complaint on account of the delay or the time the vessel was detained. Now, this complaint of failure to get her turn is explained by the master in his evidence when he says: "The turn of the 'Cassia' for loading arrived on the 21st at noon. She was not loaded in turn. The s.s. 'Ingoldsby,' the s.s. 'Petunia,' and the s.s. 'Navarra' were loaded before the 'Cassia' after her turn arrived. The 'Ingoldsby' arrived on the 19th, A.M. I cannot say when she left, unless I am allowed to refer to the turn list. The 'Ingoldsby' was put under the tip on the 21st—I believe at noon."

There is no other specification or explanation of the complaint. But these vessels were none of them entered for the same loading place as the "Cassia," but for others which accidentally, although fortunately for them, chanced to be sooner vacant than the Penuco. I am unable to see the relevancy of this fact. There was no undue preference given to these vessels over the "Cassia," and the delay of the "Cassia's" turn at the Penuco would have been exactly the same had they never arrived at all, and the places where they got the cargoes they wanted been unoccupied, or, indeed, non-existent. Would it have been relevant or pertinent to say that had it pleased the merchants' agent to order the "Cassia" to one of the numerous loading places further up the river, but not above Luchana, she might have been loaded sooner than at the Penuco?

I see no reason to doubt the propriety and expediency of the rules prescribed and followed at this great iron exporting port, and constituting its custom. They have existed and been observed for many years with apparently universal approval. There is not a word in the evidence condemnatory of them, and that

No. 13.

Oct. 29, 1891.
Stephens,
Mawson, &
Goss v. Mac-
leod & Co.

The "Cassia."

they were exactly followed in the present case does not admit of dispute, and is not disputed. The master of the "Cassia" does indeed say that he has no knowledge what the term deposit with reference to iron ore at Bilbao means, and cannot say from what deposit the "Cassia" was loaded. This cannot be true, for he says himself,—“I acquired the knowledge of the practice at Bilbao having been there on previous voyages. The 'Cassia' had loaded ore on more than one occasion at Bilbao previously.” The ignorance he alleges is incredible, if the evidence of Mr Penlington and Mr Macleod is to be believed, and is, indeed, contradicted by the whole tenor of the evidence. But it would be idle to dwell on this topic, for if this witness was so stupid or non-observant as to be ignorant of the custom of a port which he had frequently been subjected to, and which was familiar to all others acquainted with the port, the circumstance would be really immaterial.

It would, in my opinion, be unwarrantable and unbecoming to censure the rules and customs of the port of Bilbao, or to condemn the defenders as wrongdoers to the pursuers for submitting to them as they did, exactly as all others did, and continue to do. Then in what respect did the defenders fail in their duty to the pursuers? The only suggestion of omission on their part which I have heard is that they ought to have had the Penuco deposit inserted in the charter-party as the loading place. But they were surely entitled to bargain, the pursuers being willing, that the loading should be at any loading place in the River Nervion not above Luchana which their agent should order after the arrival of the vessel. Further, the naming of Penuco in the charter-party could not even conceivably have benefited the pursuers. The suggestion that they might in that case have refused the charter-party altogether would be fanciful.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I have found this case attended with considerable difficulty. But on the whole, I have come to agree with the opinion of Lord Trayner, which I have read.

LORD TRAYNER.—This is a claim for demurrage on account of the detention of the pursuers' vessel in loading a cargo of iron ore at Portugalete. The material facts in the case are not in dispute—the question between the parties depends rather on the construction and effect of the charter-party entered into between them, under which the cargo in question was loaded. By that charter-party it was provided that the "Cassia" should proceed to Portugalete or any other usual ore loading place in the River Nervion and there "load in the customary manner" from the factors of the charterers a full and complete cargo of iron ore, and being so loaded should therewith proceed to Glasgow. It was further provided that the "Cassia" should be "loaded at the rate of not less than 400 tons per working day as customary (Sundays and holidays excepted) after being berthed in turn . . . and ten days on demurrage over and above said lay-days at 16s. 8d. per hour." The ship reached Portugalete, the only loading port to which she was ordered, on 17th June 1890, on which day notice was given to the charterers that the ship was ready to receive cargo. She was not, however, berthed till the 27th June, when her loading commenced, which was completed on the evening of the following day. There was certainly no delay in the loading after it commenced, but the question is, whether the defenders are liable for the detention of the vessel before the loading commenced.

The pursuers say that the "Cassia" if berthed "in turn" according to the terms of the charter-party would have been berthed on 21st June; the defenders say that the "Cassia's" turn to be berthed did not come before the 27th June, when she was in fact berthed and the loading commenced. What, then, is the meaning of the provision in the charter-party that the "Cassia" was to be "berthed in turn," and what was the right of the pursuers under that provision? The natural and ordinary meaning of the words "berthed in turn" would seem to be that the vessel should be berthed for loading in turn with other vessels, according to the order of their arrival at the port, and there is nothing in the charter-party to give these words any meaning other than their ordinary meaning. This meaning, too, was what the words imported according to the rules in force at Portugalete "for regulating the turns of vessels loading." According to these rules "the turn for loading vessels will be taken from the official list of arrivals, each vessel being entered on the company's turn list according to the number given as from the semaphore station at Galea Point." The "Cassia's" turn according to that rule was No. 4 on the 17th of June. That turn, however, she did not get, for it is admitted by the defenders that several vessels which arrived after the 17th of June were berthed and loaded before the "Cassia" was berthed. It was the berthing and loading of these vessels which led to the "Cassia" not obtaining a berth in turn, and to the claim which the pursuers now make for demurrage. If therefore nothing but the terms of the charter-party and the rule of the port to which I have referred are considered, it seems to me to be clear beyond dispute that the "Cassia" was not berthed in turn, with the result that she was detained beyond the stipulated lay-days, and that demurrage is according to the contract due to the pursuers for such detention.

The defenders, however, refer to another rule of the port as supporting their defence. It is rule 4, which provides,—“No vessel will be considered as being ready to load, or available to take turn, unless she has been duly advised to load by the shipper of the mineral; . . . also that there exists a sufficient quantity of mineral in the deposit to load a full and complete cargo,” &c. I think this rule has no bearing on the question before us. It provides for the shipper or charterer doing two things as necessary to any vessel taking or being available for taking her turn at a loading berth. But these two things are incumbent on every shipper as in a question with the owner whose ship has been chartered, whether expressed in the rules of a particular port or not, and any failure on the part of the charterer to observe these things, if such failure resulted in the detention of the chartered vessel, would render the charterer liable for demurrage. It is always the duty of a charterer to advise his factor or agent at the port to which the chartered ship is going that the vessel has been chartered, in order that the factor or agent may await the arrival of the vessel and procure her a loading berth. It is equally the duty of the charterer to have his cargo ready to load when the chartered ship arrives, at least to have it in such readiness that he may be able to load it within the stipulated lay-days. This rule which I have last mentioned has no reference to any duty to be performed by the ship; it is a regulation which provides as between the port authorities at this particular port and the shipper of minerals, but between them only, that unless certain conditions are complied with a ship will not be recognised as available to take a turn for loading. If these conditions are not observed, the shipper must take the consequences.

No. 13.

Oct. 29, 1891.

Stephens,
Mawson, &
Goss v. Mac-
leod & Co.

The "Cassia."

- No. 13. The defenders' case is, that under this rule they had advised the "Cassia" as a vessel to take ore from a certain deposit, and that this could only be loaded at certain berths—to one of which the "Cassia" was admitted in turn with vessels destined to carry ore from the same deposit, and loaded at the same berths. It appears to me, however, out of the question to say that the shipper by so advising the port authorities could alter the contract in the charter-party or limit the right which that charter-party gave to the pursuers. The charter-party makes no reference to any particular deposit or any particular berth. It stipulates that the ship shall proceed to Portugalete and there load a cargo of iron ore for which she shall be berthed in turn—that is, berthed in turn with vessels as they arrive at Portugalete for iron ore. If the defenders had intended to bargain for what they now contend, they should have stipulated in the charter-party for the right to berth the "Cassia" "in turn" at some particular berth, or at some berth where the ore of a particular deposit alone was shipped. They did not do so, and I think they are now attempting to add to their contract a clause or condition to which the pursuers never agreed. The charter-party obligation on the ship was to proceed to Portugalete and there load a cargo of iron ore on being berthed "in turn." The corresponding right of the ship was to be berthed "in turn" at any berth where iron ore was loaded at Portugalete. There was no contract, and therefore no obligation binding the ship to wait her turn at a particular berth, or at a berth where only the ore of a particular deposit was loaded.
- The charter-party, I should not omit to notice, provides that the "Cassia" is to be loaded "in the customary manner," and the defenders say that that includes the condition for which they now contend. I am satisfied it does not. The "customary manner" of loading was to be followed in loading the ore—that is, by shoot, by hand, by lighter, or whatever manner was usual and customary at Portugalete for loading iron ore. It had nothing to do with the place of loading, and it will be observed that while the charter-party provides that the "manner" of loading is to be the customary one, the provision about being "berthed in turn" is not qualified by any reference whatever to the custom of the port. As I have said, however, the custom of the port as expressed in the rule I first referred to, would have entitled the "Cassia" to a berth on the 21st of June.
- The result of my opinion is that the "Cassia" was not berthed in turn in terms of her charter-party, and that, in consequence thereof, demurrage was incurred for which the defenders are liable. It is not easy to fix the exact amount of the demurrage due, as the hour when the ship should have been berthed on the 21st is not well ascertained. But allowing that her turn came at any working hour of the 21st, and seeing that the loading was not finished till six or eight o'clock on the evening of the 28th, the pursuers do not overstate their claim when they state it at fifty-six hours' demurrage. This entitles them to decree for the sum of £45, 16s. 8d.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, and recall the interlocutor appealed against: Find in fact (1) that the 'Cassia' arrived at Portugalete to fulfil the contract contained in the charter-party mentioned on record on 17th Jun 1890; (2) that intimation was given on the same day to the respondents or their agent that said ship was then ready to receive cargo; (3) that said ship was not berthed for loading cargo until the 27th June; (4) that according to the terms of said charter-party and the custom of said port the 'Cassia' would have been berthed on the 21st June if berthed in turn, and should have been berthed on that day and her loading commenced; (5) that the failure to berth the 'Cassia' in turn as aforesaid was a breach of said charter-party on the part of the respondents; and (6) that said failure to berth and load the 'Cassia' in turn as aforesaid resulted in the 'Cassia' being detained for a period of at least fifty-six hours beyond the lay-days specified by the charter-party: Find in law that the respondents are liable to the appellants in demurrage at the rate specified in said charter-party for the period of detention foresaid: Therefore decern against the respondents to make payment to the appellants of the sum of £45, 16s. 8d. sterling, with interest as concluded for: Find the respondents liable in the expenses of process both in this Court and in the Sheriff Court," &c.

No. 13.
Oct. 29, 1891.
Stephens,
Mawson, &
Goss v. Mac-
leod & Co.
The "Cassia."

J. & J. ROSS, W.S.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

ROBERT HILLHOUSE, Pursuer (Respondent).—McKechnie—Shaw.
WILLIAM WALKER, Defender (Appellant).—Crabb Watt.

No. 14.

Nov. 3, 1891.
Hillhouse v.
Walker.

Process—Sheriff—Appeal—Objection to competency of appeal not stated in time.—In a Sheriff Court appeal for jury trial, the Court in the Single Bills, without objection, ordered issues, and subsequently put the case to the Summar Roll. When the case came out for hearing in the Summar Roll the respondent objected to the competency of the appeal on the ground that the time for appealing had elapsed. Held that it was competent for the Court to entertain the objection although it had not been stated in the Single Bills.

Skirra v. Robertson, June 7, 1873, 11 Macph. 660, followed.

ROBERT HILLHOUSE, aerated water manufacturer, Old Kilpatrick, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Dumbarton against W. Walker, aerated water manufacturer, Bridgend, Dumbarton, for interdict and damages.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Stirling, Dumbarton, and Clackmannan.

On 3d April, the Sheriff-substitute (Gebbie) granted perpetual interdict, and allowed the pursuer a proof of his averments of damage, and to the defender a conjunct probation.

On 9th April, the defender appealed to the Sheriff (Blair), who, upon 19th June, dismissed the appeal, of new granted perpetual interdict, and remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed with the cause.

On 23d June, the Sheriff-substitute fixed 15th July as a new diet for proceeding with the proof allowed by interlocutor of 3d April.

On 7th July, the defender appealed for jury trial under section 40 of the Judicature Act, 1825.

On 15th October, when the case was called in the Single Bills, the Court appointed the parties within eight days to lodge the issues proposed by them for the trial of the cause. Thereafter the case was sent to the Summar Roll.

On 3d November, when the case appeared in the Summar Roll, the pursuer objected to the competency of the appeal upon the ground that the defender had failed in terms of section 5 of the Act of Sederunt, 11th July 1828, to appeal within fifteen days of the interlocutor allowing proof,¹ whether the days were held to run from the date of the Sheriff-

¹ Davidson v. Davidson's Executors, July 7, 1891, 18 R. 1069; Kinnes v. Fleming, Jan. 15, 1881, 8 R. 386; Williams v. Watt & Wilson, May 28, 1889, 16 R. 687.

No. 14.

Nov. 3, 1891.
Hillhouse v.
Walker.

substitute's interlocutor of 3d April or of that of the Sheriff of 19th June. It was said that the objection came too late, as it ought to have been stated in the Single Bills. In Ross v. Brims,¹ however, the Court ex proprio motu took up a similar objection at this stage.

Argued for the defender;—The objection came too late. Like any other objection to a step of procedure as not being conform to Acts of Sederunt, it must be taken in the Single Bills, otherwise the party making it would be held to have waived it.

LORD PRESIDENT.—As regards the appealability of the interlocutor allowing proof, I think each and all of the points raised are concluded by authority. Whether the fifteen days are to be held to run from the 3d of April, the date of the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor which allowed the proof, or from the 19th of June, the date of the interlocutor by which the allowance of proof was affirmed by the Sheriff-principal, the appeal comes too late, and the case of Davidson quoted by Mr Shaw is directly in point.

It has been pointed out that this objection to the competency comes at an inappropriate stage. Here again I am bound to say that I cannot get over the case of Shirra v. Robertson, in which what turned out to be an incompetent appeal was sent by interlocutor to the roll, and only objected to when the case came out for hearing. The Court held that they were bound to determine the question of competency when that was raised, even when this was only done at the stage at which the merits were to be discussed. I confess to thinking that, having to deal with an appeal arising in pari casu with the appeal in the case of Shirra, we must follow that case, and all the more because I observe that the Lord President states that the case was decided after consultation with the Judges of the Second Division.

We must then, I think, sustain the objection to the competency.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree that, having regard to the case of Shirra v. Robertson, we must hold this appeal incompetent.

I should like, however, to be allowed to say that I should not be inclined to regard the circumstances of that case as constituting a precedent for extending the principle there applied to other cases. There are undoubtedly conditions of procedure depending on Acts of Sederunt which may be waived by parties in litigation, and especially such as relate to the time of lodging papers, and according to our practice such conditions will not be enforced by the Court if the parties are agreed in dispensing with them.

As a general rule I should say that where objection is to be taken to a step of procedure as not being taken within the time prescribed by an Act of Sederunt, the objection ought to be taken in limine. If it is not taken when the case appears in the Single Bills, the objection may be held to be waived, so that it cannot be revived after the case has been sent to the roll.

That principle has not been applied to the case of appeals from Sheriff Courts, and it is desirable that we should not disturb the existing rule of practice. If the point were open, I must say I cannot see why parties should not be allowed if they please to waive difficulties of the kind, or why, if a respondent has not discovered that he is injured by such an informality, he should be treated as if he were injured by it, when the case comes on for hearing on the merits. No. 14.

¹ Ross v. Brims, March 14, 1878, 15 S. L. R. 438; Shirra v. Robertson, June 7, 1873, 11 Macph. 660, 45 Scot. Jur. 412.

Nov. 3, 1891.
Hillhouse v.
Walker.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT sustained the objection to the competency of the appeal.

CARMICHAEL & MILLER, W.S.—MACKENZIE & BLACK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 15.

Nov. 4, 1891.
Nicholson's
Trustees v.
M'Laughlin.

MRS MARY ANNE NICHOLSON AND OTHERS (Alexander Nicholson's Trustees), Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Rankine—Goudy.

MRS CATHERINE MARGARET KENMORE OR M'LAUGHLIN AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Respondents).—Johnston—Burnet.

Right in security—Bond and disposition in security—Assignment of portion of bond—Pari passu ranking—Power of sale—Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 101), secs. 119, 122, and 123—Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 94), sec. 48.—Where the holder of a bond and disposition in security assigns a portion of the bond to another with a declaration that the debts are to rank pari passu, either creditor may bring the subjects of the security to sale for payment of his own portion of the debt without consent of the other, but the security of the other will remain unaffected thereby.

IN 1873 Mr James Thomas, of Transy, granted in favour of the trustees of the late Mr Alexander Nicholson, banker, Cupar-Fife, a bond and disposition in security whereby he conveyed to them the lands of Pinnacle, in security of the sum of £6000. The bond contained a power of sale in default of payment. The lands were already burdened with a prior bond for £7000. 1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

In 1883 Nicholson's trustees assigned and disposed to Miss Catherine Margaret Kenmore (afterwards Mrs M'Laughlin) the bond and disposition in security, and also the lands of Pinnacle, "but that only to the extent of the sum of £2000." The assignment contained this clause,—“Declaring always, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that these presents, and the said sum of £2000 sterling, . . . shall in all respects rank and be preferred pari passu with the said bond and disposition in security, and the remainder of said sum of £6000. . . .”

Mr Thomas having died on 1st June 1883, his testamentary trustees granted bonds of corroboration and dispositions in security to the extent of £4000 as regarded Nicholson's trustees, and of £2000 as regarded Miss Kenmore, and in further security they conveyed to both bondholders the lands of Transy. Each bond of corroboration contained a clause, mutatis mutandis, in similar terms, giving equal rights to the two creditors, the clause in the bond to Nicholson's trustees running thus,—“Providing and declaring that the foresaid principal sum of £4000, and interest and penalties herein contained, and the said sum of £2000, the balance of the foresaid sum of £6000 contained in the said bond and disposition in security (with interest and penalties), now due to the said Miss Catherine Margaret Kenmore, and secured over the subjects and others before described, . . . shall be ranked and preferred pari passu on the said subjects and others above conveyed, and the rents, feu-duties, and casualties thereof, and also on the prices and proceeds to be realised therefrom, and that irrespective of the order of priority in which these presents and the said bond of corroboration and disposition in security in favour of the said Miss Catherine Margaret Kenmore have been or shall be registered in the Register of Sasines.”

In 1887 Nicholson's trustees and Mrs M'Laughlin, after having called

No. 15.

Nov. 4, 1891.
Nicholson's
Trustees v.
M'Laughlin.

up the loan, entered into possession of the lands of Pinnacle and Transy under an action of maills and duties. The free rents of Transy were not however sufficient to meet the interest upon prior bonds, and the free rents of Pinnacle were not sufficient to pay the interest upon the bonds to which Nicholson's trustees and Mrs M'Laughlin had right.

In 1889 an agreement was entered into between Nicholson's trustees, Mrs M'Laughlin, and Thomas' trustees, whereby the last undertook to convey certain other lands in security, and also to grant a deed of authority containing the fullest powers of management and sale. Accordingly a deed of authority, dated 6th and 15th November 1889, was executed, whereby Thomas' trustees granted as regarded two-thirds pro indiviso of the security subjects to Nicholson's trustees, and as regarded one-third pro indiviso to Mrs M'Laughlin, full power to realise the several security subjects as if they were absolute and uncontrolled proprietors, including power in their own names as proprietors, or as heritable creditors, or as factors and commissioners for Mr Thomas' representatives, to sell the security subjects. It was declared that the powers granted in the deed of authority should be in addition to, but should not in any way prejudice or curtail the powers and rights of the parties as heritable creditors under the original bond and disposition in security.

Mr Thomas' trustees were unable to pay the sum contained in the bond, and after the usual requisition, the lands of Pinnacle were three times exposed for sale at £11,500, £11,500, and £11,000 respectively, but no purchaser was found.

Nicholson's trustees were desirous of realising the security subjects for the purposes of the trust under which they acted, and proposed to expose the lands again for sale at the price of £10,000. Mrs M'Laughlin refused to consent to this proposal upon the ground that she believed that by holding the property for a time a larger price might be obtained for it.

On 26th February 1891 Nicholson's trustees raised an action against Mrs M'Laughlin, her husband, for his interest, and Mr Thomas' trustees, concluding for declarator, inter alia, that the pursuers were entitled, "after due advertisement and otherwise fulfilling the requirements of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, and other statutes in reference to sale of lands by a creditor under a heritable security, so far as such requirements had not already been fulfilled by them, to sell and dispose in whole or in lots of the said lands and estate of Pinnacle by public roup at Edinburgh; . . . and that the defender Mrs Catherine Margaret M'Laughlin, as creditor in the said bond and disposition in security to the extent of the said principal sum of £2000, interest and consequents, conform to assignation aforesaid, and the defender Henry J. M'Laughlin, for his interest, are bound to consent to and concur in such sale or sales, and failing their doing so within fourteen days after the date of the decree to that effect to follow hereon, that the pursuers are entitled to dispense with such consent and concurrence, and to proceed to sell and dispose of said lands and estate as if the same had been granted; and that on a sale being so carried out, or upon each sale so carried out, if the lands are sold in lots, the pursuers, or their assignees or representatives, either alone or with consent and concurrence of the defenders Mrs Catherine Margaret M'Laughlin and Henry J. M'Laughlin, are and shall be entitled to grant in favour of the purchaser or respective purchasers at such sale or sales, or to his or their assignees or representatives, an absolute irredeemable disposition or dispositions of said lands and others, or of the parts thereof so sold, containing all usual and necessary clauses, and all other deeds necessary for completing the right and title or rendering the sale effectual to a purchaser or purchasers: And it ought and should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that the sale or sales to be so carried through by the pursuers, and the disposition or dispositions and other deeds to be so granted by the pursuers to the purchaser or purchasers or their foresaids, whether such sales, dispositions, or other deeds are or shall be made or granted with or without the consent and concurrence of the defenders Mrs M'Laughlin and Henry J. M'Laughlin, shall be as valid and effectual in every respect, and shall confer on the purchaser or respective purchasers as good and complete a right and title, and generally shall have the same effect, all as if the same had been made and granted by the pursuers and the defenders Mrs M'Laughlin and Henry J. M'Laughlin jointly as holders of the said bond and disposition in security, or otherwise for their whole respective rights and interests in or to the said lands and others." And further, for declarator that the pursuers on receipt of the price should be bound to apply it in the first place in payment of preferable encumbrances and expenses, and to apply the balance as follows:—(1) To pay the pursuers and Mrs M'Laughlin in full if the balance proved sufficient for the purpose, and to consign the surplus if any in bank; (2) if the balance proved insufficient, to divide it between them pari passu and according to their respective rights in the bond. The summons further contained alternative conclusions for declarator that the pursuers were entitled to sell the lands by public roup, and to grant a valid title in favour of a purchaser, the price after payment of all charges preferable to the debts of the pursuers and Mrs M'Laughlin to be proportionally divided between them according to their respective shares in the bond and disposition in security, or otherwise for judicial sale, and to have the pursuers and Mrs M'Laughlin ordained to execute the necessary deeds in writing for giving the purchaser complete title to the lands, and that the price of the subjects when sold should, after deduction of preferable charges, be divided between the parties pari passu and rateably according to their respective shares in the bond; or otherwise, in the event of its being found necessary for the explication of the rights of the parties to the action, that the Court should sequestrate the estate conveyed by the bond, and appoint a judicial factor to realise the security subjects.

The pursuers founded on the above deeds, and averred that they were advised that £10,000 would be a fair sum at which to expose the estate of Pinnacle for sale. They were apprehensive that the value of the estate might decrease, and it was necessary for them to realise the subjects as the income of the trust-funds under their charge had been insufficient to pay in full the annuity to which the widow of the late Mr Nicholson was entitled out of the trust funds held by them. They further averred that they had offered to assign to Mrs M'Laughlin their debt of £4000 and interest, with the security therefor, at the price of £2500, which represented the value of the pursuers' interest in the subjects upon the basis of a price of £10,750 being received for the property, but she had declined to take the assignation.

Mrs M'Laughlin and her husband (who alone defended the action) averred that, looking to the price paid originally for the estate by Mr Thomas and the sums expended by him upon it, they believed that by holding the property for a time a larger price than £10,000 would be obtained for it.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuers being, in virtue of their bond and disposition in security libelled on, and, separatim, of the deed of authority above mentioned, in the position of joint or common holders pro indiviso of the said subjects of security, they are entitled to insist in the present action against the defenders. (2) The pursuers, in respect of

No. 15.

Nov. 4, 1891.

Nicholson's

Trustees v.

M'Laughlin.

No. 15.

Nov. 4, 1891.
Nicholson's
Trustees v.
M'Laughlin.

the defenders Mrs M'Laughlin and Henry J. M'Laughlin refusing to concur in the proposed sale under the bond and disposition in security, are entitled to carry through the sale at their own hands, and grant a complete and unencumbered title to the purchaser upon the footing of accounting to Mrs M'Laughlin for the proportional share of the price effeiring to her assignation in security. (3) The said lands being incapable of division according to the just rights and interests of all concerned, the pursuers are entitled to have decree of sale, as also decree relative to the disposal of the price, as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The statements of the pursuers are not relevant and sufficient to sustain the conclusions of the summons. (3) The pursuers having assigned to the defender Mrs M'Laughlin a portion of the sum in the said bond, are not entitled either to bring the security subjects to sale at their own hand, or to compel these defenders to concur in bringing them to sale, except upon the footing of providing full payment to these defenders of the portion of the bond so assigned to Mrs M'Laughlin. (4) The pursuers are not in titulo to give a statutory title to a purchaser without the concurrence of these defenders, who cannot be compelled to give that concurrence, except on payment.

On 30th June the Lord Ordinary (Low) found that the pursuers' averments were not relevant or sufficient to support the conclusions of the summons: Therefore sustained the first plea in law for the defender, dismissed the action, and decerned.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The pursuers maintain that this is truly a case of common property, that the ordinary rule of law that no one can be forced to remain in communione applies, that as the subject is indivisible it must be sold and the proceeds divided, and that the only way in which that can be accomplished is by a sale of the lands which are the subjects of the security.

"The question is one of novelty, but I have come to the conclusion that this is not a case to which the rules in regard to common property upon which the pursuers found, apply.

"The parties are not common proprietors of the lands which the pursuers desire to have sold. They have a joint infeftment in the lands in security, but that infeftment is only a burden upon the right of the granter of the security, and they can never under the bond and disposition in security themselves acquire a right of property in the lands. It is true that they can give an absolute right of property to another, but they can do that only by virtue of the mandate which they hold from the granter. It is therefore difficult to see how the lands, of which the parties are not and never can be proprietors, can be sold on the ground that they are common property, and yet it is these lands, and nothing else, which the pursuers seek authority to sell.

"The summons contains a variety of alternative conclusions, intended, no doubt, to meet different views which might be taken of the rights of parties; but, as I have pointed out, the pursuers' case was entirely rested upon the argument that the claim was one of the sale of common indivisible property. If I had been of opinion that that view was sound, I should have thought that the proper conclusion to give effect to would have been the second alternative conclusion, viz., that for a judicial sale. The first series of conclusions contemplate the pursuers being authorised to sell under the bond without the defender's consent. Such procedure would not be appropriate to the sale of common property, and it was not maintained that if the argument that there was here common property failed, it was in the power of the Court (at all events in the circumstances disclosed on record) to dispense with the consent of the defender, and authorise the pursuers to sell, and to grant a good title to the purchaser without her consent.

"It may be that there is some hardship to the pursuers in not being able to realise the security subjects, but they have themselves to blame, because by the

No. 15.

Nov. 4, 1891.
Nicholson's
Trustees v.
M'Laughlin.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The conclusions of the summons were framed upon the footing (1) that the power of any one of several pari passu bondholders to sell the subject of security so as wholly to disencumber it and to divide the price proportionally was within the purpose and meaning of the Conveyancing Acts of 1868 and 1874, or if not, that (2) such power existed at common law; and the pursuers were entitled to have their rights declared under one or other of these alternatives. Taking the latter alternative first, and assuming that the case of pari passu bondholders had been overlooked by the statutes, the common law warranted a sale. The position of matters was this: There had been but one debt originally constituted, of which the property disposed in security was an adjunct, and the original holders of the security had assigned to the defender Mrs M'Laughlin a portion of this debt upon the footing of giving off exactly the same rights in regard to the security subjects as they themselves held. The two parties therefore stood towards each other in the relation of pro indiviso holders of a common subject. The owners of the property being left out of view (and as they did not defend the action they were to be presumed to have no interest in the subjects), the pursuers and defenders were substantially in the position of coproprietors of a res communis. But it was well settled that any one of several coproprietors had a right to insist that the property, where incapable of division, should be brought to sale, and his interest thereby made available to him in money.¹ Similarly in the case of several coheirs, any one of them could insist on a sale of the assets of the inheritance where these were indivisible, as, e.g., where the whole estate consisted of a heritable bond or bonds. The same rule applied in the case of rights less than property, such as leases, adjudications, and in short in the case of every right in which there was a common interest in a common subject. The Lord Ordinary's view that there was a joint and indivisible mandate could not be maintained. But assuming that the rights of the two creditors were separate, then upon a sound construction of the Conveyancing Acts, the pursuers were entitled to sell the security subjects and pay off the terms of the assignation which they granted to the defender, they put her into the position of being joint mandatory with them under the power to sell, and deprived themselves of the right of selling without her consent. There might be a case in which the refusal of a person in the position of the defender to concur in a sale was so manifestly unjust and prejudicial to the other creditors that the Court would, in the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction, be entitled to interfere. But no such case is disclosed here. The property has fallen in value, and the pursuers think that it is better to sell now in case of further depreciation, while the defender is hopeful that by holding the property for a time a better price may be obtained. Both these views are intelligible and reasonable, and as the right of the parties to sell rests upon a joint mandate, I do not think that it is possible for the Court to interfere with what is no more than a reasonable exercise of discretion upon the part of one of the mandataries.

"Under the additional powers given to the parties by the deed of authority, I do not think that the pursuers take any advantage, because, although in a question with the granters of that deed the parties to this action are entitled to deal with the lands as if absolute proprietors, they are not in a question inter se in a materially different position from that which they occupy under the bond and disposition in security. As under the latter deed they hold a joint mandate to sell, so under the former deed they hold a joint factory and commission to deal with the estate as if they were absolute proprietors. But under neither deed are they actually proprietors, and under both deeds the powers which they possess are joint powers, and must be exercised jointly."

¹ Bell's Comms. 5th edn. p. 64, 7th edn. p. 62; Milligan v. Barnhill, Feb. 8, 1782, M. 2486, Hailes' Decns. 897.

No. 15.

Nov. 4, 1891.
Nicholson's
Trustees v.
M'Laughlin.

defenders. The language of sections 122 and 123 of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, and section 48 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874,* was consistent with that view. No doubt the statutes did not expressly mention bondholders having a pari passu right of security, but as power was given to a heritable creditor exercising his power of sale to disencumber the heritable subjects both of prior and postponed bonds, the same power must by implication be extended to the creditor in relation to a bond ranking pari passu with his own. But the equitable way of disencumbering the lands in this latter case was not by paying the non-consenting pari passu bondholder in full, as the defenders contended, but by giving him a proportional share of the price according to his original agreement in his bond. A sale by the pursuers on the footing that the defenders' bond and assignation should be left undischarged was impracticable, except at such a price as would deprive them of nearly the whole value of their debt.

Argued for the defenders;—The conclusions of the action were irrelevant, being framed upon the theory that a heritable creditor had rights similar to those of a heritable proprietor. This was not so.¹ A heritable creditor possessed only limited rights; he was truly but the pledgee of the heritable subject, and at common law he had no power of selling the subject pledged. His only power was derived from the power of sale commonly inserted in the modern bond and disposition in security. Here the pari passu creditors had each an equal and separate power of sale. The right of each was independent of that of the other, and might be independently exercised. Hence their position even upon the analogy of ownership was that of part, not joint, owners.² They were not, however, owners in any sense, and had not therefore the title necessary to sue an action of division and sale, to which the conclusions of the present summons really amounted.³ The pursuers' true and only remedy was an action of ranking and sale under the Act 1681, cap. 17.⁴ Further, the power of sale under a bond and disposition in security must be exercised in accordance with statutory regulations. It was really a man-

* The Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, sections 122 and 123, are quoted infra by Lord M'Laren in his opinion, p. 56.

Section 48 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, provides:—"Provisions for disencumbering lands sold under heritable securities when no surplus emerges.—Where lands are sold by an heritable creditor under the powers competent to creditors in heritable securities, and it shall occur that no surplus remains after deducting the debt secured, with the interest due thereon and penalties incurred, and expenses in reference to the possession of the estate (if the creditor had been in possession), including expense of insurance, repairs, and management, and whole expense attending such sale, and after paying all previous incumbrances and the expense of discharging the same, it shall be competent to any notary-public to execute a certificate to that effect in, or as nearly as may be in the terms of schedule L, No. 1, hereto annexed, and the disposition by the creditor to the purchaser shall, along with such certificate, when recorded in the appropriate Register of Sasines, have the effect of completely disencumbering the lands and others sold of all securities and diligences prior and posterior to the security of such creditor, as well as of the security and diligence of such creditor himself, save and except when the security and diligence of such creditor shall be assigned by way of further or collateral security to the purchaser."

¹ Henderson v. Wallace, Jan. 7, 1875, 2 R. 272, per Lord President, p. 276; Scottish Heritable Security Co. v. Allan Campbell & Co., Jan. 14, 1876, 3 R. 333.

² Schaw v. Black, Jan. 15, 1889, 16 R. 336, per Lord Kinnear, p. 337.

³ Brock v. Hamilton, Jan. 27, 1852, 19 D. 701, note.

⁴ Cannon's Trustees v. Lake and Others, June 9, 1883, 21 S. L. R. 101.

date coming in place of the power to distress the debtor for non-payment, which was all the creditor had under the old heritable bond.¹ If the power of sale was exercised, its effect was to disencumber the lands sold of postponed securities only. The sale then must take place subject to and under reservation of all pari passu securities. The alternative conclusion for sequestration was only granted under very exceptional circumstances, and the only circumstance stated here was impecuniosity of the trust-estate.

No. 15.

Nov. 4, 1891.
Nicholson's
Trustees v.
M'Laughlin.

LORD M'LAREN.—This is an action against certain persons who are assignees in a bond and disposition in security to the extent of £2000, the original creditor remaining infeft in the subjects to the extent of the other £4000 lent. Following upon the deed of assignation a bond of corroboration was granted by the representatives of the original borrower in favour of the pursuers. Another bond of corroboration was granted in the same terms in favour of the other creditor. These bonds embrace other subjects with which we have no concern.

But what we are concerned with is that in each of the bonds of corroboration there is a clause to the effect of giving equal rights to the two creditors. The clause runs thus,—Declaring that they “shall be ranked and preferred pari passu on the said subjects and others above conveyed, and the rents, feu-duties, and casualties thereof, and also on the prices and proceeds to be realised therefrom, and that irrespective of the order of priority in which these presents and the said bond of corroboration and disposition in security in favour of the said Miss Catherine Margaret Kenmore have been or shall be registered in the Register of Sasines.”

The literal and obvious meaning of such a clause is that, first, with regard to the rents, if the creditors should enter into possession, they shall divide the subjects between them rateably for the purpose of effecting payment of their interest, and if necessary of payment of the principal, and if the property comes to be sold for the benefit of the two heritable creditors, they are to be ranked rateably on the proceeds; but ex figura verborum nothing is said as to the order in which the creditors may exercise the powers of sale, or as to their respective rights in case of disagreement as to the time and mode of exercising the power.

It is contended by the pursuers that under the clause which I have read either of the persons in right of the security is entitled to call upon the other to consent, or (which I think is the same thing) that either is entitled without the consent of the other to sell just as if the other had given his consent to the sale, the result being that, under those conditions, this clause of pari passu ranking comes into operation.

The question is thus sharply raised whether under this clause or under the Acts of Parliament one of the two creditors in possession of the security subjects is entitled to sell them so as to prejudice the security of the other creditor, who has not assented to the sale.

In considering the Acts of Parliament, one must remember that the clauses are framed on the principle that all the rights which the parties are to have are given to them by the deed. The Act of 1868, in those clauses which treat of creditor's rights, confers no rights vi statuti, but gives forms of abbreviated

¹ Ross' Lectures, vol. ii. p. 393.

No. 15.

Nov. 4, 1891.
 Nicholson's
 Trustees v.
 M'Laughlin.

clauses which are to be inserted in the bond, interpreting them as having the same meaning and effect as the longer clauses. The effect of this is, that all the rights of the creditor in the bond are supposed to flow from the grantor, and to be contained in the bond, although you may have to go to the statute to find out the meaning of the short clauses thereby authorised. Turning to the 119th section, which gives the import of the abbreviated clauses, we find that the abbreviated clause giving power of sale is interpreted to mean that on making demand for payment in presence of a notary-public and witnesses, and after a period of three months is expired, it shall be lawful for the creditor, "immediately after the expiration of the said three months, and without any other intimation or process at law, to sell and dispose, in whole or in lots, of the said lands and others." Passing over the next two sections of the Act, we find that the 122d and 123d clauses are not interpretation clauses, but are statutory definitions of the powers consequent on the sale. The 122d section defines the obligation of the selling creditor to count and reckon for the surplus of the price, and it provides that he shall consign it, "after deducting the debt secured, with the interest due thereon, and penalties and expenses, and after paying all previous incumbrances, and the expense of discharging the same, in one or other of the said banks, or in a branch of any such bank, in the joint names of the seller and purchaser,"—that is, in order that the purchaser may not be involved in any question as to the application of the price.

If there is no surplus the 123d section comes into operation, and under it "the disposition by the creditor to the purchaser shall have the effect of completely disencumbering the lands and others sold of all securities and diligences posterior to the security of such creditor, as well as of the security and diligence of such creditor himself."

Now, in the argument which has been addressed to us, alternative views of the rights of creditors were considered by both parties. One alternative suggested is that either of the creditors has an independent power of sale, and then the question is what is the effect of the exercise of the power by one creditor upon the rights of the other.

The second alternative is that there can be a sale only at the instance of the two creditors acting concurrently. If a sale can only take place by the joint authority and consent of both creditors, then I agree with all which has been said by the Lord Ordinary, to the effect that the Court has no discretionary power to give a higher right than that which the parties have constituted by agreement. The right of sale is given to the creditor for his own protection, and it is his opinion that must determine the question whether he will concur in the sale, the question for him being whether he is likely to realise the full benefit of his security by the proposed sale.

But I am unable to see any good reason for the suggestion which I think the Lord Ordinary has taken from the parties that the consent of a pari passu creditor is necessary to a sale.

I think that when a security is assigned to two parties for separate interests each creditor retains for his own protection all rights arising under clauses which may be considered executorial of the right of security; and in that view I cannot see that either the debtor or the pari passu creditor has an interest to prevent the other pari passu creditor exercising his power of sale. The debtor has to pay up the debt. The other creditor can have no interest, because the effect of a sale is only to disencumber the lands of postponed securities. The security of a pari passu creditor is in no way affected by the sale, because his right does not fall within the description of a security posterior to that of the seller. In this respect there is no difference between the position of a creditor who ranks pari passu and that of a preferable creditor. Their securities are unaffected by a sale under the power. The true answer to the argument of the pursuer is that he has an effectual power of sale, but that he can only sell subject to the right of the defender. The pursuer, therefore, may either arrange with the defender to pay off his bond, or he may sell the lands subject to the defender's security. In either case I should suppose there would be no objection to the title on the part of a purchaser.

No. 15.
Nov. 4, 1891.
Nicholson's
Trustees v.
M'Laughlin.

On these grounds I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed, and the action dismissed.

LORD ADAM.—The object of the action is to determine whether the heritable creditor in the bond for £2000 is bound to consent to the proposed sale of the security subjects at the instance of the original creditor who now holds the bond for £4000.

That is the real question, and the leading conclusion of the summons refers to it, and all the other conclusions are subsidiary to it; and, as I understand, it is not contended by Mr Rankine that if he fails upon it he could maintain any other conclusion.

Now, it appears to me that the action is founded upon a fallacy, viz., that the pursuers and the defender are pro indiviso proprietors not only of the original bond for £6000, but of the subjects granted in security of it. When the assignation of the original debt was to the extent of £2000 made to the defender, with the lands in security, and with a power of sale, and corroborated by the debtor, it operated as a complete separation of the two debts. I can see nothing of the nature of a communio bonorum, but on the contrary two separate and independent debts existing of £4000 and £2000 respectively, with a declaration that they are to rank pari passu.

If that is so, what are the respective rights of the two creditors inter se? I think that each of the creditors is entitled to exercise the power of sale of his portion of the debt without the consent of the other. I can see no reason for holding that both creditors must combine before either shall be entitled to sell. Mr Rankine says that the creditors are to rank pari passu, and that if we do not declare that one of the creditors is bound to consent to the sale, then there would be no pari passu ranking. Pari passu ranking means that when the subjects are sold the parties shall rank upon the price. The question is merely as to the power of sale, and as I say, I do not see why each of the creditors should not exercise it.

It is possible there may be a practical difficulty in finding a purchaser unless the price is sufficient to pay the prior debt and the defender's debt. If such a price can be obtained, then the claims of the defender will be fully met. If not, then the pursuer must effect his sale under complete reservation of the defender's rights.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of opinion that the pursuers and defender are creditors in separate debts, either of which may be discharged or enforced irrespective of the other. It is true that these two creditors hold securities over the same estate. But the securities are just as clearly separate and distinct as the debts,

No. 15.

Nov. 4, 1891.
Nicholson's
Trustees v.
M'Laughlin.

and it follows that either creditor may realise his security independently of the other.

It seems to have been supposed that the pursuers cannot sell without the defender's consent, because a sale by one of these creditors would in some way prejudice the security of the other. But that is a misapprehension. There is indeed one case in which a creditor may sell under a bond and disposition in security to the effect of disencumbering the estate of another creditor's debt without the consent of the latter, and without paying his debt in full—that is the case where lands burdened with prior and postponed bonds are sold by the first bondholder, and do not bring a large enough price to pay the postponed bonds. But that is because the later bondholders have accepted a security with due notice on record that the subject is already burdened, and may therefore be carried away from them for payment of the preferable creditor's debt.

It is very clear that the parties to this case, between whom it is stipulated that their debts are to rank pari passu, are in an entirely different position. I am unable therefore to see any reason why the pursuers should require the defender's concurrence in a sale. They cannot compel the defender to realise her security, but they may sell as against the debtor in the exercise of their powers under their own bond, with which the defender has no concern. If they choose to sell, the purchaser must take the land subject to the defender's security, and that will no doubt affect the amount of the price, but that is a consequence of which the pursuers cannot complain, because the defender derives her right from them, and they can do nothing to prejudice the interest of their assignee. The notion that there is any such partnership or community of interest between the parties as the pursuers' counsel has maintained, or that they are joint mandataries, is, in my opinion, without foundation.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

FRASER, STODART, & BALLINGALL, W.S.—HENDEBSON & CLARK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 16.

Nov. 6, 1891.
Culross
Special Water Supply District Committee v.
Smith-Sligo's
Trustees.

CULROSS SPECIAL WATER SUPPLY DISTRICT COMMITTEE, Pursuers (Respondents).—Jameson—C. N. Johnston.
ARCHIBALD DOMINIC SMITH-SLIGO AND OTHERS (Smith-Sligo's Trustees), Defenders (Appellants).—W. Campbell.

Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Property—Possession—Service.—A Sheriff has jurisdiction over the proprietors of lands lying within his sheriffdom in any competent action relating to the possession of these lands, or of things locally situated within them, although such proprietors reside beyond, and are not served with the action within, the sheriffdom.

A Local Authority brought an action in a Sheriff Court to have the proprietors of certain lands within the sheriffdom, through which a pipe belonging to the Local Authority was laid, interdicted from drawing from the pipe in question a supply of water for a particular portion of their lands. The defenders were resident beyond, and were not served with the action within, the sheriffdom.

Held that the Sheriff had jurisdiction to deal with the action, in respect that its subject-matter related to heritable property within his sheriffdom, and that the defenders were proprietors of lands within it.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Fife
and Kinross.

IN the year 1885 the Local Authority of Culross being desirous of procuring a suitable supply of water for the district, entered into an agreement with Archibald Vincent Smith-Sligo, of Blair and Inzievar, in the county of Fife, and other proprietors in the district, who were anxious to obtain a supply of water for their respective properties. The Local Authority agreed to proceed forthwith to obtain the formation of a special water supply district, and the other parties agreed to bear certain proportions of the expense of securing the requisite supply of water. It was part of the agreement that the main pipe of supply should be so laid as to give a constant supply of water to Mr Smith-Sligo's estates of Blair and Inzievar, and it was provided that he should have liberty to lay branch pipes to connect the main pipe with these properties, and should pay at a fixed rate for the water drawn off by him. After the agreement was concluded the special supply district was formed, and the works were constructed.

No. 16.

Nov. 6, 1891.
Culross
Special Water Supply District Committee v.
Smith-Sligo's
Trustees.

In May 1891 the Committee of Management of the Special Water Supply District of Culross, appointed under the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Dunfermline against Archibald Dominic Smith-Sligo and others, the testamentary trustees of the said Archibald Vincent Smith-Sligo, and, as such trustees, proprietors of, inter alia, the estate of Comrie in the parish of Culross, praying the Court to interdict the defenders "from taking for the supply of the estate of Comrie in the parish of Culross, belonging to the defenders, or for any part thereof, or for the supply of any property whatever other than the estate of Blair and Inzievar, belonging to them as trustees foresaid, any of the water which is conveyed by pipes forming part of the water-works" constructed under the agreement already mentioned; and further, "to ordain the defenders instantly to disconnect a pipe which they have recently laid for the purpose of supplying with said water certain portions of the said estate of Comrie, and which pipe they have connected with a pipe forming part of said water-works, . . . and through which pipe recently laid as aforesaid they have, illegally and without the consent of the pursuers, for some time past been drawing a supply of water for portions of the said estate of Comrie."

The pursuers averred that the defenders had laid a pipe from certain parts of the estate of Comrie, for which they wanted to get a supply of water, and had, without the pursuers' knowledge or consent, connected the same on or about 1st June 1890 with the branch pipe which supplied the property of Inzievar, and since then had, notwithstanding the repeated objections of the pursuers, drawn a supply of water through the pipe so laid for the said portions of the estate of Comrie.

The defenders admitted having laid and connected the pipe, but averred that they had a right to do so, in respect that the lands of Comrie were part of the estate of Blair and Inzievar.

They further averred that none of the defenders were resident or carried on business within the sheriffdom of Fife and Kinross, and that they had not been personally cited within the sheriffdom.

The pursuers admitted the truth of this averment, but explained in answer that the defenders were proprietors of large heritable properties within the sheriffdom, and that the subject-matter in dispute was situated within the sheriffdom.

The defenders, inter alia, pleaded;—(1) No jurisdiction.

On 27th June the Sheriff-substitute (Gillespie) pronounced an interlocutor repelling, inter alia, the first plea in law for the defenders, and before answer as to the relevancy of the defenders' averments, allowed parties a proof of their averments.*

* "NOTE.—Notwithstanding the able argument for the defenders, the Sheriff-substitute is humbly of opinion that the jurisdiction of this Court is

No. 16.

Nov. 6, 1891.
Culross
Special Water Supply District Committee v.
Smith-Sligo's
Trustees.

The defenders appealed, and argued ;—The defenders were not resident, nor did they occupy premises within the sheriffdom for the purposes of trade, and the ground of action was nothing more nor less than delict. In such a case it was necessary, if the defender did not reside within the undoubtedly founded ratione rei sitæ, and that personal service within its territory is not necessary, as was contended.

"The defenders' counsel built an ingenious argument on such cases as Pirie v. Warden, Feb. 20, 1867, 5 Macph. 597 ; and Kermick v. Watson, July 7, 1871, 9 Macph. 984 ; but these cases belong to a different chapter of the Sheriff's jurisdiction. If the question were open, good reason could be given why personal service within the territory should be required in the one class of cases, and not in the other. But the Sheriff-substitute cannot regard the question as open. It appears to him to be settled by authority and uniform practice.

" 'Civil jurisdiction,' says Erskine, i. 2, 17, 'is founded, secondly ratione rei sitæ, if the subject claimed by the pursuer lies within the territory, whether the defender resides within it or not.—Williamson v. Haigie, Nov. 28, 1835, Dict. p. 4815. And, indeed, if the subject in question be immovable, the Judge of the territory where it is situated is the sole Judge competent, in so far as he has the cognisance of heritable rights ; for things that are immovable are incapable of shifting places, and must therefore be restored in that place where they lie, and by the warrant of that Judge whose jurisdiction reacheth over them.'

"This is an action to regulate the possession of a heritable subject,—a class of action of which the Sheriff Court has undoubted cognisance. Even if it can be said that the action involves a question of heritable right and title, there is no allegation that the value of the subject in dispute exceeds the limit of the jurisdiction conferred on the Sheriff by the Sheriff Courts Act, 1877, sec. 8, which contains an express provision that 'actions relating to questions of heritable right or title raised in a Sheriff Court shall be raised in the Sheriff Court of the county in which the property forming the subject in dispute is situated, and all parties against whom any such action may be brought shall be subject in such action to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute of such county.' Nothing is said here as to personal service within the county being necessary.

"Turning back to the passage in Erskine, he goes on to point out how the difficulty arising from the doctrine that a Judge cannot grant a warrant to cite beyond his own territory is got over. He says,—'No suit can proceed against a defender till he be lawfully summoned to appear in judgment ; neither can a Judge issue a warrant to cite one who resides in another territory. Where, therefore, one whose domicile is not within the territory is to be sued before an inferior Court, ratione rei sitæ, the pursuer must apply to the Court of Session, whose jurisdiction extends over the whole kingdom, for letters of supplement, which are granted of course, containing a warrant to cite the defender to appear before the Judge of the territory where the controverted subject lies.—Williamson (sup. cit.), November 28, 1835.' Therefore, according to Erskine, the only condition necessary for a Sheriff Court exercising its jurisdiction ratione rei sitæ is, not that the defender shall be personally cited in the sheriffdom, but that letters of supplement from the Court of Session be obtained.

"It is not necessary to examine the changes made by sec. 24 of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1838 (1 and 2 Vict. c. 119), and by sec. 12 (1) of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1876 ; for whatever forms may be necessary, the acceptance of service by the defenders' agent amounts at least to an agreement to hold the petition as duly served at their dwelling-houses in Edinburgh,—for this much the pursuers could have done in spite of the defenders.

"It is instructive to notice that when he comes to deal with jurisdiction ratione contractus (Inst. i. 2, 20), Erskine points out the necessity of personal service within the territory (or its equivalent in certain cases)."

territory of the Judge before whom the action was brought, that it should be served upon him within that territory.¹ The action not having been served within his territory, the Sheriff had no jurisdiction.

The pursuers argued;—The Sheriff must have power to restrain by interdict injury to property with his territory. The lack of authority on the point was to be attributed to the fact that the Sheriff's power to interfere in such a case had never before been questioned.

At advising,—

No. 16.
Nov. 6, 1891.
Culross
Special Water Supply District Committee v.
Smith-Sligo's
Trustees.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The defenders in this petition are the proprietors in trust of certain lands in the county of Fife. Under an agreement with the Local Authority of Culross, a supply of water has been conducted by pipes into certain parts of those lands. Since the laying of those original pipes the defenders have opened a connecting pipe conducting some of the water thus supplied to another part of their lands called Comrie. The Local Authority dispute the right of the defenders to do this, alleging that the lands thus introduced to the benefit of the water supply do not fall within the agreement. The present proceeding is a petition to the Sheriff of Fife praying for interdict against the defenders taking any of the water for the supply of Comrie, and for an order on the defenders to disconnect the pipe which they have laid for this purpose.

The first defence is that the Sheriff has no jurisdiction over the defenders, all of whom reside in Edinburgh. It happens that the defenders accepted service, but this places the question in no other position than if they had been served in Edinburgh. They maintain that, they not having been served within the sheriffdom of Fife, there is no jurisdiction.

In my opinion this plea has been rightly repelled. The subject of the application is the possession of pipes and water laid in lands in Fife, but so far as the present question is concerned it is substantially the same as if the dispute regarded the tapping a natural water-course within that jurisdiction. To restore against unlawful changes in such subjects is a judicial duty which can effectively and conveniently be done by the local Court of the territory alone, as is most clearly seen perhaps in the case of the Judge being asked to appoint the work of restoration to be done at the sight of the Court. I consider that the proprietor of lands in any county is answerable to the Judge Ordinary in any competent action relating to the possession of those lands, or of things locally situated within those lands, whether he be served within the sheriffdom or not.

LORD ADAM.—I concur with your Lordship. The pursuers are proprietors of certain water-pipes which run through the defenders' lands in the county of Fife. The defenders have, according to the petitioners, tapped these pipes and abstracted the water belonging to pursuers, and the leading conclusion of the petition is for interdict against the defenders continuing so to abstract the water. Accordingly this appears to me to be an application to the Judge Ordinary of the bounds for protection of property situated within his territory. It appears to me to be not doubtful that the Sheriff, as Judge Ordinary of the bounds, has ratione rei sitæ jurisdiction over persons who are proprietors of subjects situated within his territory, although they may reside beyond his jurisdiction. There is no doubt that the pipes which are the subject-matter of this action lie within the bounds of the Sheriff's jurisdiction, and the question raised is a merely ¹ Kermick v. Watson, July 7, 1871, 9 Macph. 984, per Lord President, 985, 43 Scot. Jur. 542; Bird v. Brown, Aug. 30, 1887, 25 S. L. R. 1.

No. 16.

Nov. 6, 1891.
Culroas
Special Water Supply District Committee v.
Smith-Sligo's
Trustees.

possessory one, whether the pursuers are to be protected in the possession of these pipes. I think therefore that it is not doubtful that the Sheriff has jurisdiction.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in the opinion of your Lordship in the chair.

LORD KINNEAR was absent.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

WALLACE & BEGG, W.S.—TAIT & CRICHTON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 17.

Nov. 7, 1891.
Rowan v.
Gaffney.

C. B. ROWAN, Complainer (Respondent).—Young—G. Watt.
RICHARD GAFFNEY, Defender (Appellant).—M'Kechnie—Crabb Watt.

Process—Appeal—Implement.—The procurator-fiscal of a burgh presented a complaint to the magistrates craving them to ordain a resident therein to destroy a dog belonging to him, which was alleged to be vicious, or to secure it safely, and failing his doing so for warrant to destroy it or to secure it. After proof the magistrates ordained the respondent to find caution that he would confine the dog, and failing his doing so within twenty-four hours granted warrant to destroy it. The respondent having found caution appealed to the Court of Session. Held (1) that the appeal was competent, and (2) that the interlocutor had not by the finding of caution been implemented so as to exclude appeal.

2D DIVISION.
Burgh Court of Ayr.

C. B. ROWAN, Procurator-fiscal of the burgh of Ayr, presented a complaint to the Magistrates of Ayr against Richard Gaffney, canteenkeeper at the Ayr Barracks, stating that Gaffney was permitting a mastiff, which was vicious and dangerous, to go at large unmuzzled, and that this dog had attacked certain persons. The complaint craved the Magistrates to cite Gaffney to answer thereto; to ordain him to destroy the dog, or to find caution to secure it, or otherwise "dispose of it in some specific manner to the satisfaction of the Court"; and failing Gaffney destroying or securing the dog, warrant was craved to destroy it, or otherwise to secure and safely dispose of it.

The record of the proceedings bore that Gaffney, after objecting to the relevancy of the complaint (which objection was repelled), pleaded "not guilty," and that a proof was led, which was recorded.

The Magistrate pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the foregoing complaint, together with the evidence adduced, finds that the defender's dog in question, on 29th June 1891, on the South Beach, Ayr, attacked and chased" certain persons, "and that said dog on each occasion foresaid caused serious dread and alarm to each of the persons attacked as aforesaid; and that said dog is large and powerful, and is dangerous to the lieges: Therefore ordains the said Richard Gaffney, within twenty-four hours, to lodge sufficient caution that he will strongly chain or fasten up and securely confine the said dog so long as said dog may be in this jurisdiction, under the penalty of £10 sterling; and failing his lodging said caution within twenty-four hours after this order is intimated to him, grants warrant to officers of Court to pass and immediately thereafter take possession of and destroy, or otherwise secure and safely dispose of, said dog, and for that purpose grants warrant to open shut and lockfast places," &c.

In consequence of this interlocutor Gaffney found caution to fasten up the dog securely so long as it should be within the jurisdiction of the Magistrates of Ayr.

Gaffney thereafter appealed to the Second Division, and printed and boxed with his appeal the proof which had been led before the Magistrate.

Rowan objected to the competency of the appeal, and argued,—First, No. 17.
The case was a criminal one, and the appeal, if any, was to the Justiciary Court. That course had been followed in a case nearly resembling this.¹ Nov. 7, 1891.
[This objection was, however, withdrawn after discussion.] Second, the Rowan v.
appeal, if regarded as a civil proceeding, was incompetent, for the decree Gaffney.
had been implemented. Caution had been found in implement thereof, and a litigant could not appeal against a judgment which he had implemented.²

Argued for the appellant;—The proceeding was civil, not criminal,³ and being civil, an appeal was competent unless appeal could be shewn to be expressly excluded.⁴ The appellant had been obliged to find caution to prevent his dog being destroyed, but this could not be regarded as implement implying acquiescence in the judgment so as to deprive him of his right to appeal. On the merits, the dog was shewn not to be vicious, and the complaint was groundless.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is not now seriously contended, as I understand, that the proceedings are incompetent because these proceedings are criminal in their nature. It is, however, still contended that the appeal is excluded by the fact that the appellant has been ordained to lodge sufficient caution that he will securely fasten up the dog, and that as he has found caution according to the order of the Magistrate he has thereby implemented the decree and barred himself from appealing. In answer to this contention it seems to me sufficient to say that the alleged implement upon which the contention is based is not at all what is intended by the implement of a decree in the ordinary meaning of that expression. In the first place, the appellant is ordained to find caution that he will chain up his dog, and failing his lodging such caution within twenty-four hours, the judgment grants warrant to seize and destroy his dog, or otherwise secure and safely dispose of it. Now, the only course open to him to prevent that was to find caution. But that was not implementing the decree so as to bar the appeal.

LORD YOUNG.—We must decide this case on the merits, that is, we must decide whether the proof before us warrants the judgment. I think that is unfortunate, because in this Court we are not in the habit of interfering with the action of local authorities in putting down any nuisance to the inhabitants of the place in which they have jurisdiction. But I think our entertaining this question is unavoidable. It appears to be the law that a judgment of a magistrate on a matter of this kind may be appealed to this Court with, of course, the possibility of a further appeal to the House of Lords. If the question had been open, I should have been glad to find the appeal incompetent. During the discussion a case was cited in which such an appeal was taken to the Circuit Court of Justiciary along with appeal under the Small-Debt Act. I should have thought that the more fitting tribunal. But the authorities seem to say that the appeal is competent.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

¹ Bruce v. Duncan, Oct. 13, 1848, John Shaw, 12.

² McDougall v. Gall, June 30, 1863, 1 Macph. 1012, 35 Scot. Jur. 584; McLelland v. Garson, Jan. 10, 1883, 10 R. 445.

³ Duncan v. Greig, Feb. 7, 1848, Arkley, 421; Court of Session Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict. c. 100, sec. 64-6.

⁴ Marr & Sons v. Lindsay, June 7, 1881, 8 R. 784.

No. 17. LORD TRAYNER was absent.

Nov. 7, 1891.
Rowan v.
Gaffney.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the pursuer has failed to prove the allegation of the complaint that the defender has permitted the dog libelled to go at large, and that the dog is vicious and dangerous to the lieges; therefore sustain the appeal, recall the interlocutor appealed against, and dismiss the complaint."

WYLIE, ROBERTSON, & RANKIN, W.S.—JOHN MACMILLAN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 18. CALEDONIAN INSURANCE COMPANY, Petitioners.—Ure.

ANDREW GILMOUR, Respondent.—Salvesen.

Nov. 10, 1891.
Caledonian
Insurance
Co. v. Gilmour.

Appeal to House of Lords—Leave to appeal—Interlocutory judgment.—Circumstances in which the Court refused a petition for leave to appeal to the House of Lords against an interlocutory judgment appointing a proof.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Stormonth
Darling.

(SEE previous report, July 18, 1891, 18 R. 1219.)

THIS was an action at the instance of Andrew Gilmour against the Caledonian Insurance Company for recovery of loss by fire on certain premises which were insured with the defenders. The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The present action is excluded by the clause of reference in the policy. (2) In any view, the action ought to be sisted pending the decision of the pursuer's claim by arbitration in terms of the policy. These two pleas were repelled by the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling), on 23d June 1891, and on a reclaiming note the First Division adhered, on 18th July 1891. The defenders now presented a petition for leave to appeal to the House of Lords against the interlocutory judgment then pronounced. Proof in the case had been fixed for Friday the 13th November.

The petitioners urged that the clause of reference on which they founded was in general use by insurance companies, and that it was of the utmost consequence that the judgment of the House of Lords should be obtained upon its construction. This was the only question of importance in the case, and there would obviously be no ground for appeal at a later stage. This was not a mere question of procedure, as in some previous cases where leave had been refused.¹

The respondent argued that there was no reason for departing from the ordinary rule. The case ought to be finally disposed of on a proof, and if the defenders desired they might then go to the House of Lords. The possibility of two appeals at different stages was to be avoided. The rule in such cases was stated by the Lord President and Lord Adam in Stewart v. Kennedy, Feb. 26, 1889, 16 R. 521.

LORD PRESIDENT.—If we were to have regard solely to the interests of the insurance company and to its convenience in the conduct of its business, there is probably no doubt that we ought to grant the prayer of this petition, as they would thus be enabled to have a question of great general importance finally settled. But we are bound to keep in view also the interests of the insured, who is quite unconcerned in general questions of law, and wants to get his claim settled as soon as may be. Now, it is to be observed that the petitioners have not evidenced any anxiety to save expense to the opposite party by bringing this application timeously, and before preparations for the proof had to be made. Indeed, this petition is presented to us on the eve of the proof, and does not therefore come before us favourably, where our duty is to determine upon a balance of convenience. But further, I think we should be slow to interfere with the progress of the action where we see that one result of the proof now impending may be that the defenders will be found liable in so moderate a sum, that on reflection they may consider that they have no adequate interest on this occasion to appeal to the House of Lords. I think we shall best exercise our jurisdiction to-day by refusing this petition for leave.

¹ Scottish Rights of Way and Recreation Society v. Macpherson, Nov. 16, 1886, 14 R. 74; Stewart v. Kennedy, Feb. 26, 1888, 16 R. 521.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—If leave to appeal had been asked at an earlier stage, I am disposed to think that this would have been a strong case for granting an application of this kind. But I think it would be inexpedient to interfere with the progress of the case on the eve of the proof, and when the expense of preparation must so far have been incurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—Mr Ure stated that his clients might in certain circumstances have no interest to take this case to the House of Lords after the proof. But the pursuer has a very strong interest to say that he ought to have an opportunity of having the whole case tried, the day fixed for the proof being now close at hand. If this application had been presented at an earlier date, we should have had a different question for our consideration, but as the case now stands, I think it would not be expedient to grant leave.

THE COURT refused the application, with expenses.

T. & R. B. RANKEN, W.S.—T. McNAUGHT, S.S.C.—Agents.

WILLIAM TULLY, Pursuer (Respondent).—Dickson—J. Wilson.

MRS MARY ANNE KERR OR INGRAM, Defender (Reclaimer).—

Johnston—Sym.

JAMES MACKENZIE, Defender (Reclaimer).—D.-F. Balfour—Chisholm.

Agent and Client—Negligence—Employment—Title to sue.—A person purchased a house intending that it should be a donation to his nephew, and it was arranged that the seller's agent should prepare the disposition in favour of the nephew. The purchaser informed his nephew of the purchase, that he thought it would be wise to get another agent to revise the titles, and that he proposed to employ B. The nephew having expressed himself as "agreeable" to that proposal, the uncle went to B and asked him to see that the title was properly completed. The titles were sent to B, who made no search for incumbrances. It turned out eventually that there was a bond on the property.

The nephew having been evicted from the subjects by the bondholder, raised an action of damages against the law-agent's representative. Held that, as the uncle alone had employed the law-agent, the pursuer had no title to sue.

Held, by Lord Kyllachy, that a person becoming a partner in a law-agent's business at a certain date will be liable for his partner's neglect of duty to a client in carrying through a transaction after that date, although the employment began prior to the date of the partnership.

Opinions reserved in the Inner-House.

Question, whether a claim by a purchaser of heritage who has been evicted upon a bond previously granted by the seller, against his law-agent for damages for failing to search for incumbrances is barred by his not having given notice to the law-agent upon the discovery of the bond, so as to give him an opportunity of removing the burden.

No. 18.

Nov. 10, 1891.
Caledonian
Insurance
Co. v. Gilmour.

No. 19.

Nov. 10, 1891.
Tully v.
Ingram.

No. 19. ON 13th November 1890 William Tully, farmer, Colfin, Portpatrick, raised an action against Ingram & Mackenzie, solicitors, Stranraer, James Mackenzie, sole surviving partner of that firm, and Mrs Ingram, widow and executrix of the deceased partner Alexander Ingram, for £150 as damages for the loss sustained by him through alleged professional negligence in connection with the purchase of certain house property in Portpatrick.

Nov. 10, 1891.
Tully v.
Ingram.

1st Division.
Ld. Kyllachy.

The pursuer averred that in May 1873 he purchased the subjects in question from James Rodger for the sum of £200. That "the late Alexander Ingram was instructed by the pursuer's uncle, John Paterson, Colfin, acting on behalf of the pursuer, to act as law-agent for the purchaser in the transaction, and Mr Ingram undertook the duty." That in breach of professional duty, the firm, or Ingram, notwithstanding their employment as the purchaser's law-agents, allowed the pursuer to pay the price of the subjects without obtaining a search for incumbrances, the result being that in 1889 he was evicted from his purchase at the instance of one Todd, a previous bondholder, who held a catholic security over, inter alia, the subjects of the sale.

The pursuer further averred that immediately on receiving notice of the demand for payment of the sum contained in Todd's bond he had communicated with Mackenzie, whose duty it was at once to have given notice of the threatened eviction to Ingram's executrix. That Mackenzie had failed to give such notice, but that as Mackenzie was still winding up the affairs of the firm, which had been dissolved upon Ingram's death on 18th July 1873, and as his accounts with his late partner's representative were not yet closed, notice to Mackenzie must be held to be equivalent to notice to her.

Mrs Ingram denied that her husband had been employed by the pursuer. She averred that Paterson had bought the subjects with the object of presenting them to his nephew, the pursuer, as affording a qualification for the parliamentary franchise. That Paterson had requested Ingram, who acted as Liberal agent in Stranraer, to examine the titles to see that they afforded a good qualification for a vote. That neither Paterson nor the pursuer were clients of Ingram, who made no charge against either of them, and had no communication whatever with the pursuer. She also averred that her position had been prejudiced by not receiving notice of the threatened eviction. If she had received such notice, she might have purged the incumbrance or removed the defect.

Mackenzie averred that Paterson was the purchaser, and that Ingram's connection with the latter was purely a personal matter between himself and Paterson. That he (Mackenzie) entered into partnership with Ingram as at 1st July 1873, but the partnership was not declared to the public till six months thereafter. He came to Stranraer on 14th July 1873, and previous to that had no knowledge whatever of Ingram's business, and had nothing to do with the pursuer in connection with the transaction. That under a clause of the contract of copartnership between him and Ingram the latter was entitled to render personal services to any client free of charge, and that any services rendered in connection with the transaction in question were outwith the partnership affairs.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer having suffered loss to the extent sued for, in consequence of the negligence and breach of duty of the defenders, or one or other of them, is entitled to decree, in terms of one or other of the conclusions of the summons.

Mrs Ingram pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's averments are not relevant or sufficient to support the conclusions of the summons against this defender (2) The deceased Mr Ingram not having been employed by the pursuer the pursuer has no title to sue. (4) The deceased Mr Ingram having only undertaken, as political agent, at the request of Mr Paterson, to see that the conveyance in the pursuer's favour afforded a good qualification for a vote, and to see the pursuer registered as an elector, and having fulfilled all that he so undertook, this defender ought to be assolizied. (6) The pursuer is personally barred, in respect that by his failure to give this defender notice of the threatened eviction, he has prejudiced her position as condescended on. No. 19.

Nov. 10, 1891.
Tully v. Ingram.

Mackenzie pleaded;—(1) The averments of the pursuer are irrelevant, and are not sufficient to support the conclusions of the summons against the defender, Mackenzie. (2) This defender not having been a partner of the late Mr Ingram at the date of the transaction referred to, is in no way liable in connection therewith. (3) Separatim, Such services as the late Mr Ingram may have rendered in connection with the said transaction were outwith the partnership affairs, and this defender is in no way liable in connection therewith. (4) Separatim, The deceased Mr Ingram having, at the request of Mr Paterson, gratuitously agreed to see whether the disposition in favour of the pursuer, which had been already signed, was correct in form, and having fulfilled all that he so agreed to do, this defender ought to be assolizied.

A proof was allowed, from which the following facts appeared. The property was purchased from a Mr Rodger by Paterson. It was then arranged between them that the seller's agent, Mr Adair, should prepare the conveyance in name of his nephew, the pursuer. Thereafter, in consequence of a call by Paterson upon Ingram, the latter wrote "please send me for revisal draft disposition by James Rodger to William Tully of house in Portpatrick." Adair replied that Paterson not having said anything about its being revised by another agent it had been completed, but he sent the completed deed. After some correspondence as to the title the transaction was settled in Ingram's office on 18th July 1873. Ingram, who retained the titles in his office, died on 15th June 1875. The question as to whether he had been employed in the matter by the pursuer or by Paterson came to depend principally upon the evidence (the material parts of which are given below) of these two persons.* The Court

* The pursuer deponed,—“I am a farmer at Colfin with my uncle, Mr Paterson. For some years before 1873 I was working with him on the farm. I lived in family with him, and got no wages. My uncle was not married at that time. He has married since, but has got no family. I remember him telling me in 1873 that he had bought the two houses in question in Main Street, Portpatrick, belonging to James Rodger, for me, and that he was going to have the title-deeds or disposition made out in my name. He also said that he would go to Mr Ingram and ask him to see that the title-deeds were correct. I was quite agreeable to what he proposed, and said so to him. I said I thought it was all right, and that he could not get a better man than Ingram. Mr Ingram was known as a highly respectable agent in Stranraer. My uncle afterwards told me that he had been to Mr Ingram. I was not present when the price was paid. . . . The property was not purchased with the view of getting me a vote.”

Mr Paterson deponed,—“Shortly after making the purchase I told Mr Tully about it. I told him the price I had paid, and that I had bought the property for him. I also said that Mr Rodger was to pay for the transfer, and that he was to get whoever he liked to prepare it, and that I thought it would be wise to get Mr Ingram to revise the title-deeds, and see that they were properly executed. I did not say anything more to him. We afterwards went to see Mr Ingram. . . . I knew Mr Ingram, and had known him for a considerable time. When I called for him after the purchase I told him I had bought the property from Mr Rodger for Mr Tully, and that Mr Adair was to make the

No. 19.
Nov. 10, 1891.
Tully v.
Ingram.

were ultimately of opinion that it was proved that Ingram had been employed in the transaction solely by Paterson, who was making a present of the subjects to the pursuer, and who alone negotiated with Ingram in the matter. It was further proved that Mackenzie became Ingram's partner on 1st July 1873, but did not enter upon his duties till 14th July. It was a part of the agreement of partnership that for the first six months the partnership should not be disclosed. By clause four of the agreement Ingram was at liberty to render personal services to any client free of charge. Mackenzie in his evidence deponed that none of the price passed through Ingram's hands as far as he knew, that he knew nothing of the transaction till 1889 when the eviction took place, and that he did not intimate the eviction to Ingram's widow because he thought Adair was agent in the transaction.

On 15th July 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds the defenders, Mrs Ingram and James Mackenzie, liable, conjunctly and severally, to the pursuer in the sum of £150 in name of damages, the pursuer being, however, bound, as a condition of payment, to grant to the defenders an assignation of his whole right and interest in the surplus price of the property mentioned in condescendence 8, and being also bound to make payment to the defenders of the business charges due to the late firm of Ingram & Mackenzie in connection with the transaction libelled: Appoints the defenders to lodge in process the draft of such an assignation as they propose, and also their account of the business charges aforesaid."*

transfer, and he (Mr Ingram) was to get the title-deeds and see that they were properly executed. Mr Ingram said he would, and that he would have a search made. Mr Ingram was to act for Mr Tully. That was stated."

In cross-examination Paterson deponed,—“I had some communication with Mr Tully about going to Mr Ingram, but I do not think Mr Tully went with me the first time. I told him, I think, that Mr Ingram would be the proper person to revise the title-deeds, and Mr Tully approved of it, and said he could not get a better man to do it. He did not ask me to go to Mr Ingram. I think I said to him I was thinking about asking Ingram to look over the papers, and he approved of that. I had not told Adair that I was going to Mr Ingram. Mr Ingram never rendered any account against me in connection with the matter. He said it was a small matter, and the charge would be very trifling, and I said for him to make out his account in the regular way for his work. I never spoke to him again about the account. . . . (Q.) Did you not tell Mr Mackenzie that Ingram had said in 1873, when you bought the property, that, the matter being a political one, he would make no charge against you and Mr Tully? (A.) Yes, I told him that Mr Ingram had said he was political agent, and that it would not cost much. I said,—‘Make out your charge in the regular way, for there is nothing political in it.’ That is what I told Mackenzie. (Q.) Is it not the case that no charge was made just because of what Mr Ingram said, that it being a political matter there would be no charge? (A.) I do not know what his intention was. I never understood that that was the reason of no charge being made; I thought if I was getting the title-deeds I would get the charge along with them.”

* “OPINION.— . . . The firm of Ingram & Mackenzie consisted of the late Mr Alexander Ingram, who died in 1875, and Mr James Mackenzie, who still survives. The present action is directed against the dissolved firm and Mrs Ingram (Mr Ingram's executrix, and Mr Mackenzie as now representing the firm); and the questions I have now to decide are, I think, these:—(1) Was Mr Ingram, who carried through the transaction, employed by or on behalf of the pursuer, and did he fail in his duty as a law-agent? (2) Was the transaction a firm transaction, so as to affect Mr Mackenzie, who took no personal charge of it, and was not known at the time to be a partner of the firm? (3) Has the pursuer's claim to redress been affected, at least as regards Mrs Ingram, by his (the pursuer's) failure to give notice to her personally of the proceedings under which he was evicted from the property?

Mrs Ingram reclaimed, and argued;—In order to succeed the pursuer must shew that he employed Ingram to carry out the transaction in ques- No. 19.

Nov. 10, 1891.
Tully v.
Ingram.

"I confess I do not think there is much doubt as to the employment. It was maintained for the defence that the true employer was the pursuer's uncle, who, it appears, was making the pursuer a present of the property, and who certainly carried through the transaction, including all communications with Mr Ingram. But if I am to believe their evidence—and I see no reason to doubt it—the uncle and nephew, before the transaction was settled, agreed that Mr Ingram should be employed 'to revise the titles,' and that it was in pursuance of this agreement that Mr Paterson, the uncle, went to Mr Ingram and put the matter into his hands. This, I think, established a sufficient privity of contract as between the pursuer and Mr Ingram or his firm.

"Neither do I see much room to doubt that Mr Ingram failed in his duty in omitting to require or procure a search for incumbrances. Indeed, it was not disputed that that must be so, unless it could be shewn that he (Mr Ingram) was employed on some exceptional footing. But the defenders suggest that the employment was exceptional in this respect. They say that Mr Paterson's object was to give the pursuer a vote in the county—that he went to Mr Ingram simply as Liberal agent, so as to make sure that the vote would be good, and that Mr Ingram accordingly, while agreeing to see to the title, made no charge, and undertook no responsibility.

"I have not, however, been able to hold that this is proved. The circumstances no doubt give the suggestion a certain probability, and it is no doubt the fact that Mr Ingram, although he lived two years afterwards, rendered no account for his trouble, and indeed no such account has even yet been rendered, either to the pursuer or his uncle. But, on the other hand, everything, including the correspondence with the seller's agent, was conducted in the usual manner. The seller's agent, who it was at first intended should act for both parties, was on Mr Ingram's employment superseded, and of course relieved of responsibility. The various attendances in connection with the transaction were entered in the books of Mr Ingram and Ingram & Mackenzie, and although no account was rendered, the materials existed for rendering it as in other cases. Moreover, the pursuer's uncle is quite emphatic to the effect that although Mr Ingram proposed to treat the matter as political, and to charge only a trifle, he (Paterson) intimated distinctly that he wished the matter to be treated as an ordinary piece of business, to be charged for in the regular way.

"I may add that, even if it had been proved that the employment was gratuitous, that would not, in my opinion, have foreclosed the question as to Mr Ingram's responsibility. I doubt much whether, when a law-agent undertakes, either gratuitously or otherwise, the protection of a client's interests in such a matter, he can escape the responsibility for professional negligence, except upon clear proof of an agreement to that effect.

"The position of Mr Mackenzie is, however, peculiar, and it is with considerable hesitation that I have come to hold him liable. He became a partner of Mr Ingram as from 1st July 1873, but he did not enter on his duties until 14th July, and it was part of the agreement of partnership that for the first six months the partnership should not be disclosed. Accordingly, on 18th July, when the transaction now in question was settled in Mr Ingram's office, Mr Mackenzie had been only three days in the place, and was not known to the pursuer or to Mr Paterson as having any interest or responsibility in the matter. Moreover, it was part of the agreement of partnership that Mr Ingram should be at liberty, notwithstanding the partnership, to render personal services to any client free of charge. If therefore there had been sufficient evidence that the transaction in question was one of that character, there would probably be little doubt that (the partnership being still latent) Mr Mackenzie would have been free.

"But, as I have already said, I do not think it is proved that Mr Ingram

No. 19.
 Nov. 10, 1891.
 Tully v.
 Ingram.

tion. Now its history, as disclosed by the proof was this,—Paterson bought the subjects, and employed Adair as his law-agent to prepare a conveyance to the pursuer. When he announced his intention to the latter, he at the same time suggested sending the titles to Ingram to be revised by him with a view to their affording a good franchise qualification, and to this the pursuer assented. In short, Paterson assumed the position of a donor, employing in the donee's interest an agent (whom he expected to charge for his services in the ordinary way) to revise the titles embodying the gift, and from first to last Paterson alone was in direct communication in the matter with Ingram. There was then no privity of contract between the pursuer and Ingram, and he was not entitled to sue this action.¹ But assuming that the pursuer had proved employment of Ingram, he was personally barred from insisting in this claim by his failure to give this defender notice of the threatened eviction. This she was in law entitled to have had, in order that she might have had the opportunity of purging the incumbrance or removing the defect.² It was vain to say that notice to Mackenzie was notice to her, for at the time of the alleged fault he was not, so far as the pursuer knew, a partner of the firm, and when notice of the eviction was given to him, the partnership had been dissolved fifteen years.

The defender Mackenzie adopted the argument of Mrs Ingram, to the effect that the pursuer had failed to prove employment of Ingram, and further argued;—Assuming the employment proved, that could not affect Mackenzie. Ingram was employed as an individual before there was any partnership at all. It was a locatio conductio operarum, and he could not delegate his duties to Mackenzie, or anyone else with whom he might subsequently agree to share profits. There was delectus personæ of him as a man of skill. Further, the alleged negligence occurred before the partnership began. The stage of the proceedings at which the search for incumbrances fell to be made was past before the commencement of the partnership on 1st July. When Mackenzie joined Ingram in partnership, he was entitled to assume that the business had been regularly and diligently done up to that stage. In any case, there was a private and gratuitous service rendered by Ingram to a client of his own, and under agreed to act in the transaction gratuitously or on exceptional terms, and therefore the question just seems to be whether there is anything which can displace the fact that Mr Mackenzie was a partner of the firm, sharing its profits and also its losses, at the date of the settlement, and for some eighteen days previously. I confess I have not been able to find anything, and therefore I do not see how, if Mr Ingram was liable, Mr Mackenzie can escape.

“It remains to consider as to notice, and on this matter I heard a good deal of argument. I am, however, satisfied that the pursuer's claim to redress has not been barred by any omission on this head. It may be that when a law-agent has failed to see that his client gets a good and unincumbered title, and the client is subsequently threatened with eviction, it is the client's duty to give the law-agent notice, so that, if so advised, he may purge the incumbrance or remove the defect. But, assuming that this is matter of obligation, I think the pursuer here was entitled to assume that Mr Mackenzie, the surviving partner of the dissolved firm, represented the firm for purposes of winding-up. And accordingly as notice was unquestionably given to Mr Mackenzie, I am, on the whole, of opinion that Mrs Ingram and Mr Mackenzie are conjunctly and severally liable. . . .”

¹ Robertson v. Fleming, May 30, 1861, 4 Macq. 167, 33 Scot. Jur. 591.

² Campbell v. Clason, Dec. 20, 1838, 1 D. 270, per Lord Mackenzie, p. 278, 11 Scot. Jur. 196; Erskine Inst. iii. 1, 14; Liquidators of City of Glasgow Bank v. Mackinnon, Dec. 23, 1881, 9 R. 535.

the 5th article of the copartnership it was outwith the partnership business. No. 19.

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) Adair, the seller's agent, had at first acted as law-agent for the parties in the transaction. Before, however, the transaction was settled, the pursuer and his uncle agreed that Ingram should be employed to revise the titles, and it was in pursuance of this agreement that Paterson went upon the pursuer's behalf and employment and placed the matter in Ingram's hands. That established sufficient privity of contract between the pursuer and Ingram, and entitled the former to sue this action.¹ (2) At the date of the settlement Mackenzie had been assumed as a partner of the firm, and therefore at that date he became a partner in the firm's negligence, and that even although he was ignorant of his partner's negligence. Even assuming that he was not to appear to all the world as a partner in the firm for six months after 1st July 1873, he was just in the position of an undisclosed principal, and was therefore bound by Ingram's negligence.² Again, assuming that Ingram was by the terms of the partnership entitled to act gratuitously for any client, that did not exonerate the firm.³ In these circumstances, notice to Mackenzie of the threatened eviction must be held to be notice to Mrs Ingram. The pursuer was entitled to assume that Mackenzie, the surviving partner of the dissolved firm, represented the firm for the purposes of winding-up.

Nov. 10, 1891.
Tully v.
Ingram.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—Various questions have been raised in this case, and some of them of great importance, but I have come to be of opinion that the case admits of decision upon one ground in fact.

The liability sought to be established is the liability of a law-agent, and that liability must arise out of a contract of employment. Now, the first question is, who is the person who employed the law-agent, and from whom did the law-agent accept the employment? On that question of fact we stand certainly at this disadvantage that we are deprived by the force of events of the evidence of Mr Ingram, the gentleman said to have been employed, and we must therefore make the best we can of the existing sources of evidence, having regard, however, to that regrettable deficiency.

When one looks at the facts of the case one is struck with this—prima facie, Paterson, and not Tully, was here the employer. He bought the house, he paid for the house; he, and he alone, personally directed and dealt with Mr Ingram. Accordingly, it is necessary, in order to the establishment of any privity of contract on the part of the pursuer of this action, that he should make out that that prima facie view does not represent the substance and ultimate truth of this transaction. I have come to the opinion that he has failed to make out that he stood to the late Mr Ingram in the relation of employer at all.

It is important to observe the ground upon which the Lord Ordinary has come to the conclusion that Mr Tully has a right to sue this action by reason of his being the employer. He says this,—“It was maintained for the defence that the true employer was the pursuer's uncle, who, it appears, was making the pur-

¹ Webster v. Young, Feb. 20, 1851, 13 D. 752, 23 Scot. Jur. 330.

² Bell's Pr. secs. 359, 224A; Lindley on Partnership, pp. 205, 208, 275, and 276.

³ Currie v. Colquhoun, June 17, 1823, 2 S. 407.

No. 19.

Nov. 10, 1891.
Tully v.
Ingram.

suer a present of the property, and who certainly carried through the transaction, including all communications with Mr Ingram. But if I am to believe their evidence—and I see no reason to doubt it—the uncle and nephew, before the transaction was settled, agreed that Mr Ingram should be employed to ‘revise the titles,’ and that it was in pursuance of this agreement that Mr Paterson, the uncle, went to Mr Ingram and put the matter into his hands. This, I think, established a privity of contract as between the pursuer and Mr Ingram or his firm.” Now, it appears to me that the words in this passage of the Lord Ordinary’s judgment, upon which its whole vitality depends, are the words “agreed” and “agreement.” But I confess I think that an analysis of the evidence shews that that is an over-statement of what passed between the uncle and nephew respectively. If these words “agreed” and “agreement” mean anything which is to give effect to the pursuer’s case, he must make out that that agreement was that Paterson should go and employ Ingram on the instructions of Tully.

Now, this important fact is to be observed as regards the evidence. Unquestionably the man whose evidence one looks to as a primary source of information in this case is Tully himself; and I do not find that Tully in his evidence gives any account of the proceedings which can found the view which the Lord Ordinary states. It is not unimportant to observe that in making the conjecture that the motive of Paterson in giving this house to Tully was out of regard for services which had been rendered to Paterson during a course of years on his farm, Tully does not say in one word, or in any form of words, that there was any arrangement or agreement come to that he should receive remuneration either in the form of a house or in the form of money. He says, on the contrary, that the first knowledge he had of the benevolent intentions of his uncle was when his uncle told him that he had bought the house in question. “I remember him,” he says, “telling me in 1873 that he had bought the two houses in question in Main Street, Portpatrick, belonging to James Rodger, for me, and that he was going to have the title-deeds or disposition made out in my name.” Now, I pause to observe upon that sentence that it seems to negative the idea of there having been any antecedent right, as a result of an agreement, in Tully to get the house or a disposition of the house. This sentence as it stands undoubtedly contains the view that Paterson intimated his intention of carrying through the titles, “and that he was going to have the title-deeds or disposition made out in my name,” as if all that was to be done at the hands of the uncle and not of the nephew.

Now, then, what is said in the evidence of Tully as regards employment? If the case of the pursuer were well founded, one would expect that the uncle would from this moment drop out of the proceedings except as an intermediary between the nephew and the agent. But so far from that being the case, the evidence proceeds in the same strain, the nephew telling what the uncle told him, and the nephew merely assenting to what he was told. He says,—“He also said that he would go to Mr Ingram and ask him to see that the title-deeds were correct. I was quite agreeable to what he proposed, and said so to him. I said I thought it was all right, and that he could not get a better man than Ingram.” Now, it seems to me that taking that evidence the proper word to express the attitude of Tully to the proceedings of Paterson is rather the passive word “assented” or “acquiesced” than “agreed.” There is certainly nothing in the circumstances to impose any duty upon Paterson to act on behalf of Tully. Paterson seems merely, from a benevolent intention actually carried out, to have informed his nephew of what was in the course of being done, and the nephew seems to have assented to all his uncle's proceedings. He entirely assents to the employment of Ingram. No. 19.

Nov. 10, 1891.
Tully v. Ingram.

Now, that being the evidence of Tully, is there anything in Paterson's statement which gainsays that view? I confess I find nothing at all. It is true that the evidence is permeated by the idea—quite a natural one to be in Paterson's head—of the joint interest of donor and donee in the completion of the title; but I cannot find anything either in what he says or in what Tully says to shew that Tully stepped forward to assist, and either gave himself his consent or required his consent to be given in order to Paterson going on with the transaction. When we turn to the facts of the case that is entirely borne out by the sequel, because Paterson, and Paterson alone, saw Ingram and dealt with him in the sequel as he undoubtedly did at the moment of the first employment.

Well, then, what is there from the side of Mr Ingram? To a great extent the evidence is a blank. But there is no fact which could be appealed to,—no act of Mr Ingram's which could be appealed to on the part of the pursuer to substantiate or even countenance the idea that Mr Ingram took Tully to be his employer, or took anyone else but Paterson to be his employer—the one with whom he dealt, and—it is not unimportant, so far as the evidence goes—the only one of whom he had any personal acquaintance. As I have said, we must not merely implicitly take every word which is stated by the pursuer and his uncle in this case, but we must test the language employed, which sometimes is vague and intricate, by surrounding facts. And I think in what I have said that I have shewn your Lordships that we do not require to do more than to take implicitly, and even literally, every word Tully says in order to shew that he stood entirely extraneous to the relation between Paterson and Ingram, except in the sense that he was ultimately to be presented with the disposition, which was the result of his uncle's employment of Ingram.

Now, if that be the result of an analysis of the evidence, then I confess I think that the pursuer is entirely out of Court. He has not made good to us the only proposition of law which would have helped him in that state of the facts, and that is, that if an agent is employed by A to draw a disposition of a house in favour of B, that that gives B a right of action against the agent in case of any miscarriage of the contents. I do not think that any proposition in law short of that would serve the pursuer in the emergency in which he is placed owing to the state of the evidence; and I think that proposition is one which we cannot sustain.

Now, that affords a complete ground of judgment, because it deprives the pursuer of this action of any title to sue. In arriving at my judgment, which is in favour of both defenders, I am content to take that ground alone. It goes to the root of the case of the pursuer as against Mrs Ingram and Mr Mackenzie.

But I do not think it would be right to conclude without observing that even if this part of the case were to be made good by the pursuer, and even if he could make out that he was the employer, he would still have serious difficulties to encounter.

The Dean of Faculty and Mr Chisholm, on behalf of Mr Mackenzie, have presented a most formidable argument, resting upon no contract of employment

No. 19.
Nov. 10, 1891.
Tully v.
Ingram.

between Mackenzie and Paterson, and to the effect that the new firm did not then exist; and it is contended that inasmuch as Paterson—or for that matter either Paterson or Tully—employed Ingram before ever Mackenzie was a partner, it was impossible for Ingram to delegate that employment or to give any right to the subsequently assumed partner which could affect any previous employer; and that the reason which supports that conclusion would avail as a defence to the subsequently assumed partner against any claim of liability on the part of the employer, which I mention merely for the purpose of saying—although I do not express my opinion upon it—that I think it is clearly formidable to the pursuer.

Another point was taken on behalf of Mrs Ingram. She is concerned to shew now that she received no notice at the time when this burden was found to affect the property. She says, with certainly a measure of support in authority, that when a burden is found to affect a property which it was the duty of an agent to have discovered, it falls to the client to give notice to the agent or to his representatives that this burden has been found to affect the property so that it may be cleared off or taken out of the way. The agent has a manifest interest to have early notice of that, because he might be able to point out defects in the burden, or for that matter he might then and there clear the property of the burden and take it over himself. The fact here suggested was that Mrs Ingram did not receive such notice, unless the notice to Mr Mackenzie was to be held as notice to her. I think that upon that point Mrs Ingram has a very formidable argument in law. As I have said, I refer to that merely as indicating that while I propose to your Lordships that our judgment should be in favour of the defenders upon the single ground to which I have adverted, I am by no means otherwise than much alive to the gravities and difficulties of the pursuer's case which he would have to encounter if your Lordships were to agree with the Lord Ordinary on that point. I am therefore for recalling the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and assoilzieing the defenders.

LORD ADAM.—This action is brought by the pursuer against the surviving partner of the firm of Ingram & Mackenzie, and also against the widow of the late Mr Ingram, as in his right, to have it found that Mr Ingram was guilty of negligence in the discharge of the duty which he had undertaken to the pursuer connected with the purchase of a small property in Portpatrick, in so far as he failed to obtain searches, the result of which was that that property was evicted from the pursuer.

I concur with your Lordship in the ground of judgment your Lordship proposes. It is to my mind very clear and satisfactory that we can proceed upon it, because I am also agreed with your Lordship that the questions which remain behind are of great importance, and if we had to consider them—which I do not think we require to do in the view which your Lordship takes of this case—we should have had to take much more time for their consideration.

I agree with your Lordship that there is no evidence here that the pursuer ever employed the late Mr Ingram to do the work in the performance of which Mr Ingram is said to have been negligent; and without proof of that employment it is impossible that the pursuer can succeed. Of course I do not mean to say that it requires to be proved that the pursuer personally employed Mr Ingram. That can be done through an agent or a person having authority from the pursuer personally ; and there may be cases in which it may be held that a party has undertaken to act as an agent for another without personally communicating with him. But in my view of the evidence and the facts of this case, I think it is free from any such construction.

No. 19.

Nov. 10, 1891.

Tully v.

Ingram.

Now, my view of the truth of this case is just exactly that which Mr Tully, the pursuer, himself states at the beginning of his evidence—[His Lordship here read the passage in the pursuer's evidence, quoted supra.] I think that the pursuer has no good ground of action against the defenders after all that we know of the facts and of the real evidence in this case.

What does this evidence disclose ? It seems to me to disclose very clearly that there was a benevolent intention on the part of the uncle to make a free gift of this property to his nephew. As your Lordship pointed out, he bought the property before Tully knew anything about it. He only went to Tully after that and informed him of his benevolent intention, but so far as I can see, until this disposition was obtained and delivered over to Tully, Tully had no title to the subjects at all. To my mind it was the uncle's transaction from the beginning, until he obtained the disposition from the seller and handed it over to Tully.

Now, what would a proposed donee do in such circumstances except what took place in this case ? The pursuer says his uncle told him,—“ I am going to give you this property.” Then he says,—“ It was he that was going to get the disposition.” His uncle says,—“ I think of going to employ Mr Ingram to see that it is all right.” What does the nephew say ? All he says is,—“ I think it is a very good idea.” The word used by him which the Lord Ordinary has interpreted as “ agreed ” is not “ agreed.” He says,—“ I am quite agreeable.” That is the only agreement that ever took place between uncle and nephew. When the uncle proposed to employ Mr Ingram the nephew said,—“ I think he is a very good man, I am agreeable.” Is there any agreement in that ? I think if the Lord Ordinary in his note had said that the pursuer “ was agreeable ” that Mr Ingram should be employed, he would have expressed the truth of the case, but he would have shewn at the same time that the ground upon which he proceeded was unfounded in fact. I think that if we take the pursuer's own evidence to be true—and I think it is true—it puts the pursuer out of Court, for where is there any indication of action or employment by the pursuer of Mr Ingram ? The pursuer is a mere passive instrument in the hands of his uncle. His uncle might, before delivering the disposition to him, have changed his mind. If he had changed his mind and had never made over the property to the nephew, would Mr Ingram have had an action upon such a statement as that against the pursuer Tully for payment of his account connected with this transaction ? I do not see a vestige of ground for that at all. Mr Tully's answer would be,—“ You were employed by Mr Paterson, my uncle ; I had nothing to do with it.”

That brings us to the principle which is to be applied in determining this case, and it is the same which prevailed in the case of Robertson v. Fleming, 4 Macq. 167, to which we were referred, because undoubtedly here in one sense Mr Ingram was employed by Mr Paterson for behoof of the nephew,—as it turned out. But we see from that case that the fact that A has employed B to do something for the benefit of C, does not confer on C a right of action against B for any loss which he may have sustained through B's negligence, and for the plain reason that there is no privity of contract between B and C. That is exactly what

No. 19. this case comes to. There is employment by Paterson of Ingram, as Paterson wished to have the benefit of Ingram's services. But these are just the elements which occurred in the case of Fleming, and the House of Lords laid it down distinctly that in such a case as that there is no claim for neglect of duty or negligence by the party who suffers against the person who actually committed the delict, because there is no direct employment of the latter by the former. I think that the facts of the present case supply quite a sufficient ground for its decision.

Nov. 10, 1891.
Tully v.
Ingram.

LORD M'LAREN.—The question argued in this case is by no means one of novelty in our law, because in more than one case the question has been agitated—to what extent a person taking benefit under a deed may have a right of action against the agent who prepared the deed in respect of some blunder in the title, or that less has been secured by the deed than the grantor intended? The criterion of liability as laid down by, I think, all the noble Lords who took part in the decision of Robertson v. Fleming was this, that in order that a person taking a benefit should have a right of action founded on professional negligence he must be able to shew that the agent was employed by him or with his authority. The Lord Ordinary on this subject appears to me to have taken apparently the correct view of the question involved when he puts the question, Was Mr Ingram, who carried through the transaction, employed by or on behalf of the pursuer? And, Did he fail in his duty as a law-agent? But then his Lordship goes on to affirm that the circumstances establish a sufficient privity of contract.

I agree with your Lordship that we should not be warranted in accepting that view of the facts of the case after the fuller discussion and exposition of these points that we have heard. I think it is natural in such cases to consider first what would be the professional usage or the natural course of the transaction as between man and man. When two persons are entering into a commercial agreement, or an agreement by which some benefit is exchanged against another, then the ordinary course of business is that the agent of the one party draws the deed and the agent of the other revises it, so that each person should have the benefit of professional assistance directed towards his own interest exclusively. But, on the contrary, if a person is going to make a gift to a relative or friend it is not in accordance with the ordinary practice, nor would it occur to one as a natural and reasonable measure, that there should be two agents employed, or that anyone should act at all as professional adviser of the recipient of the benefit. In such a case the person making the gift employs his agent to prepare the deed of gift, as in the case of a testator who employs his own agent to make his will, and never thinks of communicating with or intimating his intention to his legatees. If a father makes a settlement on his daughter in the event of her marriage, supposing that it is not to be put into her contract with her husband but to benefit the daughter, her father would never think of asking her to name an agent in the preparation of a deed. Or supposing the father to give instructions to an agent, would the agent ever imagine that he had a claim against the daughter because the father had told her of his intentions?

I am putting here illustrations which of course admit of being only answered in one way, but they are really not very remote from the case in hand, because I see no evidence here of any communication between Paterson and his nephew on the subject of agency which would be different from what would take place between a father and his son or daughter when making a gift. Paterson told Tully of his intention, and mentioned that it would be necessary to have the titles revised by Mr Ingram, and Mr Tully assented to this. But in order to make an agent responsible, it is not enough that as between the donor and the donee there should be an assent to employment. It is necessary to shew that he was actually employed on the authority of the donee. On that point I agree with your Lordship that the case has entirely failed, and I therefore am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and the defenders assoilzied from the conclusions of the action.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the action.

SMITH & MASON, S.S.C.—PETER ADAIR, S.S.C.—D. MILNE, S.S.C.—Agents.

WILLIAM DEN (Inspector of Poor for Parish of Meldrum), Pursuer (Respondent).—Comrie Thomson—Cooper. No. 19.

JOHN DUNLOP LUMSDEN, Defender (Appellant).—Salvesen—Gloag. Nov. 10, 1891.
Den v. Lumsden.

Poor—Right of parochial board to decree against father for future aliment of illegitimate children.—In an action by a parochial board against the father of two illegitimate children, who had been deserted by their mother, for payment of a sum already expended by the board on the children's aliment, and for payment of aliment at a specified rate until the children should respectively attain the age of fourteen, or should cease to be a charge on the board, the Court, while granting decree against the father for the amount already expended, refused to grant decree for future aliment.

In January 1891 William Den, Inspector of Poor of the parish of Meldrum, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeen against John Dunlop Lumsden, for payment of sums in name of aliment of two illegitimate children who had been deserted by their mother, and had become a charge on the parochial board, and of whom the defender ultimately admitted the paternity.

The prayer of the petition, as amended in the Court of Session, was in these terms:—"To ordain the defender to pay to the pursuer the sum of (first) £1, 5s. 9d., being the amount expended by the pursuer as Inspector of Poor of the parish of Meldrum, in alimentering John Dunlop Lumsden and George Addison Lumsden, the children of the defender, from the 20th December 1890 till the date of this action, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum on the said sum from the date hereof till payment; further, to ordain the defender to pay to the pursuer the sum of (second) five shillings weekly for each of the said John Dunlop Lumsden and George Addison Lumsden until they shall respectively attain the age of fourteen or cease to be a charge on the pursuer as inspector foresaid, the first payment of 5s. for each of the said John Dunlop Lumsden and George Addison Lumsden to be made seven days after the date hereof, with interest on each sum of 5s. from the date when it shall become due till paid, and with expenses, and to grant warrant to arrest on the dependence."

After a variety of procedure the Sheriff-substitute (Brown), on 16th June 1891, granted decree both for the sums already expended and for future aliment.

The defender appealed, and argued;—A parochial board was only

No. 20.

Nov. 10, 1891.
Den v. Lumsden.

entitled to recover sums actually expended by them, and was not entitled to decree for a continuing payment such as was asked for here.¹ The pursuer argued that it was competent to grant a continuing decree for payment of aliment.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—The case as it now stands is in this position, that the defender has admitted the paternity of the children named in the prayer of the petition, and has also admitted that expenses to the amount of £1, 5s. 9d. have been incurred by the pursuer in maintaining them.

The case, however, involves another question, a difficulty arising from the position adopted by the pursuer in claiming decree in the form set out in the prayer of the petition, even as amended. I am of opinion that we should not grant a decree for future aliment at a specific rate, if the circumstances of the parents continue such as to make it applicable. The prayer of the petition contains elements of a hypothetical nature, which, in my view, make it not a proper subject for a decree, and there is no authority for granting a decree in such terms. The duty of a parochial board to give relief arises only as circumstances occur to give rise to it. They have no standing relation to the objects of relief which entitles them to assume that they will have a continuing duty to aliment them, and it will depend, as has been indicated, on the circumstances of the two parents whether they will have a right to claim relief from one or both of them.

I propose, therefore, that we should confine our decree to the sum of £1, 5s. 9d. already expended, with interest thereon from the date of the action, and that we should refuse the rest of the prayer of the petition.

LORD ADAM.—I concur. It appears to me that the pursuer has forgotten the true nature of his claim—that it is a claim for relief against those who are liable for the maintenance of the children. Being an action of relief, it follows that the expenses must have been incurred before the action is brought, and it equally follows that no continuing decree for the amount which may in the future be expended in aliment can be granted. I agree that the only competent conclusion is the first—that is to say, for payment of the expenses already incurred.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—" Allow the amendments," &c. : " Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute : Find that by minute No. 5 of pro. the appellant has admitted the paternity of the children named on record : Find that it is admitted that at the date of the action the sum of £1, 5s. 9d. had been expended by the pursuer on the aliment of the said children, and that the appellant is liable therefor : Decern against him for said sum with interest," &c.

HENRY & SCOTT, W.S.—RONALD & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

¹ Duncan v. Forbes, Feb. 8, 1878, 15 S. L. R. 371; Gillies v. M'Dougall, &c., Guthrie's Sheriff Court Cases, 27.

² Anderson v. Heritors and Kirk-Session of Lauder, March 11, 1848, 10 P. 960, 20 Scot. Jur. 332; Kirk-Session of Wigtown v. Dalziel, Feb. 6, 1795, Hume's Dec. 453.

TIMOTHY GALLAGHER, Pursuer (Appellant).—Salvesen.
ALEXANDER PATTISON, Defender (Respondent).—Ure.

No. 21.

Nov. 10, 1891.
 Gallagher v.
 Pattison.

Process—Appeal—Amendment of record—Expenses.—In an appeal from the Sheriff Court for jury trial in an action at the instance of Timothy Gallagher, a cab-driver, against his employer, a carriage-hirer in Dunoon, named Alexander Pattison, for personal injuries sustained by the pursuer when engaged in driving one of the defender's carriages in Dunoon, the Court were prepared to find the averments irrelevant, and to dismiss the action, and the pursuer was allowed to amend his record only upon payment of the expenses in the cause from the date of closing the record.¹

1ST DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Renfrewshire.

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—MORTON, SMART, & MACDONALD, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN SLEIGH AND OTHERS (Governors of the Strichen Endowments), Pursuers and Real Raisers (Respondents).—*Cook.

No. 22.

Nov. 13, 1891.
 Governors of Strichen
 Endowments
 v. Diverall.

MRS BARBARA GORDON OR DIVERALL AND OTHERS, Claimants (Appellants).—*Morison.

Process—Multiplepointing—Appeal—Whole subject-matter of the competition—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100), sec. 53.—In a multiplepointing in the Sheriff Court one of the claimants was found entitled to be ranked on the fund in medio, but no operative decree was pronounced. Effect was also given to an extrajudicial arrangement in regard to expenses. An appeal to the Court of Session held incompetent, in respect that "no final judgment" in terms of the 53d section of the Court of Session Act, 1868,* had been pronounced, notwithstanding that the respondent desired to waive any objection to competency.

A MULTIPLEPOINTING was brought in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeenshire regarding the right to a sum of £250, part of the estate of the deceased Mrs Innes under her deed of settlement, dated in 1881. There were several claimants.

1ST DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Aberdeenshire.

On 1st August 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Grierson) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, under reference to the annexed note, that the pursuers and real raisers are entitled to be ranked on the free fund in medio to the extent of the said free fund, in terms of their claim: Quoad ultra continues the cause."

This interlocutor was appealed to the Sheriff.

On 13th October following the parties to the action lodged a joint minute, in which they "concurred in stating that they were agreed, in order to curtail the expense of litigation, and enable the parties to obtain ¹ Morgan, Gellibrand, and Co. v. Dundee Gem Line Steam Shipping Co., Dec. 9, 1890, 18 R. 205.

* The Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 53, enacts,—“It shall be held that the whole cause has been decided in the Outer-House when an interlocutor has been pronounced by the Lord Ordinary, which either by itself, or taken along with a previous interlocutor or interlocutors, disposes of the whole subject-matter of the cause or of the competition between the parties in a process of competition, although judgment shall not have been pronounced upon all the questions of law or fact raised in the cause; but it shall not prevent a cause from being held as so decided that expenses, if found due, have not been taxed, modified, or decerned for; and for the purpose of determining the competency of appeals to the Court of Session this provision shall be applicable to the causes in the Sheriff and other inferior Courts,” &c.

No. 22.

Nov. 13, 1891.
Governors of Strichen
Endowments
v. Diverall.

the opinion of the Inner-House, to crave, and hereby crave, the Sheriff-principal to dismiss the appeal, and to find the whole of the claimants entitled to their expenses, including the expense of competition, out of the fund in medio."

The Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) on 15th October, pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Sheriff having considered the joint minute, dismisses the appeals, and finds the whole of the claimants entitled to their expenses, including the expenses of competition, out of the fund in medio: Allows accounts to be lodged, and remits the same for taxation, and decerns."

On appeal to the Court of Session an objection was taken by the Court to the competency.

The appellants argued that the interlocutors in the inferior Court disposed of the competition (which raised no other question than the right to the fund in medio), and that the requirements of the 53d section of the Court of Session Act, 1868, had been complied with. The expenses had been arranged extrajudicially under the joint minute to which the Sheriff had given effect. The question of the disposal of expenses had been held to be the criterion in such questions of competency.¹

The respondents stated that they desired to waive any objection to the competency.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case is certainly a fine one, but I am bound to say that I think the interlocutor of the Sheriff is not appealable. There still remains to be pronounced an operative decree. The interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute merely lays down the principles upon which he is to give final judgment. It is true that these are not complex, but at the same time we cannot avoid the result that the absence of an operative decree makes the judgment an interlocutory one only. So long as it remains of that character I am afraid that the Court is precluded from entertaining an appeal. The parties can easily get the want supplied, but the Act of Parliament lays down a sharp and definite line in regard to what is an appealable interlocutor, and we must give effect to it.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—If the Sheriff-substitute or the Sheriff had pronounced a formal decree repelling the claim of the present appellant, and had therefore absolved the other claimants from the conclusions of the summons so far as involved in the claim of the present appellant, there would then, I think, have been an appealable interlocutor, because the appellant would then have been put out of Court, and, so far as he was concerned, the whole merits were disposed of. I think that this is the specialty which is recognised by the statute where a distinction is drawn between the case of a competition and that of an ordinary action. But the parties have neglected to take the proper course here, because they did not go to the Sheriff-substitute, and get the formal judgment from him which they ought to have got. I think we have no option but to dismiss the appeal.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT found the appeal incompetent.

KINMONT & MAXWELL, W.S.—ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

¹ Parochial Board of Greenock v. Miller and Brown, May 25, 1877, 4 R 737.

PETER ROY SMYTH, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Guthrie Smith—J. A. Reid.

No. 23.

JOHN MUIR AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—*Johnston—
W. C. Smith.*

Nov. 13, 1891.
Smyth v.
Muir.

Process—Accumulation of defenders against whom different grounds of action—Shareholder suing in name of two different companies—Competency—Community of interest.—A shareholder in two limited tea companies brought an action against the directors of the companies, the companies themselves, and two private firms of B. & Co. and F. & Co. to have it declared that a sale by B. & Co. to the companies respectively of certain tea-gardens in India “was and is null and void,” and that the defenders, the directors, were not entitled to enter into the sale; and further, that the two firms should be ordained jointly and severally to repay to the companies, in the proportion in which the companies were respectively interested, the sum of £79,000; or otherwise that the directors of the companies all jointly and severally should be ordained to pay to the companies the sum of £79,000.

The pursuer averred that the two firms were represented in the directorate of the two companies; that B. & Co. were largely indebted to F. & Co.; that the partners of the firms, with a view to reduce this debt, made agreements on behalf of the two companies with B. & Co. whereby the tea-gardens, which belonged to B. & Co., and which were practically worthless, were sold to the companies in certain proportions to each at the exorbitant price of £79,000; that the money so received by B. & Co. was applied in reduction of their debt to F. & Co., and that this was a fraudulent scheme carried out by the directors (three of whom the pursuer admitted knew nothing about the scheme) to the loss and damage of the companies.

Held that the action was incompetent in respect (1) that the first alternative conclusion was founded upon two distinct and separate wrongs, one against one corporation and another against another corporation; (2) that the second alternative conclusion must be regarded as a conclusion for damages in which a lump sum was sought to be obtained for separate losses sustained by two separate corporations; and (3) that the pursuer sought to recover the price without offering restitution of the subjects bought.

PETER ROY SMYTH, plumber in Glasgow, was a shareholder to the extent of three shares of £100 each, paid up to the extent of £70 each in the North Sylhet Tea Company, Limited, and of three shares of £100 each, paid up to the extent of £70 each in the South Sylhet Tea Company, Limited. These companies were incorporated under the Companies Acts, the capital of each being £400,000, in 4000 shares of £100 each.

1st Division.
Ld. Stormonth
Darling.

On 12th January 1891 Smyth raised an action against John Muir and Alexander Brown, partners of the firm of James Finlay & Company, merchants in Glasgow, and six other gentlemen, all as directors of the two companies, the companies themselves, and against the two firms of P. R. Buchanan & Company and James Finlay & Company.

The summons concluded to have it found and declared that “a sale by the said Messrs P. R. Buchanan & Company to the said North Sylhet Tea Company, Limited, and to the said South Sylhet Tea Company, Limited, of certain lands, or leasehold rights of certain lands, situated in the district of Sylhet and Presidency of Bengal, India, and known as tea-gardens, with the plant, machinery, and houses thereon, in or about the month of March or April 1885, was and is null and void, and that the defenders, the directors of said companies, were not entitled, and could not legally enter into the said contract to purchase said lands, or the leasehold rights thereof, or the said plant, machinery, and houses: And further, that the defenders the said Messrs P. R. Buchanan & Company, and the said defenders Messrs James Finlay & Company, jointly and severally,

No. 23. Smyth v. Muir.
 Nov. 18, 1891.
 or one or other of them, are bound to repeat to the said companies, in the proportion in which the said companies were respectively interested, the sum of £79,000, or such other sum as was paid for said lands or leasehold rights and others, with interest thereon at the rate of five per centum per annum from the date when said sum was paid to the said defenders until repetition or repayment; and the said defenders, Messrs P. R. Buchanan & Company and Messrs James Finlay & Company, jointly and severally, or one or other of them, ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, to repeat and pay the said sum of £79,000, or such other sum as was paid by the said North Sylhet Tea Company, Limited, and by the South Sylhet Tea Company, Limited, with interest as aforesaid, and that to each of said companies in the proportion paid by each respectively: Or otherwise, that the said John Muir, Alexander Marshall Brown, Patrick Robertson Buchanan, Andrew Brown Murray, Sir Robert Drummond Moncreiffe, James Coats junior, and Thomas Glen Coats, all jointly and severally, should be decerned and ordained to make payment to the said North Sylhet Tea Company, Limited, and to the said South Sylhet Tea Company, Limited, of £79,000 with interest."

The pursuer averred that in 1884 the defenders Mr Buchanan, Mr Muir, and Mr Brown were directors of both companies; that Mr Buchanan's firm of P. R. Buchanan & Company was largely indebted to Mr Muir's firm of James Finlay & Company; that the three gentlemen, with the view of reducing the debt, made an agreement on behalf of the two tea companies with Buchanan & Company, the result of which was that certain tea-gardens in India belonging to the firm, which at the time were practically valueless, were sold to the companies for £79,000; and that the money so received by Buchanan & Company was applied in reducing their debt to Finlay & Company.

In cond. 6 the pursuer averred that this transaction was a fraudulent scheme entered into between the parties mentioned, whereby "the said P. R. Buchanan & Company disposed of certain properties, of little or no value in the knowledge of said defenders, to the said tea companies for a large price, which was by said fraudulent scheme applied to the reduction of the foresaid debt due by the said Messrs P. R. Buchanan & Company to Messrs James Finlay & Company, and this scheme was carried out by the said directors of the said tea companies to the loss and damage of said companies, and in default of their duties as directors. Said directors were bound to act only in the interests of said companies, and were not legally entitled to purchase any property without obtaining full knowledge of its value, and without independent valuation, and were specially not entitled to enter into any such transaction for the purpose of or having the effect of benefiting any of the directors, or any firm of which they were partners. In these respects they wrongfully failed in their duty; and as they command a majority of the voting power of the companies, which they are using for the purpose of preventing inquiry into the acts in question, and promoting their own interests fraudulently at the expense of the companies, the present action has been rendered necessary."

The defenders denied the pursuer's averments. In their statement of facts they, inter alia, averred that the South Sylhet Company had bought certain of the estates from Buchanan & Company, acting for Mr Buchanan, for £51,000, and that the North Sylhet Company had bought other estates from them, acting for Mr Gow, Mr Buchanan, and others, for £28,000; that the purchases of the estates in question by both companies had been made after due consideration by the directors, who regarded the price as reasonable, and that the estates were valuable, had increased in value while in possession of the companies, and could not be restored to the vendors without serious loss to the companies, and that Mr Buchanan had ceased to be a partner in each of the companies before these purchases were made. No. 23.

Nov. 13, 1891.
Smyth v.
Muir.

The pursuer, in his answers, averred that three of the directors—Mr Coats, Mr Glen Coats, Sir R. D. Moncrieffe, Bart.—were not aware of the worthless character of the properties offered to them, nor of the financial relations of Messrs P. R. Buchanan & Company and Messrs James Finlay & Company, and that they made no inquiry, accepting Mr Muir's recommendation without question. The pursuer did not aver that Mr Murray was aware of the worthlessness of the properties, or took any part in the alleged fraudulent scheme.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) As the defenders control a majority of the voting power of the company, and are using this power fraudulently for the purpose of preventing inquiry, and promoting their own interests at the expense of the company, the pursuer is entitled to sue on behalf of himself and others to compel them to make good the funds improperly expended. (2) The contracts of sale by Messrs P. R. Buchanan to the said companies being illegal and ultra vires, the pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator as concluded for. (3) The said contracts of sale being a fraudulent scheme for the benefit of firms in which the directors of said tea companies were partners, are null and void.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The action is incompetent, in respect it relates to two separate contracts between different vendors and vendees. (2) No title to sue. (5) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant, and not sufficiently specific. (10) Restitutio in integrum being impossible, the remedy craved is incompetent.

After the record was closed, the defenders obtained leave to amend their record. Their minute of amendment contained the following statements:—

On 27th April 1891 the pursuer sent to the shareholders in each of the companies a circular, with a copy of the record in the action enclosed, and asking the shareholders to support him by becoming parties to the action, but he did not receive any favourable replies.

On 8th May the defenders issued to the shareholders of the companies a notice calling the annual general meeting for 18th May, and annexing an extract from the directors' report to be laid before the meeting, and a copy of the resolutions to be proposed. The extract referred to the present action, and stated that it was being defended, and one of the resolutions was that the report be approved and adopted.

At the date of the meetings (18th May) of the two companies holders of £265,000 of the stock of the South Sylhet Tea Company were present in person, and holders of £66,700 were represented by proxy. Of the North Sylhet Tea Company holders of £266,600 stock were present in person, and holders of £66,200 were represented by proxy. The entire holdings of J. Finlay & Company and P. R. Buchanan & Company and those in their interest and the directors were £135,000 in each company out of a total of £400,000. The pursuer was present at the meetings, and at each of them the directors' report was approved of, the pursuer alone dissenting, and a resolution was passed expressing confidence in the directorate, disapproving of the conduct of the pursuer in raising the action, and authorising the directors to continue to defend the action.

In his answers to the foregoing minute, the pursuer denied that the replies to his circular were unfavourable. He averred that there was one meeting for both companies which had always been treated as practically one, and which, under official circular dated 20th January 1891, it was proposed to amalgamate. He had moved at the meeting as an amend-

No. 23.
 Nov. 13, 1891.
Smyth v.
Muir.

ment that a committee should be appointed to investigate the various matters referred to in the directors' report, but the voting power possessed by the directors made it impossible that the amendment should be carried.

The defenders added a plea in law, to the effect that,—(11) The purchases, the challenge of which is the ground of action, having been confirmed by an independent majority of the shareholders at their meetings on 18th May 1891, the pursuer has no title to sue this action.

On 10th June the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling) found the averments of the pursuer were not relevant to sustain the conclusions of the summons, and dismissed the action.*

* "OPINION.—This is an action of a very peculiar nature. It is brought by an individual shareholder in two limited liability companies, called the North Sylhet Tea Company and the South Sylhet Tea Company, and it is directed against the directors of these companies, the companies themselves, and two private firms—Messrs P. R. Buchanan & Company, of London, and Messrs James Finlay & Company, of Glasgow. There are no reductive conclusions, but the main purpose of the action is to have it declared that a sale by Messrs P. R. Buchanan & Company to the companies of certain tea-gardens in India, made in 1885, was and is null and void, and to have Buchanan & Company and Finlay & Company ordained to repay to the companies the sum of £79,000, being the price of the tea-gardens. There is an alternative conclusion for payment of the sum of £79,000 by the directors, jointly and severally, to the companies.

"The allegations of the pursuer are that these tea-gardens were at the time of the sale 'practically valueless,' that they were the property of the firm of P. R. Buchanan & Company, that Mr P. R. Buchanan, the senior partner of that firm, was then a director of the two companies, that the firm was largely indebted to James Finlay & Company, two of the partners of which firm (Mr Muir and Mr A. M. Brown) were also directors of the companies, and that a fraudulent scheme was concocted between Mr Buchanan, Mr Muir, and Mr Brown, whereby the tea-gardens were palmed off upon the companies at an exorbitant price, in order that the money so raised might be applied in reduction of Buchanan & Company's debt to Finlay & Company. The pursuer does not say that, prior to raising the action, he took any steps to obtain redress within the companies themselves, but he says that the directors 'command a majority of the voting power of the companies,' and that they are using that power to prevent inquiry into the acts in question.

"Since the action was brought, it appears that the pursuer did attempt to enlist his fellow shareholders on his side, for he addressed to each of them a circular asking them to join him in the action, and he alleges that some of the replies were favourable; but certain it is, that at the general meeting of the companies held on 18th May last, a resolution was passed expressing the meeting's entire confidence in the directors, disapproving of the action, and instructing them to continue to defend it. The pursuer proposed an amendment for the appointment of a committee of investigation, but he did not even succeed in finding a seconder.

"The pursuer is the holder of six recently acquired shares of £100 each in the two companies, the total capital of which is £800,000. The case thus presents the remarkable aspect of an attempt made by a man whose interest in the concern is 1/1333d part of the whole, to rescind, on behalf of the companies, contracts made six years ago, with which the companies themselves are perfectly satisfied. The boldness of the attempt is further shewn by the fact that the pursuer, while demanding repetition of the price, does not, because he cannot, offer restitution of the land; and it is not wonderful that the companies should be unwilling to take such a course when it appears from the pursuer's own admission in answer 9 that a very large capital expenditure has been made upon the tea-gardens since their purchase.

"The defenders, besides denying all the pursuer's material averments, state a number of preliminary pleas. Of the first I will only say, that while it has much force in point of form, the companies are so closely connected that I do not

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—As a general rule where a company had been defrauded by the execution of a contract of purchase and

No. 28.

Nov. 18, 1891.
Smyth v.
Muir.

think any practical end would be served by sustaining it ; but if the action were to go on, it would be necessary to call as defenders the vendors mentioned in stat. 11 (i.e., the vendors of the estates to the North Sylhet Tea Company). The second plea, of no title to sue, which is to be taken along with the new plea founded on the proceedings of the recent general meeting, raises the important and interesting question how far an individual shareholder can sue on behalf of a company against the wish of the majority, without alleging either that the act complained of was ultra vires, or that it constituted an attempt by the majority to gain some advantage for themselves at the expense of the minority. I was referred to many cases on this point, which would require very careful consideration, if it were not that there are averments here of fraud, which make it, I think, desirable to decide the case on the broader ground of relevancy. I am of opinion that the pursuer, being a minority (and, as it happens, a minority of one), has not stated a case relevant to sustain either his conclusions for annulling the sale, or for recovering the price from the individual directors by way of damages.

“To the conclusions for annulling the sale, the objections are, I think, insurmountable. It is enough, in my opinion, that the pursuer does not, and cannot, offer restitution of the subject of sale. . . . Moreover, while the pursuer avers a fraudulent scheme for enabling the debt of Buchanan & Company to Finlay & Company to be paid at the expense of the companies, it is obvious that the whole sting of this averment lies in the allegation of excessive price, for, apart from that, there was nothing wrong in Buchanan & Company making, or in Finlay & Company receiving, payment of a just debt. Now, it is not said that either Buchanan & Company or Finlay & Company, or their partners, used any arts or practised any misrepresentation or concealment to persuade their brother directors to consent to the transaction, and without their consent the transaction could not have been carried out. Neither is it said that the three persons who alone were parties to this alleged fraud (viz., Buchanan, Muir, and Brown) themselves possessed a majority of the votes in the companies, though it is loosely said that the directors as a whole commanded a majority of the voting power, so that, when the shareholders deliberately adopted and ratified the transaction, I must assume that an independent majority of the shareholders were of opinion that the purchase was not at an excessive price, but for the benefit of the companies. In such a state of matters, I think it would be in the highest degree improper for a Court of law to interfere in the internal regulation of a company, and, at the suit of a single dissentient shareholder, to order an elaborate and costly inquiry into the value of properties which the company itself is determined to retain.

“The same considerations have led me to the result that the pursuer has not stated a relevant case for his alternative conclusion, which is not put, either in his condescendence or pleas in law as a conclusion for damages, but which I am asked to regard in that light. The conclusion is aimed at all the directors ; yet it is not said that four of them (Mr Murray, Sir Robert Moncrieffe, Mr James Coats, and Mr Thomas Glen Coats) were aware of the alleged worthlessness of the properties, or took any part in the alleged fraudulent scheme, or profited in any way by the transaction. Against them, therefore, the conclusion is plainly irrelevant, for I never heard of an action of damages against directors for mere negligence or want of prudence in paying too much for a property, particularly when the company itself was perfectly satisfied with the bargain. Even as against the three defenders who are said to have profited by the transaction, I do not see my way to sustain the relevancy on this head, and thereby to allow a proof, which would involve those very evils which I have mentioned as necessarily arising from an inquiry with a view to cut down the sale. I am far from saying that there are not frauds by directors of a kind for which even a single shareholder might be allowed to recover damages in name of the company, particularly if he could shew that he was prevented from obtaining redress within the company itself by the actual votes of the wrongdoers. But when the alleged

No. 23.
Nov. 13, 1891.
Smyth v.
Muir.

sale, the company alone had title to sue an action to recover the price from the directors or officers.¹ Where, however, the directors controlled a majority of the voting power of the company, and were using that power to defraud the minority, a member of the minority might sue the action in name of the company.² There were ample averments here to bring the pursuer within this exception to the general rule, and he was entitled to a proof of them. Further, there was nothing incompetent in the form of action. Though the action was raised in name of two companies, they were practically one company carrying on the same kind of business in the same district in India, were managed by the same directors, and would probably be amalgamated. Then, again, there was no need for an action of reduction, for the declaratory conclusion that the sale was null and void, and that the directors were not entitled to enter into it, was sufficient.

Argued for the defenders;—The law as laid down in *Gray v. Lewis*³ and *Mason v. Harris*⁴ was not disputed, but it had really no application in the present circumstances, because deducting the voting power of the persons said to be tainted with fraud, there was an overwhelming untainted majority who were unanimous in repudiating the action.⁵ The action, however, was hopelessly incompetent in point of form. In the first place, assuming the pursuer's averments to be relevant, they disclosed a separate ground of action in the case of each of the companies, based on separate wrongs.⁶ Secondly, assuming that the pursuer had relevantly averred fraud (which he had not), the summons as laid could not effect his purpose. A contract induced by fraud was not void, but voidable. It was valid until rescinded, and to rescind it an action of reduction was necessary. But the pursuer did not propose to reduce it, and if effect were given to the declaratory conclusions and the first alternative of the operative conclusion, the companies, of which the pursuer was a shareholder, would recover payment of the whole price they paid for the properties, and would still be allowed to retain them in their possession. The same criticism also applied to the conclusion for damages against the directors. Thirdly, even if the companies desired to give restitutio in integrum, they could not in the circumstances do so, and much less could an individual shareholder.

At advising,—

LORD KINNEAR.—The pursuer holds three shares in a limited company called the North Sylhet Tea Company, and three shares in another limited company called the South Sylhet Tea Company, and he brings this action on behalf of fraud resolves entirely into an allegation of excessive price paid from a sinister motive, and when it appears that a majority of the shareholders, apart from the alleged wrongdoers, are content to abide by the transaction as fair and reasonable, I am of opinion that there is no case for the interposition of the Court."

¹ Gray v. Lewis, 1873, L. R., 8 Ch. App. 1035, per Sir W. James, 1050; Mozley v. Alston, 1847, 1 Phillips' Ch. Cases, 790; Foss v. Harbottle, 1843, 2 Hare's Ch. Rep. 461.

² Atwool v. Merryweather, 1867, L. R., 5 Equity, 464, note; Mason v. Harris, 1879, L. R., 11 Ch. Div. 97, per Sir Geo. Jessel, 107; Rixon v. Edinburgh Tramways Co., March 20, 1889, 16 R. 653, per Lord President, 657.

³ Gray v. Lewis, vide supra, note 1.

⁴ Mason v. Harris, vide supra, note 2.

⁵ Lindley on Company Law, 581; Macdougall v. Gardiner, 1875, L. R., 1 Ch. Div. 13; Russell v. Wakefield Water-works Co., 1875, L. R., 20 Equity, 474, per Sir Geo. Jessel, 479.

⁶ Revey v. Murdoch, March 11, 1841, 3 D. 888; Harkes v. Mowat, March 4, 1862, 24 D. 701, 34 Scot. Jur. 348; Gibson v. Macqueen, Dec. 5, 1866, 5 Macph. 113, 39 Scot. Jur. 56.

both companies for the purpose of recovering payment of the sum of £79,000 which is said to be the amount paid by both companies to the firm of P. R. Buchanan & Company, merchants in London, as the price of several properties purchased separately by each company from that firm. No. 23.
Nov. 13, 1891.
Smyth v.
Muir.

The first plea in law stated for the defenders is this,—“The action is incompetent in respect it relates to two separate contracts between different vendors and vendees”; and I understand that to mean, that inasmuch as the two companies on whose behalf the action is brought are separate persons in law, the conclusions of the summons are, at the instance of these two separate and independent persons, incompetent conclusions.

The Lord Ordinary observes with reference to this plea, that “while it has much force in point of form, the companies are so closely connected that he does not think any practical end would be served by sustaining it.” But if the plea is well founded at all, it is by no means a merely formal or technical plea, but on the contrary rests upon practical considerations that are very material to the parties. Nor does it appear to me that its validity is in any way affected by the supposed connection between the companies. It is true that the same persons are directors of both, and that others besides the directors may hold shares in both, that they carry on the same kind of business, and that they have properties in the same district in India, and the pursuer says that they may probably be amalgamated. But in the meantime they are distinct and separate corporations, each having its own separate rights and obligations independently of the other. Now, the pursuer’s averments, assuming them to be relevant, disclose a separate ground of action in each of these two companies.

His allegation is that in 1884 the defenders Mr Buchanan, Mr Muir, and Mr Brown were, as they still are, directors of both companies; that Mr Buchanan’s firm of P. R. Buchanan & Company was largely indebted to Mr Muir’s firm of James Finlay & Company; that the defenders whom I have named, with the view of reducing the debt, made an agreement or agreements on behalf of the two tea companies with Buchanan & Company, the result of which was that certain properties belonging to the firm which at the time were practically valueless, were sold to the companies for £79,000; that the money so received by Buchanan & Company was applied in reducing their debt to Finlay & Company; and that this “transaction was a fraudulent scheme entered into between the persons mentioned whereby the said P. R. Buchanan & Company disposed of properties of little or no value in the knowledge of the said defenders to the said tea companies for a large price, which was by the said scheme applied to the reduction of the said debt, and this scheme was carried out by the said directors to the loss and damage of the said companies, and in default of their duty as directors.”

The pursuer deduces from these averments two alternative conclusions—First, a conclusion directed against the firms of Messrs P. R. Buchanan & Company and Messrs James Finlay & Company that these two firms should be ordained, jointly and severally, to repeat and pay the sum of £79,000, with interest, to the North Sylhet Tea Company and the South Sylhet Company, and that to each of said companies in the proportions paid by each respectively; and secondly and alternatively, a conclusion against the directors, jointly and severally, to pay the said sum of £79,000 to the two companies without any conclusion for determining the proportion in which the money is to be paid to each. I think both of these conclusions incompetent. It must be observed

No. 23. that the averments do not mean that the properties which are said to have been valueless were conveyed to the two companies jointly, or that they had jointly paid a lump sum as the price of the whole. The meaning is that each company acquired for itself a separate property or properties, and paid a separate price to the same vendor. The pursuer therefore alleges two distinct and separate wrongs done by the same persons against two distinct and separate corporations. There is thus no community of interest between the two companies, and if they had resolved to challenge the transactions for themselves, I think it clear that they must have brought separate actions for that purpose. The gravamen of the charge is that an extravagant price was paid by each purchaser for certain properties in which the other has no concern. That may be true or it may be false in regard to both purchases. But it is also conceivable that it may be true in regard to one, and false in regard to the other. And therefore in the procedure which would follow upon this summons, if it were sustained, there must be two separate inquiries, which might conceivably result in entirely opposite judgments, and yet the two cases are so tied together that the only separation of interest which the summons contemplates appears to be an apportionment of the sum of £79,000 between the two companies after it has been determined that that sum is payable to both.

Nov. 13, 1891.
Smyth v.
Muir.

I know of no authority by which a summons framed in this way can be supported. It has been held in Harkes v. Mowat, 24 D. 701, that where two persons have sustained injuries by one and the same wrong, they may insist for damages in the same action provided the summons contains conclusions applicable separately to each pursuer, and that each takes a separate issue. But the present is a very different case from that, because if there is a good ground of action to either company, it must rest upon an allegation of fraud perpetrated against that company alone in carrying out on its behalf a contract of purchase and sale with which the other company had no concern. It is not a case of separate injuries arising from a single wrong, but of two separate wrongs done to two different persons.

The alternative conclusion seems to me even more clearly incompetent. It is directed against all the directors who were in office at the time of the purchase, jointly and severally. But the pursuer admits that three of these gentlemen knew nothing of the worthless character of the properties, or of the financial relations of Messrs Buchanan & Company and Finlay & Company, and the only charge against them therefore is that they failed in their duty as directors, inasmuch as they accepted Mr Muir's recommendation without inquiry. That being the state of the averment, the conclusion against the directors can only be justified as a conclusion for damages. I am not considering at present whether there is any relevant averment to support such a conclusion against all or any of the directors. But it cannot be suggested that directors who knew nothing of the alleged fraud, and received no part of the price, can be made liable on any other ground except that they are answerable in damages for negligence in the performance of their duty. And therefore the demand is that the defenders shall pay to two companies having no community of interest a lump sum of £79,000, as the amount of loss they have sustained, and there is no suggestion of any division or apportionment of the money. I think the case of Gibson v. Macquenn (5 Macph. 113), is directly in point. In that case the respective creditors in two bonds granted by the same person at the same time, over the same subjects raised an action of damages against the law-agent of the borrower, on the allegation that he had delivered the bonds to the pursuers in the knowledge that certain of the signatures were forged. The action was held to be incompetent, and the observations of the Lord Justice-Clerk may be applied in terms to the present case. "The demand is that to these four ladies, who are without community of interest, a lump sum should be paid as the amount of loss sustained by them. That conclusion appears to me to be hopelessly incompetent. We have indeed sustained a summons in which two parties alleged injury by one calumnious statement, but then they asked for £300 each. That was the case of Harkes v. Mosat, and I think it was going very far to sustain conclusions in these terms. But here we have no guide or clue to any mode of separating the claims of the two parties, and yet the claims are in their own nature as separate as can be. The one may succeed, while the other fails. The parties are different, and so are the injuries sustained, and yet I think they are so bound up that it is impossible to separate them."

No. 22.

Nov. 13, 1891.

Smyth v. Muir.

I need hardly say that it can make no difference, in so far as this question of competency is concerned, that the action is not brought directly by the two companies themselves, but by a single shareholder who claims to be entitled to sue on behalf of both. For the reasons I have mentioned I am of opinion that the first plea in law should be sustained, and the defenders assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons.

If your Lordships are of the same opinion, we are not called upon to consider the other pleas.

But there is another objection to the competency to which I think it quite necessary to refer, because it appears to me to be perfectly fatal to the action in so far as the first of the two alternative conclusions is concerned. The pursuer alleges that the contracts of which he complains are frauds on the company. But he does not propose to reduce these contracts, and it was explained in argument that he does not seek for reduction, because in his view no reduction is necessary, inasmuch as the declaratory conclusion is well founded and sufficient, namely, that the sale of which he complains "was and is null and void, and that the defenders, the directors of the said companies, were not entitled and could not legally enter into the said contract for the purchase of the lands and leasehold rights," which formed the subject of that contract. Now, that appears to me to be altogether unsound in law. It is very clear in law that a contract induced by fraud is not null and void, but voidable. It is valid until it is rescinded, and accordingly the party defrauded has in general the option, when he discovers the fraud, of rescinding the contract or of affirming it. But he must do either one or other. He cannot take the benefit of the contract in so far as it is beneficial to himself, and reject it in so far as it is burdensome to him. If he affirms it he must affirm it in all its terms. If he reduces it he must give up any benefit he may have before the fraud was discovered, and therefore if the two companies were of the same mind as the pursuer, and were desirous of challenging the transaction which he says has been injurious to them, their remedy would be to reduce the contracts of purchase and sale, to give back the properties they have been induced to buy, and to recover the price from the vendors. It is out of the question to suggest that they could recover the price and yet refuse to give back the properties for which the price had been paid. But that is what the pursuer proposes by the conclusions of his summons. If he were to have decree in terms of the declaratory conclusion and the first of the two operative conclusions, the effect of that would be

No. 23. that the companies of which the pursuer is a shareholder would recover payment of the whole price they have paid for certain properties of which they are at present in possession, and would still be allowed to retain the properties.

Nov. 13, 1891.
Smyth v.
Muir.

The mere statement of this proposition is enough to shew that it is untenable, and that a demand of that sort cannot be regarded as a competent demand. That applies directly only to the first of the two alternative conclusions of the summons. But if we were considering the question of relevancy it might have a very material bearing on this second conclusion also, because the scheme of the action is this—that the companies, having been induced by fraud to execute this contract of purchase and sale, have a direct action for repayment of the price against the vendors, and also against a certain firm into whose hands the price was paid, they being in the knowledge of the fraud; and second, that failing their remedy against the vendors they have an alternative remedy against their own directors, by whose fault or negligence they have suffered the loss of which the pursuer complains. Now, if that be the nature of the second alternative conclusion, it appears to me the defenders have a very material interest to be informed as to the specific ground on which the alternative claim of damages is based—whether they are to pay damages because the company is unable to restore the properties which they have bought, and therefore cannot recover the price from the vendor, or because the company, regarding these properties as advantageous and beneficial properties, declines to restore them. That would appear to me to be a very material point which would require to be the subject of specific averment in an action of damages against the directors. But I make that observation merely by the way, because I am of opinion that the true ground of judgment being that the action is incompetent, we have no concern with any question as to the relevancy of any of the averments on record. If the action is incompetent, we are not to inquire whether the pursuer's condescendence does or does not contain statements that might be relevant in support of some other demand which he has not thought fit to bring before us.

For the same reason I express no opinion on another question, which it would have been necessary to decide had we had any competent action before us, namely, whether the pursuer as a single shareholder has a title to sue on behalf of the two companies. The general proposition is perfectly clear, that where a company has been defrauded by the execution of a contract of purchase and sale, it is the company alone that has any title to complain, because they alone have a right to decide whether they are to give up the property they have bought and to recover the price, or whether the contract should be affirmed because the properties are too valuable to be given up. But then there is no doubt an exception to that rule, of which the pursuer desires to avail himself in this case. The exception is that where the majority of the shareholders of the company are using their voting power to defraud the minority, there the minority may sue an action in name of the company which the majority decline to raise. But whether in a particular case the averments of a fraud of this nature on the part of the majority are sufficient to justify a proof is a question of relevancy which we cannot consider unless it arises in a competent action.

The conclusion to which I come is that the defenders ought to be assoilied from the conclusions of this summons as incompetent. I should propose to sustain the first plea in law for the defenders. It does not appear to me that we can sustain the tenth plea. That is a plea that "restitutio in integrum" being impossible, the remedy craved is incompetent." Now, we cannot tell whether restitution is impossible or not. There is nothing in the record to suggest that it is at all impossible to give back those properties, although there is a statement by the defenders that the properties are valuable, and have increased in value by the possession of the companies, and therefore ought not to be restored. But the true objection to competency is not that restitution is impossible, but that the pursuer proposes to recover the price without offering restitution of the subjects he has bought. That appears to me, as I have said, to be a totally untenable position, and therefore I am of opinion that we should assolvie the defenders.

No. 23.

Nov. 13, 1891.

Smyth v.

Muir.

LORD ADAM and LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

LORD M'LAREN, who was absent at the hearing, delivered no opinion.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, sustained the first plea in law for the defenders, and assolvied them from the conclusions of the action.

ADAMSON & GULLAND, W.S.—FORRESTER & DAVIDSON, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN WALKER (James Somerville Paterson's Trustee), Pursuer (Respondent).—W. Campbell—Crole.

No. 24.

MICHAEL COYLE AND OTHERS (James Paterson's Trustees), Defenders (Reclaimers).—D. F. Balfour—Baxter.

Nov. 13, 1891.

Paterson's
Trustee v.
Paterson's
Trustees.

Bankruptcy—Illegal preference—Lease—Act 1696, c. 5.—By agreement purporting to be a "minute of lease" entered into in 1879 the trustees "let" to A certain pawnbroking premises, together with the stock of pledges therein of the value of £1100, A being bound to pay rent for the premises, and 5 per cent on the value of the stock. It was provided that A should keep books shewing his intronmissions with the business, and that in the event of the stock falling below the value at which it had been handed over to him, the trustees should have a right to enter into possession of the premises and stock, and that A should be bound to cede possession thereof on receiving fourteen days' notice. On 24th April 1888, A executed a deed ceding possession of the premises and of the stock of pledges to the trustees, and they at once entered into possession of premises and stock. Four days later A was sequestered. In an action by the trustee in his sequestration against the trustees, held that under the agreement the trustees had only a personal obligation by the bankrupt to deliver to them in a certain event the pledges then in his possession; and therefore, even assuming the event which gave them a right of re-entry to have occurred, that the deed by which the stock of pledges was transferred to the trustees was ineffectual as having been granted within sixty days of bankruptcy in satisfaction of a prior debt, within the meaning of the Act 1696, c. 5.

THE estates of James Somerville Paterson, pawnbroker in Edinburgh, were sequestered on 28th April 1888. Four days before his sequestration he gave up possession of his shops in Richmond Place and Greenside Row, with the stock of pledges therein, to the testamentary trustees of his grandfather, James Paterson, who were the proprietors of the shops.

1st Division.
Ld. Kyllachy.

On 14th August 1890 this action was raised by the trustee in J. S. Paterson's sequestration against James Paterson's trustees. The conclusions were for payment of £2250, with interest from 24th April 1888, or otherwise, for decree ordaining the defenders to account for their intronmissions with the bankrupt's estate, and for payment of the sum which should be found due.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The transfer of said pledges being made

No. 24.

Nov. 13, 1891.
Paterson's
Trustee v.
Paterson's
Trustees.

and granted within sixty days of bankruptcy, and at the time when the bankrupt was known by the defenders to be insolvent, was an alienation struck at by the Statute 1696, cap. 5, and a fraud against the bankrupt's creditors at common law.

The defenders pleaded;—(6) The actings complained of having been lawful and in conformity with the contracts under which James Somerville Paterson possessed the pawnbroking business in question for many years, the defenders should be assoilzied.

The defenders founded on the following deeds:—Agreement described as a "minute of lease" entered into by Michael Coyle and others, the testamentary trustees of James Paterson, as first party, and his grandson James Somerville Paterson as second party, dated 30th December 1878 and 14th May 1879, by which the trustees "let in lease" to James Somerville Paterson, and his heirs and successors, the premises situated at No. 2 and 4 Richmond Place, Edinburgh, "together with the pawnbroking business stock therein of the value of £1100 sterling," belonging to the trustees, from December 1878 to Martinmas 1885, at a yearly rent for the premises of £50, payable half-yearly, "the said James Somerville Paterson and his foresaids paying in respect of the said lease of said business stock therein interest on the said sum of £1100 at the rate of 5 per cent per annum," payable also half-yearly, and it was declared that the premises should be used and possessed by the second party for carrying on the pawnbroking business then carried on there, and for no other purpose whatever.

By the second clause it was provided that so long as the sum of £1100, or any part thereof, belonging to the trustees should be allowed to remain in the business, and not be paid out as thereafter provided for, the second party should be bound to keep regular books shewing his intrusions with the business, and that the first party should have free access at all times to such books, and to inspect the stock of pledges in the premises, and that the second party should make up a balance-sheet every half year, to be exhibited to the first party, shewing the position of the business at the time. The clause then proceeded,—“And with full power to the said first party and their foresaids during the currency hereof, at any time they may think proper, in the event of the stock of pledges at the time being found to be under the amount or value of said sum of £1100, if not paid out, to enter into and resume possession of the premises, business, and stock of pledges and others therein, and to intronit with, sell and dispose of, and realise the same in such manner as they may think proper, without any other warrant from the second party or his foresaids than this agreement, in which case the said second party binds and obliges himself and his foresaids peaceably to cede possession of the said premises, business, goods, and effects to the said first party or their foresaids on receiving fourteen days' previous notice in writing of their intention so to do: Declaring that the said second party or his foresaids shall not be entitled to object to the said first party or their foresaids entering to the possession, management, and disposal of the said premises, business, goods, and effects on any ground or pretence whatever, but shall only be entitled to retain possession on instantly making payment to the said first party or their foresaids, or consigning in bank in their names the said sum of £1100, with interest thereon at the foresaid rate, and rent of premises that may be due at that time, and any expenses that may have been incurred; but declaring that the said first party or their foresaids shall be bound to hold just count and reckoning with the said second party or his foresaids for his intrusions with the said goods and effects, and to pay to him or his foresaids any balance that may remain after deducting all claims at the instance of the said first party for the said sum of £1100 sterling, interest thereon, rent, and expenses." No. 24.

Nov. 13, 1891.

Paterson's
Trustee v.
Paterson's
Trustees.

In the third clause the second party bound himself to keep the stock of pledges up to the value of £1100 so long as the sum of £1100 remained in the business, and it was provided that the stock of pledges should be insured in the name of the first party, the second party being bound to repay them the premiums of insurance. The fourth clause provided that on the termination of the lease the whole stock of pledges, with the exception of forfeited pledges, which should be sold by auction, should be inventoried and valued by neutral parties. If the valuation exceeded the sum of £1100, and that sum were not paid out, the second party was to be paid the excess; if it fell short of £1100, he was to make good the deficiency, the whole stock then becoming the property of the first party. The fifth clause empowered the second party to remove the stock to other premises, and declared that in that event the stock should still remain the property of the first party. Under the sixth article the second party was entitled to pay out the sum of £1100, in which case only the premises and fixtures would remain the property of the first party.

An agreement, mutatis mutandis, identical with the foregoing, was entered into in 1880 between the same parties with regard to premises situated at No. 21 Greenside Row, Edinburgh, the total value of the stock which J. S. Paterson was taken bound to hold being £2250. Of this sum, £350 represented an advance by the trustees to Paterson, who granted a receipt bearing that the money advanced was to be expended "in increasing the stock of goods farmed" by him.

It appeared from a proof that J. S. Paterson entered into possession of the premises and stock at Nos. 2 and 4 Richmond Place and 21 Greenside Row in pursuance of these agreements, which after their termination were renewed annually by tacit relocation.

In 1888 J. S. Paterson was in arrear with the rent and interest due by him to the trustees, and on 24th April 1888 he, without having received the fourteen days' notice to which he was entitled under the agreements, voluntarily executed deeds ceding possession of the premises and stock to the trustees, who at once entered into possession of the premises and stock of pledges therein. Four days afterwards his estates were sequestrated.

The evidence shewed that the defenders had realised a sum of £2430, 1s. 6d. from the pledges delivered to them by the bankrupt.

On 25th July 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the deeds libelled, dated 24th April 1888, were granted by the bankrupt in contravention of the Act 1696, cap. 5, and are therefore ineffectual: Finds that the defenders are bound to count and reckon with the pursuer for the proceeds of the bankrupt's property received by them under the said deeds: Finds of consent that the said proceeds amount to £2153, 10s. 3d., as brought out in the state No. 220 of process: Allows interest on the said sum at the rate 4 per cent from 1st September 1888 until payment, and decerns against the defenders accordingly," &c.*

* "OPINION.—The view which I take of this case is perhaps a narrow one, but it is, I think, sufficient for the decision. I hold that the stock in trade, which was the subject of the deeds challenged, was in law the property of the bankrupt. I further hold that the bankrupt was under no legal obligation to execute the deeds challenged, except after fourteen days' notice. And that being so, I hold that the deeds challenged being executed immediately upon demand, and within four days of sequestration, must be held to have been

No. 24.

Nov. 18, 1891.

Paterson's
Trustees v.
Paterson's
Trustees.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The agreements entered into between the bankrupt and the defenders purported to be minutes of voluntary deeds granted in satisfaction of a prior debt within the period of constructive bankruptcy, and so to be reducible under the Act 1696, c. 5.

"I am not able to accept the defenders' views of the bankrupt's position. They represent him as having been merely tenant of the two businesses, and of the pledges which formed their stock in trade. The businesses, they say, belong to them, the defenders, and they say that the pledges were their property. Or, if the right which a pawnbroker has in his pledges is not correctly described as a right of property, they say, alternatively, that they are the true creditors in the contracts of pledge made by the bankrupt, he being merely their agent in making those advances, and being bound on the termination of his agency to transfer everything to them subject only to certain pecuniary claims arising hinc inde in the event of the value of the contracts being found to be above or below a particular sum.

"I do not think that either of those views is tenable. It is not I think possible to treat a pawnbroker's pledges as an ordinary stock of goods. But if it were so, the law of Scotland does not, as I understand it, enable an owner of goods to retain the property of such goods after he has hired them out, on the footing that the hirer shall dispose of the goods on his own account, and be merely bound to replace them with other goods of equal value. In other words, the contract of steelbow, while recognised out of favour to agriculture, as between landlord and tenant in agricultural or pastoral farms, has never, so far as I know, been extended, e.g., to goods let or attempted to be let with the shop.

"Neither do I think it is possible to treat the bankrupt as being merely the defenders' agent. It is plain, I think, upon the agreements that he was conducting the two businesses for himself; that the contracts he made were his contracts, truly as well as nominally, and that in substance he was the owner for the time of the two businesses and their stock in trade, subject only to an obligation of divestiture, on certain terms, after the lapse of a certain period, or upon the occurrence of certain events.

"It is not therefore, I think, doubtful that the deeds under challenge were alienations of the bankrupt's property in favour of prior creditors. The question is whether being so, and being executed within sixty days of bankruptcy, there is anything to exclude the operation of the Act 1696, c. 5.

"That question, I think, depends on this, whether they were voluntary deeds in the sense of that statute. I cannot doubt that they were deeds in favour of prior creditors in the sense of the statute. The defenders were not, it is true, creditors in a pecuniary debt. It is probably correct to say that they were only creditors in an obligation ad factum præstandum. But I cannot agree with the defenders' argument that the statute only applies to pecuniary debts. The case of Gourlay v. Hodge, 2 R. 738, is indeed an authority to the contrary.

"Were then the two deeds in question voluntary? I have come to be satisfied that they were. Had the obligation in the two agreements been to divest and cede possession immediately on the ascertainment in the prescribed manner of a deficiency in the stock of pledges, there would have been room for the argument that the bankrupt did no more than fulfil exactly and literally a previous obligation, which he was legally bound to fulfil, and to fulfil there and then. And I confess that, notwithstanding some apparent authority to the contrary, I should have had great difficulty, had the facts raised it, in rejecting that argument. But I have not been able to see any good answer to the pursuer's point, that in any view of his position the bankrupt was not bound—that is to say, could not have been compelled—to execute the deeds in question at the time he did, or at any time prior to the sequestration. He was entitled under the agreements to fourteen days' written notice. He waived that notice and executed the deeds on demand. The result was that the deeds were executed and possession given four days before the sequestration; whereas, if he had stood (in the interest of his general creditors) on his legal rights, the sequestration would have supervened before the deeds were executed. I think, for these lease, and there was nothing impossible in the idea of letting a group of things. It was done in the case of cattle, manure, &c., in the case of steelbow,¹ and there was a strong resemblance to the present contracts in a class of agricultural leases common in some of the northern counties, where the tenants were taken bound to keep the fences, mills, &c. up to the heritors' standard. If the relation between the bankrupt and the defenders was not that of landlord and tenant, then the bankrupt must be looked upon as the defenders' mandatary put in by them to manage the business, and the profits which he made after paying the five per cent to the trustees must be looked upon as commission. The provisions in the second clause binding the bankrupt to keep books shewing his intrusions, and giving the defenders a right of re-entry in the event of the stock of pledges falling below a certain value, and the provision that the insurances were to be taken in the defenders' name, all favoured the view that the bankrupt was a lessee, mandatary, or agent. Whatever the nature of the contract might be, there was at anyrate no assignment to the bankrupt of the pledges, or of such right of property as the defenders had in them. They were handed over to him to "farm." Further, the second articles of the agreements gave the defenders an immediate right of re-entry on it being ascertained that the stock of pledges had fallen below the stipulated value. The fourteen days' notice did not refer to their right of re-entry but to the tenant's obligation to cede possession. The Act 1696, c. 5, therefore did not apply, in respect that (a) No right of property was transferred by the defenders to the bankrupt, and the trustee's right could not be greater than that of the bankrupt; (b) the deeds of renunciation were unnecessary, as the defenders had immediate right of re-entry after it was ascertained that the stock of pledges had fallen below the stipulated value; and (c) the deeds of renunciation were granted in fulfilment of an obligation from which the bankrupt could not escape.² (2) The event which gave the trustees a right of re-entry had occurred. Interest should not be added to the sums advanced on the pledges, for according to the proof that had not been done when the agreements between the bankrupt and the defenders were entered into. (3) The £350 advanced by the defenders had been advanced to increase the "stock of goods farmed" by the bankrupt, and therefore that sum must be added to the value of the stock originally handed over to him in considering whether he had or had not fulfilled his obligation with regard to the upkeep of the stock.

The pursuer argued;—(1) Whatever the contract might be called, the agreements in effect gave the bankrupt authority to take possession of the pledges and uplift the money paid to redeem them. Though there was no obligation to repay cash, there was an obligation to repay in a more convenient form by handing over the stock of pledges. The contract was therefore one of loan of money, and nothing else. The deeds of renunciation were therefore struck at by the Act 1696, c. 5, as having been granted in security of a prior debt. The cases in which that Act reasons, that the deed must be held to have been in the sense of the statute 'voluntary,' and must accordingly be set aside.

"As to the amount for which decree shall be pronounced, I understand that the parties are agreed that the sum of £2153, 10s. 3d. brought out by Mr Craig, C.A., in the state No. 220 of process, is correct. I shall accordingly decree for that sum, with interest at 4 per cent from 1st September 1888, being, I think, a fair date to take as the average date of realisation."

¹ Hunter on Landlord and Tenant, i. 312.

² Bell's Comm. (7th ed.) ii. 211; Taylor v. Farrie, March 8, 1855, 17 D. 639, op. opinion of consulted Judges, p. 649, 27 Scot. Jur. 266.

No. 24.
Nov. 13, 1891.
Paterson's
Trustee v.
Paterson's
Trustees.

had been under the consideration of the Court established that in order to exclude its operation three points were essential—(a) that the deed should be granted in the ordinary course of business; (b) that it should be granted in fulfilment of an immediate and unconditional obligation; and (c) that that obligation should be to deliver or grant a security over a specific subject.¹ None of the three conditions were fulfilled here—(a) the obligation was not in the ordinary course of business, the whole agreement between the parties being of the most unusual kind; (b) the deeds were granted in fulfilment of a conditional and not immediate obligation; and (c) that obligation did not refer to a specific subject. Further, under the second article of the agreements the defenders were bound to give the bankrupt fourteen days' notice before entering into possession, and the bankrupt was entitled to fourteen days' notice before ceding possession. He had waived his right in granting the renunciations, and the Lord Ordinary was therefore right in holding that they gave the defenders an undue preference.² (2) The event which gave the trustees a right of re-entry under the deed had not occurred, because interest should be added to the amount advanced on the pledges in order to ascertain their value, and if this was done the value of the pledges was found to be more than that stipulated, even taking the advance of £350 into consideration. (3) That advance, however, should not be taken into consideration, as it was not made under the agreements, and so the penal clauses therein had no reference to it.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The estates of James Somerville Paterson, pawnbroker in Edinburgh, were sequestrated on 28th April 1888. Four days before his sequestration he ceded possession of the pledges in his shops in Richmond Place and Greenside Row, to the testamentary trustees of his grandfather, James Paterson, who were the landlords of those shops. The pledges so taken possession of have been realised by James Paterson's trustees; and the question in the present action is whether they can retain the proceeds against the trustee in the sequestration, who claims them mainly on the ground that the delivery over of the pledges by the bankrupt was in contravention of the Act 1696, c. 5.

The defence is rested on the stipulations of two agreements entered into between the defenders and the bankrupt, so long ago as 1879, on the occasion of the bankrupt beginning business. It appears that the business had originally been that of James Paterson, the grandfather; that after his death his son, and then someone else, had been placed in possession, under arrangements similar to that adopted in the present instance, and that the business had thus been continuously carried on for many years. Accordingly, when the bankrupt began business he de facto went into possession of a going business in premises belonging to his grandfather's trustees.

The agreements under which he did so apply the one to the Richmond Place and the other to the Greenside Row shops, but their provisions are, in scheme and substance, the same; and the deed relating to Richmond Place was the one taken for illustration at the debate. This agreement, then (to use the singular)

¹ Taylor v. Farrie, supra; Stiven v. Scott & Simson, June 30, 1871, 9 Macph. 923, 43 Scot. Jur. 511; Moncreiff v. Union Bank, Dec. 16, 1851, 14 D. 200, 24 Scot. Jur. 87; Gourlay v. Hodge, June 2, 1875, 2 R. 738; Gourlay v. Mackie, Jan. 27, 1887, 14 R. 403; Rhind's Trustee v. Robertson & Baxter, March 4, 1891, 18 R. 623.

² Bell's Comm. (5th ed.) 213, (7th ed.) ii. 198-9.

requires analysis, so as to distinguish its legal results from its phraseology. One part is sufficiently plain, viz., that which lets the shop to the bankrupt at a rent of £50 per annum for six and a-half years from Martinmas 1878 (possession being in fact continued after the expiry of that period from year to year). But, together with the shop, there purports to be let "the pawnbroking business stock therein, of the value of £1100 sterling, belonging to the first party, . . . the said James Somerville Paterson and his foresaids paying in respect of said business stock therein interest on the said sum of £1100 at the rate of five per centum per annum."

No. 24.

Nov. 13, 1891.

Paterson's
Trustee v.
Paterson's
Trustees.

At the termination of the lease the forfeited pledges were to be sold, and the other pledges were to be valued. If the money thus shewn was over £1100 the bankrupt was to be paid the excess; if it was under £1100 he was to pay the deficiency, the extant pledges being delivered over to the trustees. The bankrupt had right under the sixth head of the agreement at any time, on giving one month's notice, to pay up the £1100, and on this being done his obligations were limited to payment of the rent of the shop. On the other hand, so long as the £1100 remained unpaid, the bankrupt was bound to keep up the stock to that value, the trustees having right to examine his books, and also the pledges in the shop. Then follows the clause upon which the defenders acted in the proceedings now challenged,—“And with full power to the said first party and their foresaids during the currency hereof, at any time that they may think proper, in the event of the stock of pledges at the time being found to be under the amount or value of said sum of £1100, if not paid out, to enter into and resume possession of the premises, business, and stock of pledges and others therein, and to intromit with, sell and dispose of, and realise the same in such manner as they may think proper, without any other warrant from the second party or his foresaids than this agreement, in which case the said second party binds and obliges himself and his foresaids peaceably to cede possession of the said premises, business, goods and effects to the said first party or their foresaids, on receiving fourteen days' previous notice in writing of their intention so to do.”

When we turn from this agreement to the facts of the situation it is seen how little the written stipulations correspond with the legal results. When the bankrupt was put in possession of the business there were delivered over to him certain watches, clothes, and other articles held in pledge for loans. His business was, in the ordinary course, to deliver up the pledges to those borrowers who redeemed, becoming proprietor of such pledges as were unredeemed within the statutory period, to sell them in due course, and, on the other hand, to take in new pledges, which in turn were redeemed, or matured and were sold. Accordingly the so-called stock was entirely fluctuating, and the articles which were delivered to him by the defenders in 1878 have necessarily passed out of his hands years before his bankruptcy.

The words of the lease therefore which are applied to the so-called stock are, so far as legal effect goes, wholly inappropriate and ineffectual. When the bankrupt was put in possession of the pledges extant in 1879, with the object that he should deal with them as a pawnbroker for his own behoof, the trustees parted with the only right which they themselves had in those pledges. “Where a thing is lent” (says Erskine, iii. 1, 18), “which cannot be used without either its extinction or its alienation, the property of it must needs be transferred to the borrower, who cannot otherwise have a right from the proprietor to make the

No. 24
Nov. 13, 1891.
Paterson's
Trustee v.
Paterson's
Trustees.

proper use of it." This Erskine says, in discussing mutuum, where the lender is proprietor and not merely pledgee; but the principle is applicable whether the lender has the higher or the lower right to bestow on the borrower.

All, therefore, that the defenders held by the agreement under these clauses was a personal obligation by the bankrupt in a certain event to deliver over to them all the pledges he had in the shop, of what sorts soever these might be. The event was the shop being found to contain pledges of less value than the stipulated £1100, and £1100 not being made forthcoming in money.

The question then is whether this is an obligation which can be implemented within sixty days of bankruptcy, and I am of opinion that it cannot. It is, I think, impossible to assimilate the case to those in which the specific performance, within the sixty days of agreements entered into before that period, has been sustained. Two vital differences exist. In the first place, the obligation of which performance was here obtained, is not an obligation to give or to do a specific thing; it is simply to hand over the whole contents of the shop, and the fact that those contents were pledges constitutes a peculiarity, but not a difference. In the second place, under the agreement, performance of this obligation was not stipulated for forthwith as part of the agreement, but, on the contrary, was necessarily not to be so given, but only on demand being made in a certain event, that event being the defenders' interest under the contract coming in danger owing to the diminution of business. In my judgment, this surrender was in contravention of the Act 1696, c. 5, and directly contrary to the spirit of our bankruptcy law.

The ground of my opinion renders it unnecessary to consider the waiver of notice by the bankrupt, upon which the Lord Ordinary has rested his decision. Nor is it necessary to consider, on the one hand, the pursuer's argument that, even assuming the surrender to be unobjectionable on the statute, the valuation did not in fact shew a deficiency of value, inasmuch as requisite allowance fell to be made for the enhanced value of the older pledges; or, on the other hand, the defenders' contention that certain advances by them, subsequent to the agreement, increased the amount of value which they were entitled to require. But our attention was called to a correction which must be made on the sum for which the Lord Ordinary has granted decree, in order to give to the pursuer what was actually realised by the defenders for the subjects in dispute, and it will therefore be necessary, if your Lordships should concur, formally to recall his Lordship's interlocutor, in order to substitute £2430, 1s. 6d. for £2153, 10s. 3d., as the principal sum decreed for.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—This is a claim at the instance of the trustee on Paterson's sequestrated estate founded on the Statute 1696, cap. 5. The security sought to be set aside was of this nature: The pawnbroking business carried on by the deceased James Paterson passed to his testamentary trustees; and they were desirous of enabling Mr Paterson's grandson (the insolvent trader) to carry on the business for his own profit, while retaining in their own hands a right of property in the assets of the business, so far as they could lawfully do so.

With this object they executed a deed, purporting to be a lease, and dated 14th May 1879, whereby they let to the bankrupt, for a term of years, the premises Nos. 2 and 4 Richmond Place, Edinburgh, together with the pawnbroking business and stock therein, estimated as of the value of £1100. The tenant was

No. 24.

Nov. 18, 1891.
Paterson's
Trustee v.
Paterson's
Trustees.

put under obligation to keep up the stock to the value of £1100; and it was provided that if the stock of pledges (together with any sum which the tenant might have repaid to the trustees) should be found during the currency of the lease to be of less value than £1100, it should be lawful to the lessors (Paterson's trustees) to resume possession of the stock of pledges and other subjects, and to dispose of such stock as their property. The tenant was also taken bound to cede possession of the premises, business, and stock of pledges, upon fourteen days' notice in writing of the intention of the lessors to exercise their powers.

On 24th April 1888, the tenant, being then insolvent, executed, at the request of his grandfather's trustees, a renunciation of his rights under the lease, and the trustees immediately entered into possession.

Four days later, 28th April, the estates of the tenant were sequestrated under the Bankruptcy Act, and the creditors, after consideration, authorised their trustee to institute this action for the recovery of the stock, or its value, as property of the bankrupt. It is to be kept in view that neither the defenders nor the bankrupt are in a position to assert an absolute right to the stock of pledges. The pledges are the property of the pledgers. Nevertheless, the creditor's right in these pledges, with the correlative right of sale which is given by the Pawn-brokers Acts, is a valuable asset; and the question is, whether this right is an asset of the bankrupt, or whether it belongs to the defenders in virtue of their reserved powers under the lease, and the renunciation following on the assumed exercise of these powers.

The Lord Ordinary, on the evidence, found that the deed of renunciation referred to, and also a renunciation of a lease in similar terms of other premises, were in contravention of the Statute 1696, cap. 5. His Lordship's view of the case is summarised in the first paragraph of his opinion, in which he holds that the renunciations are voluntary deeds, because they do not proceed on a notice in writing in terms of the lease. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the circumstances under which these deeds were granted, especially the absence of the fourteen days' premonition prescribed by the lease, are material to the question of fraudulent preference in the sense of the statute. But in the argument addressed to us the Lord Ordinary's judgment was supported on the view that the so-called lease was a deed incapable of creating an effective security over the stock of pledges, and therefore that, irrespective of any question as to the sufficiency of notice, the deed of renunciation must be taken to be an alienation of the bankrupt estate.

It appeared to us that the case could not be satisfactorily decided without considering the question of the validity and sufficiency of the lease as a deed of security; and as I understand we are all of opinion that no effective security was or could be constituted by a deed which vested the possession of the pledges in the person of the bankrupt, it is proper that in affirming the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor we should state that our judgment proceeds on this ground.

It may simplify the consideration of the question if I suppose, as matter of argument, that instead of a stock of pledges, the parties to the lease of the premises in Richmond Place were treating with respect to an ordinary stock in trade, a stock of goods kept for sale in these premises. The supposition is that the stock was originally the property of the defenders, and that along with the premises they professed to let the stock in trade to Mr Paterson, taking from

No. 24. him an obligation that he should keep up the value of the stock and stipulating for re-entry in case of default.

Nov. 13, 1891.

Paterson's
Trustee v.
Paterson's
Trustees.

The mere statement of such a form of security is sufficient to exhibit its essential unsoundness. Even as regards such part of the goods assigned as might remain unsold at the date of the bankruptcy, it is plain that the security would not be effectual; because in the case supposed the goods are not given on hire (which would mean that the identical goods are to be returned to the lessor), but are given to the grantee to be sold for his profit, the right of the granter being only the right to demand equivalent goods. The granter's right after he has parted with the possession of the goods is accordingly a jus crediti, and nothing more; because there is no real distinction between a loan of coin or money with an obligation to repay in equivalent coin, and a loan of a stock of goods with an obligation to restore equivalent goods to be purchased out of the proceeds of sale.

In the case of a loan of money, anyone would admit that the lender's right is limited to a dividend, even if he could prove that the identical sovereigns which he lent were in the pocket of the bankrupt at the time of his sequestration. And so in the case of an assignment of stock to be used by the assignee in his trade, the question whether the goods have in fact been converted is an altogether irrelevant consideration, if the goods were made over to the trader for the purpose of being sold for his profit.

Now, the difference between the present case and the case supposed is that the defenders had not the absolute property of the pledges, but only a qualified right in them which might be made effectual to the extent of the money advanced on pledge by the sale of the pledges. I do not doubt that if a pledgee lends or gives the use of a pledge to a third person under the condition that the specific article is to be restored, the pledger and pledgee retain their respective rights in the thing, notwithstanding the bankruptcy of the person to whom it was entrusted. But if the pledgee makes over the thing to another person, giving that person all the right which he has in it, including the power of sale in the event of the pledge being unredeemed, and stipulating only for restoration in money or money's worth, I see no difference in principle between such an assignment and the case of assignment of the lender's individual property, with a relative obligation to restore the value of the goods. In the case before us, the right of the defenders in the pledges was only a qualified right, but the question of security or preference in bankruptcy is independent of the nature of the right of the cedent in the thing conveyed, and depends only on the quality of the assignee's obligation. If that obligation can be fulfilled by a payment in money or goods in genere, the obligation is personal, and only gives rise to a claim to participate in the distribution of the bankrupt's estate. This in my view is all that the defenders can claim under each of the two deeds challenged by the trustee.

It is perhaps unnecessary, but it may be satisfactory to the parties, that I should say that we do not overlook the fact that the form of a lease is used. Where the substance of the contract between debtor and creditor is consistent with the existence of a right of security or real right in the creditor, form may be important, especially in determining the creditor's securities, as in comparing, for example, the cases of a bond and disposition in security and an ex facie absolute deed, where the rights and remedies of the parties are different, depending on the terms and clauses of the deed of security. But where, as in the present case, the contract is not in substance a security contract, it will not be made any better by giving it the name of a lease, while the rights conferred on the grantee are not those of a tenant but of an owner, entitled to dispose of the subject at his pleasure.

No. 24.
Nov. 13, 1891.
Paterson's
Trustee v.
Paterson's
Trustees.

I do not think it is necessary for the purposes of this case to enter on a review of the decisions on this chapter of bankruptcy law. The construction of the Statute of 1696 is now very well understood, and I do not think that the circumstances of any of the previous cases throw much light on this case, which is indeed very special in its features. Probably the nearest case to the present is that of Gourlay v. Hodge, 2 R. 738, where the debtor in exchange for an advance undertook, "within one month from this date," to give delivery orders for grain, and the obligation was held only effectual to give a ranking in bankruptcy. The whole subject is most fully discussed in the elaborate and luminous opinion of the late Lord President in Stiven v. Scott & Simson, and I shall conclude by reading a few lines from that opinion, which appear to me to be directly applicable to the present case.

"An obligation of a general kind to give security is plainly nothing at all in itself. It is an obligation no doubt that the party is bound in honour to fulfil, but it is an obligation not applicable to any particular subject, and it is not in itself a specific obligation, and until it is made special in some way or other it cannot be said to be a security for the debt at all. In that view it is only when the so-called obligation is fulfilled that there comes to be any security. And, therefore, that is the point of time at which the security is granted, and if that point of time occurs within sixty days of bankruptcy the application of the statute is clear, because that is security given within sixty days for a prior debt."

In the present case the fulfilment of the obligation to restore was the execution of the deed of renunciation. As between the debtor and the creditor there is nothing to be said against the deed, but because it is a deed in satisfaction of an antecedent obligation it is annulled by the statute, and it follows, in my opinion, that the trustee is entitled to decree in terms of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, with the variation suggested by your Lordship.

LORD KINNEAR was absent.

THE COURT adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, except in so far as it decerned for the sum of £2153, 10s. 3d., with interest, &c., and in place thereof, of consent of parties, decerned for the amount of £2430, 1s. 6d., with interest on said sum at the rate of 4 per cent from said 1st September 1888 until payment, and found the pursuer entitled to additional expenses, &c.

MENZIES, BRUCE-LOW, & THOMSON, W.S.—DUNCAN SMITH & M'LAREN, S.S.C.—Agents.

THOMAS ROWLEY SEDDON, Petitioner.—Adam.

No. 25.

Minor and Pupil—Pupil children resident with father abroad—Payment of trust funds belonging to children.—A father domiciled in England, by the law of which he was not the guardian of his children's estate unless appointed to be so by the Court, presented a petition for himself and his two pupil children, craving the Court to ordain Scots testamentary trustees, who were in possession of a fund belonging to the children, to pay to the petitioner for their behoof the whole or a part of the annual income of the fund. The petition was presented

Nov. 13, 1891.
Seddon.

No. 25. with the consent and concurrence of the trustees. The Court refused to grant the order craved, but intimated that they would be prepared to reconsider the application on being informed by the petitioner that steps were being taken to have the children provided with a legal guardian.

Nov. 13, 1891.
Seddon.

1st Division.
Ld. Stormonth
Darling.

By his trust-disposition and settlement, Stephen Adam conveyed his whole estate to trustees, directing them to hold the shares falling to daughters during their lifetime, and to pay to them, or apply for their behoof, the annual income of such shares, the fee falling to their children.

The truster died on 25th May 1889, survived among other children by a daughter Helen, who, on 16th April 1884, had married Thomas Rowley Seddon. She died on 13th May 1891, after having attained majority, and leaving two children, the elder being three, and the younger less than one year old. During her lifetime her father's trustees had duly paid her the income of the share of his estate falling to her, and at her death her share was held by the trustees for behoof of her children.

On 9th September 1891 Thomas Rowley Seddon presented a petition to the Court, "for himself and for his children," and "with consent and concurrence" of Stephen Adam's testamentary trustees, in which he craved the Court to ordain the testamentary trustees of Stephen Adam to make payment to him, "for behoof of his children, . . . of the free yearly interest, or other free yearly income for the time, of the sum to which the said children are entitled under the said trust-disposition and settlement; or otherwise, to ordain the said trustees to make payment to the petitioner of such portion of the interest or other free annual income of the said sum as to your Lordships may seem proper for the suitable maintenance and education of his said children."

The petitioner stated;—The value of the share of Mr Stephen Adam's estate belonging to Mrs Seddon's children (which had not been realised) is estimated at between £7500 and £8500, and the free annual income in respect thereof is estimated at between £300 and £400. "There being no provision in Mr Stephen Adam's trust-disposition and settlement for keeping up the said trust after his daughters' respective deaths to the effect of holding the shares of said daughters for behoof of their issue, the said shares go to the issue of the daughters without limitation of any kind. The petitioner, however, does not desire the trustees to denude of the said trust so far as his children's shares are concerned, but has requested them to retain the management thereof for his children's behoof. The petitioner is not at present in a position, out of his own funds, to maintain and educate his children suitably to their positions and fortunes, having, in or about March 1890, been obliged, owing to his wife's then delicate state of health, to give up a lucrative appointment as manager of a sheep-run in New Zealand with a salary of £300 a-year, and although he has lately, with the assistance of friends, acquired for himself and another an extensive sheep-run in New Zealand, it will, owing to the arrangements on which he has obtained the purchase-money for the same, be a considerable number of years before he can apply any of the profits arising therefrom to his own uses. The petitioner was born in England, but had been resident in New Zealand for thirteen years prior to his return to this country as before mentioned, and he is about to return to New Zealand in the beginning of October 1891 in order to take possession of the property there acquired by him, and to have the same made suitable as a home for his said children, intending to return to England for them within a year. It is therefore necessary that an immediate arrangement should be made with a view to the maintenance of said children. The petitioner has requested Mr Stephen Adam's trustees to pay him the free decree in their favour. They were therefore not subject to review, and the appeal was incompetent.¹ Drummond's case was different from the present, the ground of decision there being, that when a Sheriff had disposed of the merits of an action without pronouncing any finding as to expenses, he was not entitled subsequently to deal with the question of expenses.

No. 26.

Nov. 14, 1891.
Macgillivray
v. Mackintosh.

The pursuer argued ;—It was not incompetent to appeal against a finding of expenses.² Further, it was clearly established by authority that it was competent to appeal against interlocutors which had been incompetently pronounced.³ In this case the interlocutors appealed against were incompetent. The interlocutor pronounced by the First Division on 17th March contained only a limited finding of expenses in the defenders' favour, and as the Sheriff Court expenses were not mentioned in that interlocutor, they must be held as not awarded.⁴ As the interlocutor of 17th March had exhausted the cause, the process ought not to have been transmitted to the Sheriff Court, and the subsequent interlocutors pronounced in the Sheriff Court were incompetent.⁵

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In considering the question raised by Mr Baillie as to the competency of this appeal, it is necessary to consider what is the substance and subject-matter of the appeal. The appeal is brought for the purpose of raising the question whether the Sheriff-substitute had the right to deal with the question of expenses at all. The appeal therefore impeaches the competency of the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, and that upon the ground that the judgment of this Court, of 17th March 1891, disposed finally of the question of expenses, by giving the defender the expenses in the Court of Session, and by leaving the rest alone. The appellant says that after this the Sheriff had no power to take up the question of expenses at all.

With regard to the merits of the appeal,—that is to say, the competency of the proceedings in the Sheriff Court,—I am of opinion that the appellant is right. When we see that the question to be raised under the appeal is a question of competency, we are brought straight to the case of Drummond v. Bryden, 8 Macph. 277. That case raised the question whether, after a Sheriff-principal had pronounced an interlocutor dismissing an action, and making no finding as to expenses, it was competent for the Sheriff or the Sheriff-substitute to pronounce further interlocutors dealing with the question of expenses ; and what the Second Division found, on appeal, was, that the later interlocutors were incompetently pronounced, in respect that the earlier interlocutor (that is the interlocutor dismissing the action), had exhausted the cause ; and they recalled those later and incompetent interlocutors. While the ground on which the plea of incompetency is maintained here is not the same as in Drummond's case, by reason of this case having been exhausted by interlocutor pronounced in this Court, and not by interlocutor pronounced in the Sheriff Court, the principle of that case, it appears to me, applies by parity of reasoning to the present.

¹ Tennents v. Romanes, June 22, 1881, 8 R. 824 ; Thomson & Company v. King, Jan. 19, 1883, 10 R. 469.

² Fleming v. North of Scotland Banking Company, Oct. 20, 1881, 9 R. 11.

³ Drummond v. Bryden, Dec. 10, 1869, 8 Macph. 277, 42 Scot. Jur. 125.

⁴ Grant v. Rose, June 30, 1835, 13 S. 1007, 7 Scot. Jur. 461 ; Macdonald v. MacEachan, Feb. 18, 1880, 7 R. 574.

⁵ Hamilton v. Bennet, &c., March 3, 1832, 10 S. 426, 4 Scot. Jur. 353.

No. 26. the agent of the other party is not entitled to decree in his own name for expenses to which his client has subsequently been found entitled.

Nov. 14, 1891.

Macgillivray
v. Mackintosh.

1st Division.

Sheriff of Inverness,
Nairn, and Morayshire.

IN an action of damages for breach of promise of marriage brought in the Sheriff Court at Nairn by Hugh McGillivray against Margaret Mackintosh and William Mackintosh, her husband, the Sheriff (Ivory) on 9th October 1890, pronounced an interlocutor to this effect:—"Finds that the pursuer has failed to justify his delay in insisting on the defender fulfilling her promise, and that the defender has proved that when she married William Mackintosh the contract which had been entered into between her and the pursuer had been abandoned, . . . Finds in law that the defender is not liable to the pursuer in damages: Therefore to the above extent and effect sustains the defences, assolvies the defender, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable to the defender in expenses, and remits to the Auditor to tax the amount thereof and report."

The pursuer having appealed, the First Division, on 17th March 1891, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Affirm the interlocutor of the Sheriff, dated 9th October 1890, in so far as it 'finds that the pursuer has failed to justify his delay in insisting on the defender fulfilling her promise, and that the defender has proved that when she married William Mackintosh the contract which had been entered into between her and the pursuer had been abandoned': Find also in law, in terms of said judgment, that the defender is not liable to the pursuer in damages, and to that extent sustain the defences: Assolvie the defender (respondent) from the conclusions of the libel, and decern: Find the appellant liable to the respondent in expenses in this Court, and remit the account thereof to the Auditor to tax and to report."

On 13th May the Court approved of the Auditor's report on the respondent's account of expenses, and decerned against the appellant for the taxed amount.

The process having been retransmitted to the Sheriff Court, the defenders had the account of expenses incurred by them in that Court audited, and thereafter enrolled the case, and moved the Sheriff-substitute to decern in their favour for the taxed amount.

On 13th July 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Rampini) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the account of expenses for the defenders, with the Auditor's report thereon, and the note of objections to the Auditor's report, sustains the objections to the first four items, amounting to £4, 16s.: Quoad ultra repels the objections, and with these variations approves of the Auditor's report: Finds that the defender's expenses, as taxed and adjusted in terms of these findings, amount to the sum of £48, 1s. 3d. sterling, and decerns against the pursuer in favour of the defenders for the same."

The pursuer appealed, and on 23d September the Sheriff (Ivory) dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the interlocutor appealed against; found the pursuer liable in the sum of £1, 1s. as the expenses of the appeal, and decerned against him for payment of that sum to the defenders.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session.

The defenders objected to the competency of the appeal, and argued;—In the Sheriff Court the appellant had maintained that the account of expenses should have been audited in the Court of Session. Now, he adopted a different attitude, maintaining that no expenses were due. The expenses in the Sheriff Court were carried by the decree for expenses in the Court of Session,¹ and the interlocutors in the Sheriff Court were pronounced merely for the purpose of enabling the defenders to work out the decree in their favour. They were therefore not subject to review, and the appeal was incompetent.¹ Drummond's case was different from the present, the ground of decision there being, that when a Sheriff had disposed of the merits of an action without pronouncing any finding as to expenses, he was not entitled subsequently to deal with the question of expenses.

¹ Sinclair v. Mossend Iron Co., May 30, 1855, 17 D. 784, 27 Scot. Jur. 406.

No. 26.

Nov. 14, 1891.
Macgillivray
v. Mackintosh.

The pursuer argued ;—It was not incompetent to appeal against a finding of expenses.² Further, it was clearly established by authority that it was competent to appeal against interlocutors which had been incompetently pronounced.³ In this case the interlocutors appealed against were incompetent. The interlocutor pronounced by the First Division on 17th March contained only a limited finding of expenses in the defenders' favour, and as the Sheriff Court expenses were not mentioned in that interlocutor, they must be held as not awarded.⁴ As the interlocutor of 17th March had exhausted the cause, the process ought not to have been transmitted to the Sheriff Court, and the subsequent interlocutors pronounced in the Sheriff Court were incompetent.⁵

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In considering the question raised by Mr Baillie as to the competency of this appeal, it is necessary to consider what is the substance and subject-matter of the appeal. The appeal is brought for the purpose of raising the question whether the Sheriff-substitute had the right to deal with the question of expenses at all. The appeal therefore impeaches the competency of the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, and that upon the ground that the judgment of this Court, of 17th March 1891, disposed finally of the question of expenses, by giving the defender the expenses in the Court of Session, and by leaving the rest alone. The appellant says that after this the Sheriff had no power to take up the question of expenses at all.

With regard to the merits of the appeal,—that is to say, the competency of the proceedings in the Sheriff Court,—I am of opinion that the appellant is right. When we see that the question to be raised under the appeal is a question of competency, we are brought straight to the case of Drummond v. Bryden, 8 Macph. 277. That case raised the question whether, after a Sheriff-principal had pronounced an interlocutor dismissing an action, and making no finding as to expenses, it was competent for the Sheriff or the Sheriff-substitute to pronounce further interlocutors dealing with the question of expenses ; and what the Second Division found, on appeal, was, that the later interlocutors were incompetently pronounced, in respect that the earlier interlocutor (that is the interlocutor dismissing the action), had exhausted the cause ; and they recalled those later and incompetent interlocutors. While the ground on which the plea of incompetency is maintained here is not the same as in Drummond's case, the reason of this case having been exhausted by interlocutor pronounced in this Court, and not by interlocutor pronounced in the Sheriff Court, the principle of that case, it appears to me, applies by parity of reasoning to the present.

¹ Tennents v. Romanes, June 22, 1881, 8 R. 824 ; Thomson & Company v. King, Jan. 19, 1883, 10 R. 469.

² Fleming v. North of Scotland Banking Company, Oct. 20, 1881, 9 R. 11.

³ Drummond v. Bryden, Dec. 10, 1869, 8 Macph. 277, 42 Scot. Jur. 125.

⁴ Grant v. Rose, June 30, 1835, 13 S. 1007, 7 Scot. Jur. 461 ; Macdonald v. M'Echan, Feb. 18, 1880, 7 R. 574.

⁵ Hamilton v. Bennet, &c., March 3, 1832, 10 S. 426, 4 Scot. Jur. 353.

No. 26. Our decision does not interfere with the authority of the cases of Tennents v. Romanes and Thomson v. King, quoted by Mr Baillie, in which the essential element of the incompetency of the judgment appealed against is wanting.

Nov. 14, 1891.
Macgillivray
v. Mackintosh.

LORD ADAM.—The first interlocutor brought under appeal is the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 13th July 1891, whereby he “finds that the defenders’ expenses . . . amount to the sum of £48, 1s. 3d. sterling, and decerns against the pursuer in favour of the defenders for the same.” That interlocutor was appealed to the Sheriff, who on 23d September adhered, finding the pursuer liable in a small sum of additional expenses.

It is to be observed that these interlocutors disposed only of the question of expenses, and it is on that ground that Mr Baillie objects to the competency of the appeal, and he refers to the case of Tennents v. Romanes. That case seems to me to have no bearing on the present. It was a case in which an interlocutor was pronounced disposing of the merits of the cause, and also dealing with the question of expenses. No appeal was taken against that interlocutor, and it was extracted, and then an interlocutor was pronounced decerning for the taxed amount of the expenses. The Lord President then said,—“To bring up to this Court a decree for expenses, to the effect of letting the appellant get into a review of the interlocutors upon the merits, would be, by a mere evasion, to set at naught the provisions of the statute”—that is to say, when the interlocutor disposing of the merits and expenses of the cause had become final, it would have been an evasion of the statute to reopen the case by an appeal against the decree for expenses. I agree with that statement of the Lord President, but the case is not the same here. The present appeal is taken on the ground that the interlocutors appealed against were incompetently pronounced, and there is authority for the view that, when a decree for expenses has been incompetently pronounced, it may be appealed against.

On the merits—that is to say, the question whether the interlocutors appealed against were incompetently pronounced—I agree in thinking that they were. I have no doubt that the interlocutor of this Court, dated 17th March last, disposed of the whole cause. After findings in fact and law, it proceeds:—“Assoilzie the defender (respondent) from the conclusions of the libel, and decern: Find the appellant liable to the respondent in expenses in this Court.” That appears to me to be the only valid finding of expenses in this case. The case of Sinclair v. Mossend Iron Company, 17 D. 784, where a general finding of expenses in this Court was held to carry expenses in the Court below, appears to me to have no bearing on the present, because, where there is a special finding of expenses in favour of a party, that necessarily excludes a general finding in his favour. If that is so, as there was no remit to the Sheriff to deal with the question of expenses, I do not see what authority he had to take up the case at all. When the case was brought before him he ought to have found that he could not deal competently with it. I agree, therefore, that the whole proceedings in the Sheriff Court after the interlocutor of this Court of 17th March last were incompetent.

LORD M'LAREN.—By its interlocutor of 17th March 1891 the Court of Session dealt with the first appeal, and, as I think, exhausted the conclusions of the action, and in doing so, we pronounced a finding of expenses in this Court in favour of the defender, but nothing was said of the expenses in the Sheriff Court. It appears to me to follow that it is not competent after that interlocutor of the Court of Session for the Sheriff to entertain a motion on the subject of expenses, No. 26.

the conclusions of the action being exhausted.

On the question of authority, I agree with your Lordship in the chair that Nov. 14, 1891.
Macgillivray
v. Mackintosh.
there is complete parity of reasoning between this case and the case of Drummond v. Bryden. Why we did not give the defender expenses in the Sheriff Court, I do not know. If the Sheriff had power to review Court of Session judgments, possibly cause might have been shewn for altering our decision. The only tribunal, however, now open to the defender is the House of Lords, and I am not sure that even that remedy is available, because I believe it is a rule of that Court not to entertain appeals merely on the subject of costs.

On 27th October the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the interlocutors pronounced in the Sheriff Court subsequent to 17th March 1891 were incompetently pronounced, in respect that the interlocutor of this Court of 17th March exhausted the cause, and the Sheriff had no further power to deal with the expenses of process: Find that this appeal is competent: Recall the interlocutors appealed against, and decern: Find the appellant entitled to the expenses in this Court and in the Sheriff Court subsequent to 17th March 1891," &c.

After taxation, the appellant, on 14th November following, moved for approval of the Auditor's report, and asked for decree in name of the agent-disburser.¹

The defenders opposed the motion, stating that the account of expenses in the first appeal, for which they had obtained decree, had not been paid. The appeals were both taken in the same action, and it was only in cases where the subject-matter of two appeals in actions between the same parties was different that compensation was not pleadable.²

LORD ADAM.—I think the rule is that if there are separate actions between the same parties, as in the cases cited by Mr Rhind, the agent for the party in the one case is entitled to decree in his own name as agent-disburser, and therefore the other party cannot set off against that decree a decree obtained by him in the other action. But it is also, I think, equally established that where one of the parties in an action has obtained decree for expenses in the action, the agent of the other party is not entitled to decree in his own name for expenses to which his client has been found entitled. In that case the agent-disburser is not entitled to decree in his own name, and the one account must be set against the other.

In the present case, there is only the one action, and the two accounts have both been incurred in connection with it. It makes no difference that they were incurred upon separate appeals.

LORD M'LAREN.—The rule that compensation of accounts of expenses does not take effect in the case of different actions is a convenient one, because the Judge in the second action may not be the same who decided the first action, and may not have the necessary knowledge of what was done in it. The attempt to set off the expenses in the one action against the expenses in the other might involve an inquiry and further expense. But where both accounts have been

¹ Stuart v. Moss, Feb. 6, 1886, 13 R. 572; Paterson v. Wilson, Dec. 20, 1883, 11 R. 358.

² Strain v. Strain, March 7, 1890, 17 R. 566.

No. 26. incurred in the one action, the Court has full cognisance of the facts of the case, and can deal with the whole subject of expenses. It is quite consistent with the known principles of compensation that in such a case the one account should be set off against the other. I think the accounts here have been incurred in one action, and I therefore think that Mr Rhind's motion that we should grant decree in name of the agent-disburser should be refused.

Nov. 14, 1891.
Macgillivray
v. Mackintosh.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think the rule is quite fixed that compensation may be pleaded where cross awards of expenses have been made in the same action, but not between awards of expenses in different actions. In addition to the reason suggested by Lord McLaren there is this further reason why compensation should not be pleadable in the case of separate actions, viz, that the agent-disburser's right to take decree in his own name cannot be cut down by extrinsic claims of compensation between the adverse parties, and the debt arising from a decree for expenses in another action is clearly an extrinsic debt.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT approved of the Auditor's report, and decerned in favour of the appellant for the taxed amount of expenses.

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—WATT & ANDERSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 27. JOHN TURNBULL SMITH AND ANOTHER (Liquidators of the Benhar Coal Company, Limited), Petitioners.—Pitman.

Nov. 17, 1891.
Liquidators of Benhar Coal Co.,
Limited.

Process—Correction of error in date in a decree—Nobile officium.—The liquidator of a limited company having presented a note to the Court for authority to sell the superiority of subjects feued by the company under a feu-contract, dated 24th and 29th September 1878, obtained a decree in terms thereof. On its being discovered after the sale that the true dates of the feu-contract were 24th and 27th September 1878, the Court allowed correction of the error in the note, and granted warrant to make a similar correction on the extract decree and record copy thereof.

1ST DIVISION.

ON 19th January 1882, in a note at the instance of the liquidators of the Benhar Coal Company, the Court granted authority to sell the superiority of certain ground feued by the company, and to grant the necessary disposition in favour of the purchaser. After the sale it was discovered by the purchaser's agents that the date of the feu-contract under which the ground was held was wrongly stated in the note—the feu-contract having been described as “of date 24th and 29th September 1878, whereas the true date was 24th and 27th September 1878. The error was continued in the extract decree which was thereafter obtained, and the liquidators now applied to the Court “to authorise the correction of the foresaid error in said note, and also to grant warrant to the Principal Extractor of Court to make the corresponding alteration on the extract decree thereafter pronounced, and to the Deputy Keeper of the Records to make the corresponding alteration in the record copy of the said decree, by substituting the date ‘24th and 27th September’ as the proper date of said feu-contract, in place of ‘24th and 29th September.’ The Court, after taking time to consider the case, granted the prayer of the note.¹

J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S., Agents.

¹ Authorities cited.—William White and Others (Small's Trustees), July 1856, 18 D. 1210; Hope v. Hamilton, July 1, 1851, 13 D. 1268, 23 Scot. J. 571.

GREAT BRITAIN STEAMSHIP PREMIUM ASSOCIATION, Pursuers

No. 28.

(Appellants).—*Ure.*JAMES L. WHYTE, Defender (Respondent).—*D.-F. Balfour—Salvesen.*Nov. 17, 1891.
Great Britain
Steamship
Premium
Association v.
Whyte.

Stamp-duty—Sea insurance—Time policy, including a number of ships—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1867 (30 Vict. c. 23), sec. 1, schedule B, and sec. 4—Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. c. 63), sec. 1 (b).—The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1867, sec. 1, enacts that there shall be charged the several duties respectively specified in schedules A, B, and C to the Act.

Schedule B,*—“ . . . For every policy of sea insurance for time, in respect of every full sum of £100, and in respect of any fractional part of £100 thereby insured, where the insurance shall be made for any time not exceeding six months, 3d.”

Sec. 4† defines sea insurance as meaning, inter alia, “any insurance . . . made upon any ship or vessel.”

Section 1‡ of the Interpretation Act, 1889, provides—(1) that in any Act passed after 1850, unless the contrary shall appear (b) words in the singular shall include the plural, and words in the plural shall include the singular.

Held that a time policy of insurance embracing a number of vessels with separate sums insured on each was properly stamped at the duty corresponding to the aggregate sum insured.

On 30th November 1887 John Holman & Sons, shipowners and insurance brokers, London, on behalf of themselves and all persons interested, insured with J. L. Whyte, merchant, Glasgow, and certain other underwriters, 119 steamers, mentioned in a list attached to the policy, for the space of 133 days from 10th October 1887. The policy effecting this insurance was underwritten by Mr Whyte for the sum of £1450, and the aggregate amount insured was £34,690, each vessel having a specific portion of that sum appropriated to it, and the sum being ascertained by adding together the several sums specified as insured on each item comprehended in the policy. Nine of the steamers were insured for full

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

* Schedule B of 30 Vict. c. 23, provides,—“For every policy of sea insurance for or upon any voyage, in respect of every full sum of £100, and in respect of any fractional part of £100 thereby insured, 3d. In every policy of sea insurance for time in respect of every full sum of £100, and in respect of any fractional part of £100 thereby insured, where the insurance shall be made for any time not exceeding six months, 3d.; where the insurance shall be made for any time exceeding six months, and not exceeding twelve months, 6d. But if the separate and distinct interests of two or more persons shall be insured by one policy for a voyage or for time, then the duty of 3d., or the duty of 3d. or 6d., as the case may require, shall be charged thereon in respect of every full sum of £100 and every fractional part of £100 thereby insured upon any separate or distinct interest.” This last provision as to “separate and distinct interests” was repealed by the Revenue Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict. c. 62), sec. 8 (3).

† Section 4 provides,—“In this Act the expression ‘sea insurance’ means any insurance (including re-insurance) made upon any ship or vessel, or upon the machinery, tackle, or furniture of any ship or vessel, or upon any goods, merchandise, or property of any description whatever on board of any ship or vessel, or upon the freight of or any other interest which may be lawfully insured in or relating to any ship or vessel; and the word ‘policy’ means any instrument whereby a contract or agreement for any sea insurance is made or entered into.”

‡ The Interpretation Act, 1889, sec. 1, enacts,—“(1) In this Act, and in every Act passed after the year 1850, whether before or after the commencement of this Act, unless the contrary intention appears (b) words in the singular shall include the plural, and words in the plural shall include the singular.”

No. 28. sums of one or more hundreds of pounds, while the remaining 110 ships were insured for sums which included a fractional part of £100.

Nov. 17, 1891.
Great Britain
Steamship
Premium
Association v.
Whyte.

The amount for which the policy was stamped was £4, 6s. 9d.

In January 1888 three of the ships named in the policy were wrecked, and became total losses.

In May 1890 the Great Britain Steamship Premium Association, with consent of John Holman & Sons, raised an action against James L. Whyte for payment of the sum of £43, 17s. 9d. as the amount due to them in respect of the total loss of these three steamers on the sum underwritten by the defender. The pursuers in cond. 2 averred that they were insured by the policy to the amount of the sums entered against each vessel in the list in the event of a total loss of the vessels.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) Said policy not being duly stamped, pursuers are not entitled to sue thereon, and the present action should be dismissed, with costs.

On 10th July 1890, the Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the second plea stated by the defender, that the document No. 7/1 of process founded on by pursuers is insufficiently stamped, will fall to be sustained," &c.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Berry) adhered, and remitted to the Sheriff-substitute for further procedure.*

* "NOTE.—The document 7/1, in regard to which a question of stamp has been raised, bears to insure a number of steam vessels for a period of 133 days from a certain date. There are 119 vessels included in the insurance, and the aggregate amount insured is £34,690; but each vessel has a specific portion of that amount appropriated to it. The document has been stamped as if it were one policy, and the question is whether the stamp is sufficient, or whether the document should not be regarded as in effect 119 different policies, and liable to be stamped as such.

"The Act 30 Vict. cap. 23, regulates the stamp-duty on sea insurances, and, by schedule B, a duty of 3d. is imposed for every policy of sea insurance for time in respect of every full sum of £100 and in respect of any fractional part of £100 thereby insured. The interpretation clause (section 4) of the Act declares the expression 'sea insurance' to mean 'any insurance made upon any ship or vessel,' and the word 'policy' to mean 'any instrument whereby a contract for sea insurance is made or entered into.' In light of this clause, the words 'upon any ship or vessel' must be held as inserted after the word 'insurance' in the schedule, and so reading the schedule, I think that, under the language of this statute considered by itself, the insurance on each individual vessel would be understood as a separate insurance, and consequently, that we should have here 119 different policies. But the Interpretation Act, 1889, has been appealed to as having a controlling or governing effect on the construction of all Acts of Parliament passed within the last forty years. By section 1 of that Act, re-enacting a similar provision in a repealed Act of 1850, it is provided that in every Act passed after 1850, 'unless the contrary intention appears, . . . words in the singular shall include the plural.' Hence it is said the words 'upon any ship or vessel' in the Stamp Act, 30 Vict. cap. 23, should be read as including a case of insurance 'upon any ships or vessels,' and consequently the document here should be viewed as a single policy, although it bears to insure a number of vessels. In aid of the argument on this point, reference is further made to the principle that revenue statutes should be construed strictly against the revenue, and favourably to private persons. I am unable to give effect to this argument. If we are to apply the Interpretation Act to the Stamp Act, and read the words 'ship or vessel' as if they were 'ships or vessels,' we must at the same time read other nouns in the same sentence as being also in the plural. In this way we are brought to a definition of 'sea insurances' in the plural, and in ascertaining the meaning of 'sea insurance' in

The Sheriff-substitute, on 8th January 1891, sustained the defender's second plea in law, and dismissed the action. No. 28.

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—Section 4 of the Act of 1867 must be read in the light of section 1 (b) of the Interpretation Act of 1889. As the “contrary intention” in the words of the latter Act did not appear in the Act of 1867, the words “upon any ship or vessel” must be read as including a case of insurance “upon any ships or vessels.” Consequently the document here must be viewed as a single policy, although it bore to insure a number of vessels.¹ If there was any doubt, the Revenue Statute must be construed strictly against the revenue, and in favour of the holder of the policy. But, further, the stamp was in exact accordance with the schedule, which contained no indication that the duty was dependent upon the number of subjects covered by the insurance.

Nov. 17, 1891.
Great Britain
Steamship
Premium
Association v.
Whyte.

Argued for the defender;—The policy of the statute was to charge duty for each separate risk insured. Here, there were 119 separate risks, and the duty must be calculated not upon the aggregate sum insured, but upon each separate risk, i.e., on each separate vessel. The Interpretation Act, 1889, did not apply, as there was here a contrary intention in the sense of the Act. The case of the Magistrates of Glasgow had little bearing upon the present case. In it, it was true, a former Interpretation Act (13 Vict. c. 21, sec. 4), was held applicable, but the Court were driven to this construction, for it was absolutely essential to the working of the Roads and Bridges Act as regarded the question in the case.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—The policy sued on is a “policy of sea insurance for time,” not exceeding six months, on 119 steamers, “as per list attached”; and no objection is stated to it except that it is not duly stamped. If the law were that only one ship can be insured by one policy, this policy would be invalid irrespective of the Stamp Act, but it is not contended that the law is so, or that two or any number of ships may not be insured by one policy.

I therefore assume that at the common law, and irrespective of the Stamp Act, the policy sued on is a valid policy of sea insurance for the time specified on the 119 steamers named in the list attached, and on this assumption proceed to consider the objection that it is, according to that Act, insufficiently stamped. That objection is that, inasmuch as each of the 119 steamers might have been insured by a separate policy, the stamp on the one policy that comprehends them all must equal in amount the sum of the 119 stamps which would have been used had there been 119 policies, one on each steamer, for the sum set against it in attached list. If this view be sound, the objection is good, and otherwise not, for it is founded on no other. I am very clearly of opinion that it is unsound.

The statute which governs the matter of duty on policies of sea insurance is the singular are left to the guidance of the provision in the Stamp Act itself, under which an insurance on any single ship falls, in my judgment, to be treated as a separate and distinct insurance. The unreasonableness of reading one word in the plural while others in the same sentence are left in the singular, might be exemplified by reading the clause which defines the word ‘policy’ thus, that that word in the singular means ‘any instruments, &c.,’ in the plural. •

“The Sheriff-substitute has dealt with the case as if the insurances here were voyage, and not time policies; the arguments, however, which apply to the two cases do not seem to differ in principle. I agree with him in the result that the document in question is not sufficiently stamped as one policy.”

¹ Magistrates of Glasgow v. Police Commissioners of Hillhead, March 20, 1885, 12 R. 864.

No. 28. 30 Vict. c. 23, and it enacts that the stamp-duty on any such policy for time not exceeding six months shall be 3d., "in respect of every full sum of £100 and in respect of any fractional part of £100 thereby insured." The sum insured by the policy in question is £34,690, i.e., the full sum of £100, 346 times repeated, and one fractional part of £100, so that the stamp ought to be of the amount of value of 347 times 3d., or £4, 6s. 9d., and it is of that amount exactly.

Nov. 17, 1891.
Great Britain
Steamship
Premium
Association v.
Whyte.

The sum insured by the policy is ascertained by adding together the several sums specified as insured on each item comprehended in the policy. But in this there is nothing wrong or unusual. It is on the contrary the familiar, invariable, and I should have thought necessary practice in all policies whether against sea perils or fire. There is no possible objection to a policy embracing any number of items, each insured for a specified sum, and none that I see, or can imagine, against such items being all or some of them steamers, any more than against their consisting of any kind of cargo, pictures, or machinery, or anything else quite capable of being each of them insured by a separate policy. The idea of calculating and estimating the stamp-duty on a policy which embraces several items, not by taking their aggregate amounts, but by supposing that each had been the subject of a separate policy is, so far as I know, quite novel, and I think inadmissible.

I cannot comprehend the view of the Sheriff when he says that he is unable to give effect to the argument that "the document (the policy) here should be viewed as a single policy, although it bears to insure a number of vessels," and that, in his opinion, "we should have here 119 different policies." We have in fact only one policy, and if it is incapable of insuring a number of vessels, we cannot, as I have pointed out, reach any question about the stamp, for no stamp whatever would validate it. On the other hand, if the policy is by the common law capable of insuring a number of vessels and the only question is what stamp (if any) ought by statute to be impressed on it, the legitimate and logical result of the Sheriff's reading of the statute is that this policy does not fall under it, and so need not be stamped at all, for the statute alone can subject it to stamp-duty. The Sheriff's reading of the statute is, that stamp-duty is thereby imposed only on a policy of sea insurance "upon any ship or vessel," the singular "ship or vessel" being incapable, either by the rules of the common law, or by virtue of the Interpretation Act of 1889, of being read in the plural "ships or vessels."

It seems to me that the legitimate and logical result of this view is, that a policy of sea insurance on "ships or vessels" does not fall under the taxing enactment. I need hardly say that the view is, in my opinion, altogether wrong. I see no objection whatever to the applicability of the Interpretation Act, although, as I should reach the same result without it, I regard it as superfluous to the point in question.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—The only question raised by this appeal is whether the policy on which the pursuers found their claim is or is not duly stamped. The Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute are agreed in thinking that the policy is not duly stamped and accordingly the action has been dismissed. I differ from the view which has thus been sustained.

The policy in question is curiously expressed. It bears to be a policy

"premiums of insurance" on certain ships. But it was represented at the bar as a proper time policy on the ships themselves, and it can be so read. I take it therefore as a policy of insurance effected over 119 ships, named in the list appended to the policy, for a period of 133 days. The amount or value of the interest insured in regard to each ship is noted against the name of each ship, and I observe that out of the 119 ships only nine of them are insured for full sums of one or more hundreds of pounds, while the remaining 110 ships are insured for sums which include a fractional part of £100. No. 28.
Nov. 17, 1891.
Great Britain
Steamship
Premium
Association v.
Whyte.

The total amount insured is £34,690, and the stamp impressed on the policy covers, (at the rate of 3d. on every £100 or fractional part of £100, being the duty payable on time policies for a period of less than six months), a sum of £34,700. The stamp is therefore sufficient, if the total sum insured is alone regarded. But the defender's contention is that this is not one policy but 119 policies—one over each ship named—and that the stamp-duty is to be reckoned on each £100 or fractional part of £100 for which each vessel is insured.

The determination of the question before us depends on the terms and construction of the Act 30 Vict. cap. 23, which provides that, after the passing thereof, certain duties set forth in schedule B annexed to the Act shall be payable on policies of sea insurance in place of the duties previously exigible. By section 4 of this Act, the expression "sea insurance" is defined to mean "any insurance (including re-insurance) made upon any ship or vessel, or upon the machinery, tackle, or furniture of any ship or vessel, or upon any goods, merchandise or property of any description whatever on board of any ship or vessel, or upon the freight of, or any other interest which may be lawfully insured in or relating to any ship or vessel." Upon the terms of this clause the defender maintains that the words "any ship or vessel" must be read strictly as expressed in the singular number, and as meaning "any one ship or vessel"; that where two or more ships are covered by the one policy the insurances must be distinct, and duty paid on each as if it were the sole insurance; that, so regarded, the policy founded on is insufficiently stamped.

I do not regard this 4th section of the statute as having very much to do with the question before us. It is an interpretation clause, and nothing more, for defining what shall come within the term "sea insurance"; but as both parties are agreed that the policy sued on is a policy of sea insurance within the meaning of the Act, requiring to be stamped as there provided, any appeal to the interpretation clause to ascertain what is thus admitted seems unnecessary and superfluous. But further, it appears to me that the defender's reading of the clause in question cannot be accepted. The Interpretation Act, 1889, has provided that in all Acts passed since 1850, "unless a contrary intention appear," words in the singular shall include the plural, and the present case seems to be one to which the provisions of the Interpretation Act are applicable. Certainly no "contrary intention" appears on the face of the Act we are construing. Besides, if we read the 4th section of the Act of 1867 in the manner proposed by the defender, such a reading would be destructive of the plea which that reading is set forth to support. The defender says that under the clause referred to a sea insurance is an insurance over any,—that is, over any one ship or vessel. Well, if that is so, the policy in question—which is one over a great many ships—is not a policy of sea insurance within the Act of 1867. Not being a policy of sea insurance within the meaning of that Act, it would require

No. 28. no stamp at all, as that Act is the only one in force which requires stamp-duty to be paid on policies of sea insurance.

Nov. 17, 1891.
Great Britain
Steamship
Premium
Association v.
Whyte.

As I have said, however, the 4th clause of the Act of 1867 is not of much, if any, importance in the decision of this case. The part of the Act with which we are really concerned is the schedule B annexed to the Act, which is specially declared (section 1) to be a part of the Act. The terms of that schedule leave no room for doubt as to the cases in which stamp-duty is exigible, or as to the amount of the duty required to be paid. It provides that, "in every policy of sea insurance for time," where the time does not exceed six months, there shall be paid a duty of 3d., "in respect of every full sum of £100, and in respect of any fractional part of £100 thereby insured." Now, apply that to the present case. We have a time policy of sea insurance for less than six months whereby there is insured a sum of £34,690. There must be paid a duty of 3d. per £100 on each of the 346 hundreds insured and 3d. more for the odd £90, the fractional part of a hundred. This has been done. It will be observed that the schedule does not say that the duty is at all dependent on the number of subjects which the insurance covers, but gives as the only standard for ascertaining the duty payable the amount insured. And that this is not only in accordance with the words of the schedule, but is in full accordance with its intention, becomes, I think, plain when the concluding part of the schedule is considered. That part of the schedule to which I am about to refer has been repealed, but it may still be referred to, as I propose to do, for the purpose of throwing light upon the meaning and intent of the provisions preceding it which are still operative. The schedule provides that where "separate and distinct interests of two or more persons" shall be insured by one policy, duty shall be payable on each separate interest at the same rate according to the amount or value of the interest "thereby insured." What the separate and distinct interests are which are here referred to may be learned from the terms of the fourth or definition clause I have already quoted. They are the interests of the shipowner in his ship, the merchant in his cargo, it may be of a charterer in the freight, or a mortgagee for his debt secured over the ship. These interests may be involved in, and insurance thereof may cover, one or many subjects in which the interest is centred. Thus, the merchant or shipper may insure a cargo at £10,000, but he may have declared or estimated in a list appended to the policy the value of different parts of the cargo at various sums. This would not make a separate policy for each part of the cargo, each paying its appropriate stamp-duty. The interest is £10,000—that is the sum insured,—and the fact of that aggregate interest or value being distributed over different parts of the cargo would make no difference, according to the Act, in the duty payable in respect of the insurance. So, in the present case what is insured is the shipowner's interest to the extent of £34,690 distributed over various vessels. It is, however, one interest. The fact that the statute provided for the separate insurance stamp-duty in respect of separate interests, and made no reference to the several subjects in which that interest might be centred, seems to me to indicate clearly that in estimating the stamp-duty the several interests were to be regarded, and that the several subjects in which the interest insured exists were not. The words of the statute are that stamp-duty is to be paid on the sum insured under the policy, and this was the correct language to use. It is said popularly that the ship is insured—the cargo and freight are insured. But in fact it is not the ship, cargo, or freight that is insured. It is the insurer's money interest in any or all of these subjects, and therefore I say that the language of the statute is strictly accurate when it speaks of the sum as insured, and not the subject of which that sum is the expressed value. No. 28.

I am of opinion that the interlocutors appealed against should be recalled, the defender's second plea in law repelled, and the case remitted back to the Sheriff to proceed therein. Nov. 17, 1891.
Great Britain
Steamship
Premium
Association v.
Whyte.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have had considerable difficulty in making up my mind upon this case. I was very much moved by the able argument addressed to us for the respondent, but after reconsidering the case, with the aid of your Lordships' advice, I have come ultimately to be of opinion that the judgments of the Sheriffs are wrong.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repel the second plea in law stated by the defender . . . and to that extent recall the interlocutor appealed against . . . Quoad ultra remit the cause to the Sheriff-substitute, with instructions to proceed therein as accords."

J. & J. Ross, W.S.—EMSLIE & GUTHRIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

DAVID JAMES LOW, Pursuer (Respondent).—Shaw—C. N. Johnston. No. 29.
MRS MARIANNA MICALLEY OR LOW, Defender (Reclaimer).—Shennan—Younger. Nov. 19, 1891.
Low v. Low.

Jurisdiction—Foreign—Divorce—Domicile—Matrimonial domicile—Separation—Capacity of separated wife to acquire separate domicile.—Held (diss. Lord Young) that where a Scotsman has retained his domicile of origin the fact that he has married the native of a foreign country, and has had his home there for years, does not deprive the Scots Courts of jurisdiction in a question of divorce.

A Scotsman, born in Scotland in 1844, entered the navy at the age of eighteen, and served at sea for four years, when he was married (in 1866) in Malta to a Maltese woman. In the following year he was appointed to a post in the Admiral Superintendent's office in Malta, in which he served till 1873, when he was put upon half pay. He then returned with his wife and family to Scotland, and tried, but failed, to get a situation there. He got one in London. After living for about eight months in the United Kingdom he was seized with bronchitis, and on recovering, was advised by his doctor to go to a warmer climate. He returned with his wife and family to Malta, completely recovering his health, and held various positions there in connection with the navy till 1879, when he was appointed storekeeper in the Naval Hospital there. This appointment rendered him liable to be transferred to any ship or station in the event of war, and could be retained by him till he attained the age of fifty-five, i.e., till the year 1899, when he would have to retire, receiving a pension. After 1873 he returned to Scotland only on two occasions, for two months in 1885, and again in 1890, when he came to give instructions for divorce proceedings against his wife. He had three sons, one of whom had been sent to Scotland for some time, and afterwards went abroad; the second held a situation in Scotland; and the third, born in 1878, was at school in Malta. In 1887 the spouses agreed to live apart, executed a deed of separation, and obtained authority from the Court of Malta to live apart from each other, as required by Maltese law. The deed of separation provided that in the event of the wife incurring "any grievous fault," the present deed should not bar divorce actions before the competent tribunals in the United Kingdom.

In 1890 the husband raised an action of divorce in the Court of Session, and the wife having objected to the jurisdiction of the Scots Court, a proof was led, in which the facts already stated were proved, and the husband, in addition, deposed that he had always intended to return to Scotland, and did so still,

No. 29. Held that the husband had never abandoned his domicile of origin in Scotland, that the wife had not, by virtue of the deed of separation, acquired right to set up a domicile for herself, and that the long period of married life spent in Malta would not avail to create a jurisdiction in the Maltese Courts, so as to oust the jurisdiction of the Courts of the domicile; diss. Lord Young, who was of opinion that considerations of utility and expediency demanded that the Courts of Malta, as the "matrimonial domicile," should alone be appealed to.

2d Division. Nov. 19, 1891. Low v. Low. Ld. Wellwood. On 23d May 1890 David James Low, designing himself as "at present residing at No. 30 Minto Street, Edinburgh," which was his father's house, raised an action of divorce on the head of adultery against his wife, Mrs Marianna Micalley or Low, "presently residing at Sliema, in the island of Malta."

The defender pleaded that the Court had no jurisdiction.

A proof was led. It appeared that the pursuer was born in Scotland, of Scots parents, in 1844. In 1862 he entered the navy, and served in various ships. In 1866, when he was assistant paymaster in the Mediterranean fleet, he was married in Malta to the defender, who was a born Maltese. In the same year he was transferred to another ship, and in 1867 was appointed to a post in the Admiral Superintendent's office at Malta. In January 1873 he was placed on the retired list, with a pension of 5s. a-day. A few weeks afterwards he returned to Scotland with his wife and family. He lived in his father's house in Edinburgh, and tried to get employment in Edinburgh. He did not succeed in getting employment there, but held a position as a clerk for a short time in a merchant's office in London.

Towards the end of the year 1873 he was attacked with acute bronchitis, and when he recovered, was advised by his doctor to go abroad. He accordingly returned to Malta with his wife and family, and held various positions in the naval service till 1879, when he was appointed storekeeper and cashier to the Naval Hospital there. His health was completely restored. The conditions of this appointment were that, while he held it, he should be available for service anywhere, afloat or ashore, in the event of war, and that he must retire at the age of fifty-five, i.e., in 1899, when he would be entitled to claim a pension.

After 1873 he returned in 1885 to Scotland, to his father's house, for two months, but did not again visit Scotland till 1890, when he came to see about divorce proceedings. Of his three sons, the eldest came to Scotland, and lived with his grandfather for some time, seeking an appointment in the army or navy. He was unable to get one, and went abroad to Demerara; the second son was a clerk in Edinburgh, living with his grandfather; and the third, a boy of twelve, lived with his father in Malta.

In 1887 the spouses quarrelled, and presented a petition to the Maltese Court. The Maltese law allows no divorce a vinculo, and to authorise man and wife to live apart it is necessary that the authority of the Court be interponed.

On 12th February the Maltese Court pronounced this judgment:—"The Court having ineffectually recommended a reconciliation to petitioners, and after having duly warned them, has granted the request, and has authorised petitioners to execute the deed of separation according to the terms of the draft countersigned by the Judge."

A deed of separation was accordingly executed setting forth, as a preamble, a declaration by the spouses, without stating other grounds for a separation, with the object of avoiding publicity, that, cohabitation between them being impossible, on account of mutual disagreement, they have entered into the present deed of separation by "mutual consent," after obtaining to that effect the authorisation of the Second Hall of Her Majesty's Civil Court. There were various provisions as to the allowance to be paid to the wife, the care of the children, the household furniture, &c., and then followed these conditions, viz.:—" (Sixth) That this deed shall not be prejudicial to the rights appertaining to the appearer, David Low, in case the appearer, Marianna Low, shall incur in any grievous fault as foreseen by article 44 of ordinance, No. 1 of 1873, the commission of which fault, according to the aforesaid ordinance, No. 1 of 1873, would make her forfeit the allowance as established in clause third of the present deed. (Seventh) That in the event foreseen in clause six, the present deed shall not bar the exercise of the divorce actions to be, if ever, entered into before the competent tribunals in England." Among the grievous faults referred to was adultery.

No. 29.

Nov. 19, 1891.
Low v. Low.

Most of the witnesses, among them both the spouses, were examined on commission. The pursuer deponed,—“ I consider Scotland as my home, to which I intend, D. V., to return on the expiration of my present appointment. I have my father, three brothers, two sisters, and my second son living there, as well as nearly all my relations. . . . Cross-examined. —Decidedly I intend to return to Scotland. I have always cherished that intention, and I have spoken in conversation about it. I may mention Dr Messer.”

The pursuer's father deponed,—“ Pursuer is a very ardent Scotchman, and keeps St Andrew's day, hoisting the Scotch flag, and having heather on the table, and all that sort of thing. In any of his correspondence or communications with me pursuer has never indicated a desire or intention to settle in Malta.”

Dr Messer spoke only of the period subsequent to the separation. He deponed,—“ (Q.) Are you aware that the pursuer cherishes the intention of returning to Scotland at the expiration of his present appointment, and has he so expressed himself to you? (A.) He has frequently told me that he intended to return to Scotland, since my appointment here in Malta in May 1888.”

On the other hand the defender deponed,—“ My husband never said he intended to return to Scotland, on the contrary he always expressed a desire to settle permanently in Malta, and it was on that account that he got his appointment as storekeeper in the Royal Naval Hospital, Malta. During the twenty years we lived together he never spoke of returning to Scotland for good. I produce a letter to shew his intention.”*

The Lord Ordinary (Wellwood), on 11th June 1891, pronounced an interlocutor, repelling the defender's plea of no jurisdiction, found “ facts, circumstances, and qualifications proved relevant to infer the defender's guilt of adultery,” and accordingly gave decree.†

* The letter was written on 4th July 1867 from H.M.S. “ Hydra ” by the pursuer to the defender. It ran thus:—“ . . . My own, own dear sweet little wifey, I have thought of a plan to do if all others fail about my leaving the service ; it certainly is going down in the world, but I don't care for that, or for anything people may think. What I thought of was to get Carnana to take me into partnership with him. I could keep his books, and by being English I could perhaps get him more custom on board ships. What do you think of it? What do I care for but to live quietly and comfortably with my darling wifey? Write and tell me what you think. . . . ”

† “ NOTE.—(After stating the facts)—Balancing these considerations, I do not think that the advantage lies with the defender. The most serious point against the pursuer is his acceptance of the appointment which he at present holds. That appointment, although not permanent, was one which, at its commencement, had about twenty years to run, and it is no doubt an important ele-

No. 29.

Nov. 19, 1891.
Low v. Low.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—There was a series of cases beginning with cases of Anglo-Indian domicile, which established that residence abroad, although official residence, would, if long continued, set up a domicile there, even although there might be a floating intention present of ultimately returning to the natale solum when the period of office was out, or a sufficient fortune made.¹ The appointment here was for a long period, and of the same character as the appointment held in the cases referred to. It had been said that, in order to divest himself of his domicile of origin a man must intend to become a foreigner,² but that doctrine had been exploded in the subsequent case of Udny.³ It was not necessary to shew that the pursuer intended to have all his rights regulated by Maltese law.⁴ If a matrimonial domicile had been established in Malta that was enough to entitle the wife to claim to have her rights regulated by Maltese law.⁵ Although the procedure in Pitt's case, where the doctrine of matrimonial domicile had been abandoned at the bar of the House of Lords without argument,⁶ had somewhat shaken the authority of Jack's case,⁷ matrimonial domicile was still a part of the law of Scotland.⁸ So far it had been conceded that the domicile of the husband was necessarily that of the wife. But was it so in all cases? Not, as here, where there had been a judicial separation.⁹ Even if the deed were voluntary it would, so long as the separation actually endured, give the wife right to acquire and retain a separate domicile.¹⁰ The separation proceedings in Malta were important, as shewing an intention on the part of the husband to submit his status to the law of Malta, and to "hold by his domicile"¹¹ there. [LORD TRAYNER.—Is there not authority for maintaining that although jurisdiction does not exist ratione originis solely, yet if a born Scotsman actually returns to Scotland jurisdiction over him, and therefore over his wife, will revive?¹¹] That was limited to cases of contract.

ment in such cases, going to establish a change of domicile, that a man accepts such a post. But it is not conclusive, and on consideration of the whole circumstances of the case in the light of previous decisions, I am not prepared to hold that it has been proved, against the pursuer's denial, that his Scottish domicile has been lost. It lay on the defender to prove that it was abandoned animo as well as facto; and while she has established a length of residence on the part of the pursuer in Malta, which might be sufficient if intention were proved, she has not succeeded in proving directly, or by implication, that the pursuer ever resolved to abandon his Scottish domicile."

¹ Bruce v. Bruce, 1790, 3 Pat. App. 163 (Lord Thurlow); Ommaney v. Douglas, 1796, 3 Pat. App. 448; Clarke v. Newmarch, Feb. 13, 1836, 14 S. 488, 8 Scot. Jur. 241; Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Gordon, Feb. 4, 1850, 12 D. 657, 22 Scot. Jur. 233; Wauchope v. Wauchope, June 23, 1877, 4 R. 945; see also Fraser on Husband and Wife, p. 1259.

² Moorhouse v. Lord, 1863, L. R., 10 Cl. H. L. 272.

³ Udny v. Udny, June 3, 1869, 7 Macph. (H. L.) p. 92; see Lord Westbury at p. 100.

⁴ Douglas v. Douglas, 1871, L. R., 12 Eq. 617.

⁵ Jack v. Jack, Feb. 7, 1862, 24 D. 467, 34 Scot. Jur. 234.

⁶ Pitt v. Pitt, April 6, 1864, 2 Macph. (H. L.) 28, 31 Scot. Jur. 522, 4 Macq. 627.

⁷ Per Lord President in Stavert v. Stavert, Feb. 3, 1882, 9 R. 537.

⁸ Fraser, 906-7; Allison v. Allison, June 15, 1839, 1 D. 1025, 11 Scot. Jur. 529.

⁹ Tovey v. Lindsay, 1813, 1 Dow, 117, see Lord Chancellor Eldon, 138; see also Dolphin v. Robins, 1859, 3 Macq. 563.

¹⁰ Cf. Lord Medwyn in Allison v. Allison, supra, note 8.

¹¹ His Lordship referred to Lord Ivory's note to Erskine, i. 2, 19.

No. 29.

Nov. 19, 1891.
Low v. Low.

Argued for the pursuer;—The pursuer himself was the highest authority on the question of intention. If the Court believed him, his evidence was conclusive of the whole matter. None of the cases had been decided against the oath of the person whose domicile was in question, and its force had often been recognised. It was the fact of the party's evidence being laid before the English Court in Wilson's case,¹ that enabled that Court to come to a different conclusion from that reached in the Court of Session, where his evidence was, at that time, not admissible. Now, the pursuer here was corroborated by his father, and by the whole course of his own conduct. No "domiciled Scotsman in his senses" would go to Malta to live the rest of his life there any more than to Burmah.² The old doctrine of Anglo-Indian domicile was now exploded, the conditions of transit were so different, and the change from the Government of the Company to the Government of the Queen had entirely changed the aspect of a man's residence in India.³ Formerly on going to India a man changed, in a manner, his allegiance, but that was not so now, nor was it so when a man went to Malta. If the "duties of office" called a man to a place and kept him there, he would not acquire a domicile, for he would have no choice in the matter.⁴ This doctrine of the persistency of the domicile of origin had been pushed so far as to hold a man who had been absent from Scotland for seventy-two years, a large part of it in the service of the Crown, to be at his death still a Scotsman ratione originis.⁵ The doctrine of "matrimonial domicile" was no longer a part of the law of Scotland, if it ever had been.⁶ There was no authority for Lord Fraser's statement that a separated wife could have a separate domicile. Lord Fraser referred to the statute, but the statute said nothing of it. Authority was the other way.⁷

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The only important matter here is whether we have or have not jurisdiction to deal with the case, for I understand that your Lordships are all satisfied—as I am—that, if we are entitled to deal with it, the pursuer upon the facts is entitled to divorce.

But there is an important question of jurisdiction raised. It is said that we have none in respect that the pursuer has ceased to have a domicile in Scotland, and is now domiciled in Malta.

In such a case as this, a case of divorce, it may make the very greatest difference, as regards the remedy available, where a man's domicile is, and it cannot be denied that anomalies may result from the decision of the Court on the question of domicile, e.g., the wife, who was a Maltese by birth, and had lived there for nearly the whole of her married life, might have to come here for a remedy, if she desired one, while, if Malta was the proper forum, the husband on his side would only be entitled to a separation, the law of Malta not authorising divorce a vinculo. These and many other anomalies are the results of

¹ Wilson v. Wilson, 1872, L. R., 2 P. and D. 435, in the Court of Session March 8, 1872, 10 Macph. 573, 44 Scot. Jur. 295; Steel v. Steel, July 13, 1888, 15 R. 896.

² See Lord President in Steel v. Steel, supra.

³ See Jopp v. Hood, Feb. 28, 1865, 34 L. J. Ch. 212, 4 De Gex. J. and S. 616.

⁴ Per Lord Westbury in Udny, ut cit.; see also Bell v. Kennedy, May 14, 1868, 6 Macph. (H. L.) 69, 40 Scot. Jur. 476.

⁵ Patience, 1885, L. R., 29 Ch. Div. 976.

⁶ See Lord Deas and Lord Shand in Stavert's case, ut supra.

⁷ Dolphin v. Robins, 1859, 3 Macq. 563; Lesseur, L. R., 1 P. D. 139.

No. 29. differences in the marriage laws of different countries, but they cannot affect the determination of the question of domicile.
 Nov. 19, 1891.
 Low v. Low.

Now, it is certain that the pursuer never gave up his domicile of origin, if we believe his statement. Is there any ground for disbelieving it? It is the defender who must shew that the domicile of origin was animo et facto given up and a new domicile adopted. We have really to consider the question whether if Mr Low were now dead, leaving no settlement, the law of Scotland or the law of Malta would rule his succession. What are the facts with which we have to deal in testing the truth of the pursuer's own statement, which, if true, would undoubtedly establish that he remained a domiciled Scotchman? The pursuer entered the navy many years ago. He served in the navy till 1867, when he was put on half-pay. It so happened that in 1867 he was able to get a naval appointment on shore in the Admiral Superintendent's office at Malta. He held that appointment till 1873, when he retired from the navy on half-pay. He immediately returned to Scotland with his wife, and after a short stay in Scotland, where he endeavoured to get employment, he obtained a situation in London. Before the year was out he had a severe attack of acute bronchitis, and under medical advice, and under medical advice only, he left this country and went back to Malta. He had a good chance of employment there, as he was known there, the climate would suit his health, and his wife was a Maltese. All these considerations may have weighed with him in choosing Malta as a residence for health.

His health was re-established after his return to Malta, and in 1879 he obtained an appointment as storekeeper and cashier in the Royal Naval Hospital there. That is certainly the point at which the case for the defender obtains force, if it has any. The regulation under which he holds his appointment was that there would be compulsory retirement at the age of fifty-five. It is, however, necessary to notice that that appointment did not preclude him or save him from the duty of serving in the navy in the event of war.

These are the facts of the case, if you add this, that, still retaining this employment, he has lived in Malta ever since. He has visited Scotland very rarely, but the reason for that is that his income is small, and he cannot afford to travel backwards and forwards.

Has he then lost his Scots domicile? It does not appear to me that there is anything in what I have said to militate against his own statement, which plainly means that he holds by his domicile of origin. The only point that can be taken is that he accepted this situation, which was for a very considerable period. But many people have to take appointments for long periods in places in which they do not desire to settle down. It must always be remembered that it was bad health which drove him from Scotland, and he might very well not wish to return to Scotland until he had made sure that his health was completely restored. Having then got this appointment, which would leave him, when it ran out, a man of middle age with a pension, he thought it better to stay still longer in Malta.

It can hardly be disputed that Malta was an unlikely place for a man to resolve to settle in, if it was open to him, while still in middle life, to leave it with a pension providing for his later life. Therefore, without going beyond the evidence of conduct, I think it clear the pursuer never lost his Scots domicile.

But there remains a piece of evidence which is of importance. In 1887 the spouses agreed that they should separate. That was a voluntary separation, and it was necessary by the law of Malta that it should receive the imprimatur of the Court. Of itself, the fact of the spouses agreeing to apply to the Court would go to support the defender's case, for she may point to the pursuer having voluntarily submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the Maltese Court. But there is a remarkable provision in the deed of separation, put in in the interest of the pursuer, which is entirely inconsistent with the idea that he had animo given up his Scots domicile. The provision I allude to is this, in the 7th article, that if the wife shall commit any "grievous fault, the present deed shall not bar the exercise of the divorce actions to be, if ever, entered into before the competent tribunals in England." England is put in by the Maltese lawyer (meaning, no doubt, the country of Great Britain), and thus, in 1887, we have it recorded that the pursuer had it in his mind that this Court was the tribunal to which he had a right to appeal, and would appeal for redress, in the event of his wife's "grievous fault," and that he took care not to deprive himself of his right to resort to it. It is difficult to see how a man in 1887 could so stipulate that the jurisdiction of the Courts of the country of his birth should rule his rights if animo et facto he was then a Maltese.

No. 29.

Nov. 19, 1891.
Low v. Low.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that there is no evidence that the pursuer ever gave up his Scots domicile, and as a necessary result of that opinion, looking to the facts proved, and exercising our jurisdiction, we must give decree of divorce.

LORD YOUNG.—This case presents no feature of interest, except the legal question to which your Lordship has referred, but that is a very interesting question, and I cannot help regretting that the evidence on the subject had to be taken in the manner in which it was, i.e., upon commission, and not before a Judge who would have seen the witnesses.

On the legal question—to which any of the desultory remarks I may have to make apply—we are familiar with the subtlety and difficulty of questions of domicile. That difficulty is not diminished, but rather increased, by decisions, and by various judicial dicta to which we have been referred. In its own nature it is a difficult question, and no discussion of it can proceed without abundant use of vague and indefinite language. We have to encounter such words as "temporary" and "permanent." These are relative terms. Nothing in the world is permanent; everything is temporary. Then we have "animus re-munendi," while we all know that the minds of human being are constantly fluctuating.

But what we have to aim at in endeavouring to reach any general rule is to follow considerations of general expediency and utility.

I cannot help thinking that a good deal of difficulty is raised by the use of language such as we are familiar with, e.g., "losing a Scots domicile." The loss is not worth talking about if the loser can resume it when he pleases, and there is much authority to the effect that he can become Scots again by a mere change of intention. The great test we heard of in argument—the domicile that is referred to in such cases—is the domicile of succession. That again, as regards considerations of expediency and utility, is of very little importance, when it is in the power of every person to declare by a couple of lines what law shall regulate his succession.

Now, viewing the considerations of expediency and utility which arise in this case, what have we? Substitute any country you like for Malta. What is the question? The man was born a Scotsman; it is no matter when he left the country, but he set out to make his way in the world. There is a rule, founded on considerations of utility and expediency, that no change shall be effected by a man's shifting about with the regiment, if he is a soldier, or with his ship, if he is a sailor. That is a very convenient rule. This man was in the navy, but he retired in 1867. In 1866 he married in Malta, and made a home there in the ordinary sense of that word. He set up a house there, and lived with his wife there. He had no home elsewhere in the ordinary sense. He came home in 1872 or 1873 for a brief period, but with that exception he lived in Malta and made his home there. He married a Maltese, and lived with her there for twenty-five years. He has employment there, and the climate suits his health.

No. 29.
 Nov. 19, 1891.
 Low v. Low.

The wife has committed a matrimonial offence. The question on which these considerations of utility and expediency are to be appealed to is,—are the consequences of that offence to be determined by the Courts of the place where the home of these persons has been for a quarter of a century, or by the Courts of Scotland? Your Lordships are of opinion that the Courts of Scotland are to determine them. I must say that to my mind every consideration of expediency, utility and good sense is against that. I feel the force of the decisions and the dicta on this subject, but my mind always goes back to what was said long ago by Lord Thurlow that there is very little profit in speculating as to what a man's intention as to his ultimate home may be. He has made his home abroad. Of course he may change his mind. Is jurisdiction to fluctuate with the fluctuations of his mind, and change half-a-dozen times in a week?

Suppose we know that when he brought this action he intended to return to Scotland, but that he had since changed his mind, and now intended to remain in Malta, would that change oust our jurisdiction? Or is the state of mind in which he was when the action was brought to rule the question?

The rule ought to be, as I think, that when a man makes a home in any country, although he may be greatly attached to his place of birth, and intend to return, still his domicile for all purposes—and the convenience of the rule is specially illustrated by reference to domestic questions such as this—should be determined by the place of his domestic home, and his attachment to the place of his birth should not influence the consideration of the matter. Just reverse the present case. A Maltese comes to Edinburgh, devotedly attached to Malta, his natale solum, but Scotland is the place where he can make his livelihood, and he obtains a situation here. He marries a Scottish lady, and makes a home here, and resides here for twenty-five years. Then he complains of a matrimonial offence committed by his wife, committed here, in Edinburgh, and raises an action against her in the Courts of Scotland. She says “No, you must go to Malta; you are devotedly attached to Malta. You are a Maltese, and the consequences of my offence must be determined by the law of Malta.” Is not that an absurdity? But it is exactly, in law, the same case as you have here.

I know the facts which constitute a “home” in the ordinary sense. Are these facts not present here, constituting a “home” in Malta? Many Scotsmen, not a few, go to London. If you ask any one of them,—have you abandoned Scotland? Everyone of them, without exception, would answer “No, I intend to return to Scotland.” But if any one of these men makes a home in England, marries a wife there, sets up an establishment there, and derives an income from a situation in England, I do not think he would be very respectfully treated, if he pleaded in an action against him by his wife,—“I am still passionately attached to Scotland. I am a Scotsman, and you must go to the Court of Session." No. 29.

This case suggests these same considerations. This Maltese man, who has been a quarter of a century in Malta, and since 1873 has never returned to this country, except for a few weeks to give instructions for this action, who is fixed in a situation there for twenty years, is complaining of his Maltese wife for her conduct in Malta. He should resort to the Maltese Court with his complaint. It is not fair to compel her to come here.

Nov. 19, 1891.
Low v. Low.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair.

LORD TRAYNER.—Two questions have been argued before us under the defender's reclaiming note,—(1) Whether the defender is subject to the jurisdiction of this Court, and (2) whether the pursuer's averments of adultery on the part of the defender have been proved.

On the second question,—that is, on the merits of the case, I shall say nothing beyond this, that the proof adduced, in my judgment, is quite sufficient to establish the pursuer's averments, and to entitle him to decree of divorce.

The question of jurisdiction is, at first sight, attended with more difficulty, but upon consideration of the argument offered and the authorities cited, I have come to be of the opinion expressed by the Lord Ordinary, and that without doubt.

Speaking generally, and apart from a specialty in this case, which I shall afterwards consider, I suppose there is no doubt that the defender's domicile is the same as that of her husband. A wife cannot have or acquire, stante matrimonio, a domicile different from her husband's. Then what is the pursuer's domicile? His domicile of origin is admittedly in Scotland, and that domicile is and must continue to be the only domicile by which his succession can be regulated, until he abandons it and acquires another. I say the domicile which regulates his succession, because after what took place in the House of Lords in the case of Pitt, and the opinions delivered by Lord Deas and Lord Shand in the case of Stavert, I regard it as practically settled that the domicile which regulates succession is the domicile from which jurisdiction arises to deal with questions of divorce. Such jurisdiction will not be afforded by what has been called the matrimonial domicile, nor by the locus delicti combined with personal service, nor by the mere residence in this country for forty days. Nothing short of what was termed in the case of Pitt a complete or absolute domicile,—that is one which will regulate succession, affords jurisdiction to deal with a case of divorce. In this sense, therefore, the pursuer's domicile is in Scotland, unless, as I have said, he has lost it by abandonment, and by the acquisition of another somewhere else. In support of her plea, which I am now considering, the defender avers that the pursuer has lost his Scots domicile, and has acquired one in Malta, which he now holds. The onus of proving this averment lies on the defender, and it is essential to the success of her plea that she should establish the averment she has made. In my opinion she has entirely failed to do so. There is not a tittle of evidence to support this averment beyond her own statement, while on the contrary the evidence of the pursuer, his conduct at Malta, his reasons and motive for going there and remaining there so long as he has done, as well as the evidence of other witnesses examined on his behalf, satisfy me that he has not abandoned his Scots domicile, but has retained, and intended to retain it. The pursuer's domicile being in Scotland, it follows that the defen-

No. 29. der's domicile is there also, and she is therefore subject to the jurisdiction of this Court in the present case.
 Nov. 19, 1891.
 Low v. Low.

It is said, however, by the defender that in respect of a judicial separation between her and the pursuer, she (the defender) no longer follows the domicile of her husband, but may acquire, and has acquired in Malta a separate domicile of her own. I am not satisfied that the separation of the parties was a judicial separation as we understand the term. The separation did not proceed on any judicial inquiry as to the alleged causes therefor, indeed the deed of separation produced, which was sanctioned by the judicial authority, bears in terms that the parties had entered into it "by mutual consent." It rather appears to me that the separation of the parties was the result of an extrajudicial agreement into which they had entered, but which required, by the law administered in Malta, the consent or interposition of the Judge to allow of them acting upon it by living apart from each other. All that the Judge seems to have done, being all that his duty required him to do, was to endeavour to bring about a reconciliation between the spouses, failing in which, he authorised the separation. But, even taking the separation to have been judicial, it is certainly not clear that it so separates the parties to the effect of enabling the defender to acquire a domicile different from the pursuer. It may have the effect of enabling her to carry on business for herself, to sue and to defend questions arising out of such a business without the consent or intervention of her husband, may give the Courts of Malta jurisdiction over her, which, apart from the separation, they would not have had, and even give her a domicile to found such jurisdiction. But it does not, so far as I see, affect her status as the pursuer's wife, or the rights and privileges which that status confers, except in so far as by the agreement she had renounced them. Assuming, however, that the separation was judicial, the terms of the agreement,—that is, the conditions on which separation was decreed,—bar the defender from pleading it as she does. For one of these conditions was, to state it shortly, that in the event of the defender committing adultery, the separation should not prevent the pursuer seeking the remedy of divorce before the competent tribunals in England, by which I understand the competent tribunals of the United Kingdom. The defender cannot now, therefore, in respect of the separation, object to the pursuer seeking here that remedy, which, by a rather remarkable provision, was reserved to him by the conditions of that separation.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

THE COURT adhered.

CURROR, COWPER, & CURROR, W.S.—WALTER C. B. CHRISTIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 30. GRANITE CITY STEAMSHIP COMPANY, LIMITED, Pursuers (Appellants).—W. Campbell—Salvesen.
 Nov. 20, 1891.
 Granite City
 Steamship
 Co., Limited,
 v. Ireland &
 Son. DAVID IRELAND & SON, Defenders (Respondents).—Ure—
W. L. Mackenzie.

Ship—Discharge—Demurrage—Excepted causes.—By charter-party it was agreed that a vessel should, after loading, proceed to Leith docks "and deliver the cargo of coal "alongside any safe wharves, crafts, or depots." The cargo was to be taken from alongside the vessel "at the merchant's risk and expense according to the usual custom at loading and discharging ports." Forty-eight running hours were allowed for discharge, after which demurrage was stipulated for

The "Linn o' Dec."

"except in case of strikes, . . . detention by railway or cranes, . . . or No. 30.
 any other cause beyond the control of the charterers which may impede the ordinary lading and discharging of the vessel." On the arrival of the vessel at Nov. 20, 1891.
 Leith, in consequence of a strike of railway servants the charterers could not be Granite City supplied with waggons to remove the coal by railway as they had arranged with Steamship their customers to do, and did not discharge the vessel within the running v. Ireland & hours. There was no rule of the port that coal must be discharged into waggons, Son.
 or forbidding its discharge on the quay. In an action by the owners for demur- The "Linn o' rage in respect of the charterers' failure to discharge within the running hours, Dee." held that the charterers had failed to shew that the discharging of the vessel had been impeded by any of the excepted causes.

THE GRANITE CITY STEAMSHIP COMPANY by charter-party, dated 21st 2D DIVISION.
 January 1891, agreed with David Ireland & Son, coal exporters and mer- Sheriff of For-chants, Dundee, that the company's steamship "Linn o' Dee" should pro- farshire.
 ceed to Tyne Dock and there load a cargo of coals, and should then proceed to Leith Docks and deliver the same to the affreighters or their assignees
 "alongside any safe wharves, crafts, or depots, as ordered by receivers.
 . . . The cargo to be put on board and taken from alongside the vessel at merchant's risk and expense, according to usual custom at loading and discharging ports. . . . Running hours to be allowed the said freighters for loading, as per colliery guarantee, and forty-eight running hours for discharging the said cargo, except in case of holidays, Sundays, colliery pay-days, idle days, riots, strikes, lock-outs, idle time, or restriction of output at the colliery or collieries with which the steamer is booked to load, frosts, storms, floods, detention by railway or cranes, accidents to machinery, or any other cause beyond the control of the charterers which may impede the ordinary loading and discharging of the vessel."

The ship made two consecutive voyages under this charter-party, and on arriving at Leith, on both occasions, found that waggons could not be procured by the charterers to remove the cargo, owing to a strike of railway servants then existing all over Scotland. The charterers had arranged to deliver the coal to the Edinburgh Gas Commissioners by rail from Leith. The charterers made no other arrangements for discharge, either by procuring carts to carry away the coal, or by obtaining leave to put the coal on the quay. The ship was on both occasions detained beyond the running hours, and the owners raised an action to recover the amount of demurrage in the Sheriff Court at Dundee. They founded on the charter-party and the fact of the delay, pleading;—(3) The defenders were bound to use all available means at their disposal at the port of discharge for taking delivery of cargo, and having failed to do so, they are liable for demurrage.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The delays upon which demurrage arose having occurred through causes beyond the control of the defenders, and falling under the exceptions specified in the charter-party, the action should be dismissed.

A proof having been allowed to establish the cause of the delay, it was proved that the defenders had made no application to the authorities of the docks for leave to store the coals on the quay, that there was no rule at Leith that delivery of coals should be made in any particular manner, and that, if the defenders had bestirred themselves in time, they could have had the coals removed from the vessel's side in carts, if not carted all the way to the Gas Commissioners' works.

The Sheriff-substitute (J. C. Smith), on 10th June 1891, assoilzied the defenders, finding "that the charge for demurrage was not incurred, in respect that the cause of delay was the failure of the North British Railway to supply waggons to receive the coals carried by the ship owing to

No. 30.

Nov. 20, 1891.
Granite City
Steamship
Co., Limited,
v. Ireland &
Son.

The "Linn o'
Dee."

a 'strike' of their servants, and that said 'strike' or 'detention by railway,' which impeded the discharging of the vessel, fell within the aforesaid exception expressly, or as a cause not within the defenders' control."

On appeal, the Sheriff (J. C. Thomson), on 18th August, found "that the delays upon which demurrage arose occurred through a cause beyond the control of the defenders, which impeded the ordinary discharging of the vessel," and therefore assoilzied the defenders.

The pursuers appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—None of the excepted clauses applied. "Strikes" did not include railway strikes, and railway detention had reference to the loading. But, in any event, nothing had occurred to delay the discharge, even although the coals could not have been removed from the quay. The shipowner had nothing to do with the supply of waggons. He knew nothing of the defenders' arrangements for removing the cargo, and was not affected by them. The charterer must have the waggons or some other means of conveyance ready, if he wished to take away the coals.¹ He was not entitled to use the ship as a warehouse without paying for it. It had been proved as a fact that he might have arranged for their removal. If there had been a rule of port requiring discharge into waggons, or forbidding discharge on the quay, that would have raised a different question.² The case of *Postlethwaite v. Freeland*³ was distinguished, because there the discharge was to be in a reasonable time.

The defenders relied on the evidence to shew that they could not have removed the coal faster owing to the railway strike; and that their case was covered by "strikes," or by the general clause at the end of the charter-party. They cited Postlethwaite v. Freeland.³

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute have in this case pronounced practically the same judgment, but I am sorry to say that I cannot agree with them.

The charter-party definitely fixes a certain number of hours for discharge, after which there is to be demurrage, and it gives a number of exceptions which should be excuses for delay.

Only two of these exceptions could possibly come in here, viz., "detention by railway" and "strikes." But "detention by railway" does not mean detention by reason of failure on the part of those charged with the railway management to supply waggons to take the cargo away. It means detention caused by delay in bringing the coals from the pit to be loaded on the ship. As to the other excepted cause—"strikes,"—I think that what is meant is a strike of stevedores or dock labourers, or possibly a strike of seamen. It is difficult to see how a strike of railway servants could affect the discharge of the ship. But suppose it could, and that that is one of the things that is excepted, all that the facts come to in this case is that the railway company could not bring trucks alongside the vessel, because of the strike among their servants. But then there is nothing here to indicate that any particular mode of discharge was contemplated as there was in Wyllie's case. There is no custom of the port, no rule that the discharge must be made into trucks.

¹ Grant v. Coverdale, 1884, L. R., 9 App. Ca. 470; Budget & Co. v. Birnington & Co. 1891, L. R., 1 Q. B., p. 35.

² J. & A. Wyllie v. Harrison & Co., Oct. 29, 1885, 13 R. 92; Kruse and Others v. Drynan & Co., July 9, 1891, 18 R. 1110; see also the "Carisbrooke" 1890, L. R., 15 P. D., p. 98.

³ Postlethwaite v. Freeland, 1879, L. R., 5 App. Ca., p. 599.

The charterers then are in this position, that they must consider whether it will pay better to incur demurrage, or to incur the cost of finding some other method of discharge. It is not proved that they were active in making arrangements for her discharge, or that they could not have got the vessel discharged if they had taken the proper steps. The owner of the vessel has nothing to do with that expense. He had a distinct stipulation as to discharge, and, as I have said, there is no evidence to shew that the delay was due to causes over which the charterers had not control. I hold it to be proved that they could have had the vessel discharged, had they taken active steps to meet the difficulty that railway trucks could not be brought alongside. No doubt they might have been put to considerable trouble and expense, but that was their misfortune, and it was for them to consider which misfortune would be the greater, to incur the extra expense in discharging, or to incur the pursuers' charge for demurrage.

No. 30.

Nov. 20, 1891.
Granite City
Steamship
Co., Limited,
v. Ireland &
Son.

The "Linn o'
Dee."

LORD YOUNG.—I think it is not proved that the delay here was due to any of the causes excepted in the charter-party. It is not proved that the vessel could not have been discharged on the quay. I am unable to concur in the views on which the Sheriff-depute has proceeded. He says,—“I think it is unreasonable to say that they should have taken delivery upon the quay, although there were no means available for removing the cargo.” I should rather have been disposed to say that it was unreasonable to expect the ship to remain till the charterers found means for removing the cargo.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree in all that your Lordship and Lord Young have said, and I think the case is not attended with the least difficulty. The charterer undertook to discharge the cargo within forty-eight running hours, and did not do it. He is therefore responsible for the detention beyond that time according to a well-fixed rule of law. The only answer he can make is that his case is taken out of the ordinary rule by a clause in the charter-party which exempts him from that responsibility. He appeals to the clause of exemption, which undoubtedly is very broad in its terms. But all the excepted causes are subject to this qualification, viz., that they shall impede the ordinary discharge of the vessel. It has not been shewn that any of the excepted causes existed which prevented the cargo in question being discharged in the ordinary way, over the ship's side. The owner of the vessel has absolutely no concern with the difficulties which the charterer may have in removing the cargo from the quay, on which it has been discharged.

THE COURT, after findings as to the periods of detention on each voyage, found “that the detention of the ship on the said two occasions was not due to any of the causes specified in the charter-party, as exceptions to the defenders' obligation to pay demurrage if delivery of the cargo was not taken within forty-eight hours; find in law that the defenders are liable to the pursuers for demurrage, . . . Therefore recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, of date 10th June 1891, and the interlocutor of the Sheriff-depute, of date 18th August 1891, and decern against the defenders for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £62,” &c.

JOHN RHIND, S.S.C.—HENDERSON & CLARK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 31. HENRY LOWENFELD (Liquidator of the Universal Stock Exchange Company, Limited), Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Sol.-Gen. Murray—Dundas—Deas.

Nov. 20, 1891.
Liquidator of the Universal
Stock Ex-
change Co.,
Limited, v.
Howat.

RICHARD K. HOWAT, Defender (Respondent).—Jameson—Dickson.

Et e contra.

Process—Proof—Production of document after close of proof.—It is matter for the discretion of the Court whether they will allow a document to be produced and put in evidence by a party after he has closed his proof.

Circumstances in which the Court permitted a document which was technically essential to the pursuer's title to be so produced.

Contract—Gaming—Contract for payment of differences.—An account was opened with a stockjobber for the purchase and sale of stocks. Large transactions followed, resulting in a debit balance against the customer and the closing of the account by the jobber. In answer to an action for payment of the balance, the customer pleaded that the original agreement had been for payment of differences, and that the transactions were therefore void. It appeared that each transaction was commenced by a written order by the customer asking the jobber to sell to him (or buy from him) certain stock, in return to which the jobber sent a sale note (or purchase note) stating that he had sold to (or bought from) the customer the stock specified in the order at a certain price, for delivery on a certain day. Some of the customer's purchase orders expressed his desire to resell on a certain profit being realisable for the stock. The contract notes bore that every purchase or sale by the company was a bona fide transaction for delivery. The customer deposed that there had been an original agreement that the dealings were to be for differences only. The jobber gave contrary evidence. Held that it had not been established by evidence that the transactions were not what the written documents expressed, contracts of sale enforceable by law, and decree given accordingly.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

IN the beginning of April 1889, Richard K. Howat, Mabie House, Dumfries, opened an account for transactions in stocks and shares with the Universal Stock Exchange Company, Limited, carrying on business in London as stockjobbers and share-dealers (of which Mr Henry Lowenfeld was managing director), with a nominal capital, as at that date, of £100,000 in 10,000 shares of £10 each, the number of shares taken up being 2953. Numerous transactions were entered into between them during April. Each transaction was commenced by a written order by Howat asking the company to sell to him (or to buy from him) certain stocks, in return to which the company sent him a contract note, stating that they had sold to him (or bought from him) the stocks mentioned in his order at a certain price for delivery at a certain date. Some of the purchase orders by Howat stated that he wished to resell on a certain profit being made.* On the back of the orders and notes the terms of business of the company, which had been made known to and approved of by Howat before he opened the account, were set forth, and these were also embodied in a pamphlet entitled "How to operate" issued by the company, and received by Howat some time previously.† The stocks

* The first transaction was :—Mr Howat to Exchange Company. "2d April 1889.—Please sell me twenty East London Ry. stock and close, half per cent profit." Copy of contract sent by Exchange Company to Mr Howat,—“London, E.C., 2d April 1889.—Sold to R. K. Howat, Esq., to be delivered by us to the purchaser on 28th June, subject to the terms printed on back. £20,000 East London @ 15½ = £3025.”

† The terms of business were, inter alia ;—“1. In all transactions the company acts as a stock and sharejobber, buying from clients and selling to them direct, on the company's sole responsibility, and in no case does the company act as broker or agent for a client. . . . 2. Every purchase or sale of stocks or shares contracted by the company is a bona fide transaction for delivery, dealt in were Home Railways, in which by the end of April there was a considerable fall in price. The amount of the transactions, when the account was closed on 28th June following, represented a sum of £1,287,683, 16s. 7d., and upon this there was a balance due by Howat of £4812, 2s. 10d. That balance was brought out after allowing him credit for two sums of £2242, 1s. 3d. and £3592, 2s. 6d., the price of certain stocks of Brighton A and Dover A held by him before he entered into the transactions referred to and sold by him to the company.

No. 31.

Nov. 20, 1891.
Liquidator of the Universal
Stock Ex-
change Co.,
Limited, v.
Howat.

In August 1889 the company went into voluntary liquidation, with a view to reconstruction, and Henry Lowenfeld, as liquidator, brought an action against Howat for payment of the £4812, 2s. 10d., with interest at 5 per cent.

The defender averred that, with the exception of the Brighton A and Dover A sales, no bona fide purchases or sales were made. "The whole other pretended sales and purchases were mere gambling transactions for differences, and represented no real purchases or sales. The pursuer, or said company, never had the said stocks or shares in their possession or under their order; neither they nor the defender had funds to purchase or pay for the same, and the pursuer and his company represented to the defender throughout that he would never require to pay any money, but simply pocket the proceeds of successful gambling."

the company always being prepared to deliver or take up, on the settling day specified in the contract, any and every stock or share which it may have bought or sold. Clients may, if it suits their convenience, repurchase or resell to the company, or any other stock-dealers, any stocks or shares which they may have previously bought or sold. The company shall, however, have no power to compel them to do so, the company's intention on entering into any and every transaction being to deliver or take up the stocks bought or sold by them. 3. The company charges no commissions or fees of any kind, but contangoes at current rates on stocks sold to clients on fortnightly accounts, or interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum on the purchase-money from date of purchase until completion on all other accounts, will be charged by the company; but any interest or dividend that may become payable during this time is to be paid by the seller to the purchaser. 4. Every transaction entered into by the company is to be completed on the settling day specified on the contract. Should, however, clients find it inconvenient to deliver or take up any stocks or shares which they have bought or sold on such settling day, they can, upon terms to be mutually agreed upon, arrange with the company to postpone the delivery until the next settling day; but as it is the company's intention, on entering into the bargain, to deliver or take up all stocks or shares which they may have previously bought or sold, the company cannot be compelled by clients to thus postpone the delivery of stocks. . . . 10. The company is frequently applied to for advice as to the probable fluctuations in the prices of stocks, and is willing to advise its clients, but any suggestions or advice so given are to be accepted by the clients on their own responsibility, and the clients are not in any case to hold the company liable or in any way responsible in respect of such advice or suggestions, or anything done in consequence thereof. Clients should always remember, before accepting any advice or suggestion, that the company acts as principal or jobber, and is therefore an interested party. 11. The company shall have a lien, until the account is closed and properly settled, upon all stocks, shares, moneys, or other valuables in its possession belonging to clients, for their due performance of any and every contract or engagement, which they may have entered into; and should any client fail to fulfil any such contract or engagement, the company shall have the right and power to forthwith repurchase all stocks undelivered, and resell all stocks unpaid for at the time, at tape prices, appropriate all his moneys, stocks, shares, or valuables in its possession, or such part thereof as will be necessary to settle the account, at market prices, and proceed to recover whatever amount might still remain due to the company after such realisation, from the client in default."

No. 31.

Nov. 20, 1891.
Liquidator of the Universal
Stock Ex-
change Co.,
Limited, v.
Howat.

The defender pleaded ;—(1) The pursuer has produced no title to sue, and he has none. (4) The transactions upon which the alleged debt by the defender to the pursuer arose, not being real transactions, but gambling transactions for differences, the defender is entitled to absolver.

Howat sued the company for payment of the proceeds of the Brighton A and Dover A stocks, the defenders pleading, inter alia ;—(2) The pursuer being indebted to the defenders' company, and having been credited with the price of said stock in his general account, and having acknowledged the same to be correct, the defender is entitled to absolver.

Proof was led, from which it appeared that Howat was twenty-four years of age, and had lived with his father without being brought up to any profession; that after his father's death he had gone to London and had visited Lowenfeld at his office, leaving upon the latter the impression that he had an income of about £2000 a-year; that an account was subsequently opened between them, Lowenfeld deponing*

* Lowenfeld deponed, inter alia ;—" We were quite ready to fulfil the contracts we entered into either by accepting or taking delivery of the stocks; it was always at defender's request that delivery was not taken or given. . . . The £1450 Brighton A and £3100 Dover A stocks are, I believe, the stocks he referred to at his first interview with me. I think that was in the spring of 1889. He told me he had bought them for speculation, but found it would not pay him as the commission was so high, and that was the reason why he wanted to deal with us. . . . Purchases and sales went on between us in terms of the account produced. . . . Cross.—All the transactions appearing in the account sued on began with purchases, except the Brighton A and Dover A stock. The stocks were purchased from the company by defender. When he wanted to resell he would give his orders in the ordinary way, I suppose. (Q.) What did you understand by closing? (A.) I understand he wanted to buy off us so much stock, and so soon as it shewed him a profit of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent he wanted to resell it to us, to take his profit instead of keeping it as an investment. We should not be losers by that transaction. The transaction one enters into one day has nothing to do with the transaction one has on the second day. I had no means of knowing what defender's intentions were with regard to taking up the stock which he offered to purchase on 23d April 1889. I do not see why he should not have been able to take up £400,000 of those stocks. They are all first-class railway stocks, and if he had provided a 5 per cent margin—£20,000—he could have got plenty people to take them up for him. Besides these stocks he had open all the stocks which appear upon the creditor side of the account under date 26th April, and it was that that made me close the account with him. It was when it dawned upon me that the defender could not take up the stocks which were standing in his name as at 26th April, amounting to £600,000, that I closed the account. . . . That made £6000 of difference on each 1 per cent of rise or fall. No doubt things did look rather black and not satisfactory on that date, and our letter would be the ordinary letter any stockbroker or jobber would write to a customer, when he thinks he is incurring a liability he does not care to incur. When we received defender's telegram to close, as he did not give any instructions to take up, we understood the word close in Stock Exchange slang to mean that he was to resell to us. We accordingly closed, and sent him the appropriate note. On 25th April 1889, I cannot say that we had purchases current covering the £600,000 of stocks which we had undertaken to deliver to defender on the 26th, but we had purchases current in the various stocks mentioned to a very large amount, and we may have had such purchases current for the full amount. . . . Re-examined.—When we sold the £600,000 worth of stock to defender we bound ourselves by writing to deliver it. (Q.) And you were prepared to do so if called upon by him? (A.) Quite prepared. (Q.) And in like manner where you bought from him were you prepared to take delivery? (A.) Quite prepared. (Q.) And to pay or credit him in account with the proceeds? (A.) That is so. . . . " that Howat had been told that the terms of business upon which the company was prepared to deal were those above referred to, and no other. Howat's evidence was to a contrary effect.*

After Lowenfeld had closed his proof in the action at his instance, his counsel craved leave to put in evidence a copy of the resolutions for winding up the company and appointing him liquidator, certified by the Registrar at Somerset House, the first copy which had been put in not having been so certified and the original minute-book having been lost. Counsel for Howat objected, on the ground that the pursuer had closed his proof, and the Lord Ordinary sustained the objection.

In the action at Lowenfeld's instance the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) accordingly pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer has not produced any title to sue; therefore, and to that effect, sustains the first plea in law stated for the defender, and dismisses the action: Finds neither party entitled to expenses, and decerns."†

* Howat deponed,—". . . It was quite understood that the transactions were to be for speculation only, not for delivery. That was distinctly said by both of us in Mr Lowenfeld's private office when I saw him. He spoke about speculating in £5000 or £10,000 worth of stock, and I asked, 'Are you obliged to pay for that?' and he said no, it was merely a speculation. He said they never paid for stock at all, it was never delivered, the transaction was only for the difference in the price. They never called on clients, he said, to pay for stock. The book 'How to operate' explains that a transaction for the purchase of stock is closed by reselling. The whole correspondence, including the orders and transactions, were entered into and proceeded on the footing I have stated, that there was to be no delivery given on either side, and nothing paid but differences. The only exception was the transaction in Dover A's and Brighton A's stocks, which I had formerly bought through Herries, Farquhar, & Co. The whole of the orders I gave to pursuer's company were in writing, either in the correspondence or on orders. When I gave the orders which are referred to in this action, I never intended to take delivery of the stocks. It would not have been possible for me to do so. . . ."

† "OPINION.—The first of these actions is raised by Mr Henry Lowenfeld, designing himself the liquidator of the Universal Stock Exchange Company, Limited, against Mr Richard Howat, a younger son of the late Mr Robert Howat of Mabie, Dumfriesshire, and it concludes for payment of £4812, 2s. 10d., being the balance alleged to be due to the pursuer's company upon certain transactions in shares and stocks as per the account beginning 2d April and ending 10th May 1889.

"The second action is a counter action raised by Mr Howat against the company, concluding for payment of a sum of £5834, 3s. 9d., being the price of certain railway stocks sold by Mr Howat to the company in April 1889, and of which price the company refuse payment on the ground that after crediting Mr Howat with its full amount he is still due them on their total transactions the above-mentioned balance of £4812, 2s. 10d.

"Both actions therefore substantially involve the same questions, viz., whether the debt entries in the company's account form a good charge against Mr Howat; and that again depends (for there is no question of the correctness of the account) upon the further question, whether the transactions between the parties were proper purchases and sales, or were, as Mr Howat alleges, mere gambling transactions, of which the only obligation on either side was for payment of differences.

"On this question, having considered the proof and the various writings produced, I have come to the conclusion that my judgment must be in favour of the company. I think the documents sufficiently instruct that whatever facilities this company may give for speculation in shares and stocks, and whatever temptations in that direction it may put in the way of inexperienced persons, its transactions are real transactions, under which delivery of stock sold,

No. 31.

Nov. 20, 1891.
Liquidator of the Universal
Stock Ex-
change Co.,
Limited, v.
Howat.

No. 31. In the action at Howat's instance the defenders were assolized. Howat reclaimed in the second action, and Lowenfeld in the first.

Nov. 20, 1891.
Liquidator of the Universal
Stock Ex-
change Co.,
Limited, v.
Howat.

Argued for Howat;—(1) The contract was one for payment of differences only. The evidence shewed that that was the footing upon which and acceptance of stock bought, is made matter of obligation, and may be enforced. That is certainly the effect of the documents, and in particular, of the pamphlet, 'How to operate,' which the company circulated, and of the printed terms and conditions which are brought under the notice of every customer, and are endorsed upon every bought or sold note which the company issues, and although the defender alleges that it was understood between him and the company that there should be no delivery on either side, but merely payment of differences, the officials of the company are emphatic the other way; and altogether I am bound to say that I think it is the effect of the evidence that whatever may have been contemplated as the probable mode of working out the transactions, it was simply made matter of contract that if it suited (as in certain states of the market it might suit) the interest of either party to demand delivery or acceptance, such delivery or acceptance might be enforced. In short, the business carried on by the company appears to be substantially the same as that of a jobber on the Stock Exchange. They appear to buy and sell indifferently, being ready to buy or to sell any stock quoted on the Stock Exchange at the market price of the day, and their profit as a rule arises, not upon the rise or fall of a particular stock, but upon what is called the turn of the market, which is really a sort of commission. It is not alleged that in the transactions in question the prices charged were not fair prices, or that Mr Howat was unfairly dealt with. He would apparently have suffered exactly the same loss if he had bought and sold the particular stocks through a broker on the Stock Exchange, and although the transactions were certainly of sufficient magnitude to have suggested doubts as to Mr Howat's ability to carry them out, except by payment of differences, I cannot say that I think it is proved that he could not have made arrangements to do so, if necessary, or that there is anything in the amount of the transactions which is necessarily inconsistent with the company's view of the contract.

"On the whole, therefore, I must, in Mr Howat's action, grant absolvitor to the company, and a corresponding result would have followed in the company's action but for the difficulty as to the liquidator's title to sue, which, so far as concerns his action, seems to me to be insuperable.

"The title of the liquidator depends, of course, upon the minutes of the company, and the proper evidence of the winding-up and of the liquidator's appointment is of course the minute-book of the company, kept and signed in terms of section 67 of the Companies Act of 1862. That being so, and Mr Howat having denied on record the pursuer's title, and tabled a plea of want of title, and called for production of the minutes, it was, I think, incumbent on the liquidator to have produced the minutes or to have produced some statutory equivalent. It appears, however, that the minutes have either been destroyed or lost, and the only document produced before the close of the liquidator's proof in support of the liquidator's title was a copy from Somerset House, No. 78 of process. That document was produced as a certified copy, said to be admissible under section 6 of the Companies Act, 1877, but apparently by some oversight it is not certified or signed by the proper officer, and is accordingly, in my opinion, of no value. After his proof was closed the liquidator sought to remedy this defect by producing a second copy properly certified, which copy is No. 81 of process, but Mr Howat's counsel, while willing to allow production of the minutes, declined, in the absence of the minutes, to allow this new copy to be put in evidence. He objected that the pursuer's proof was closed, and I confess I see no answer to this objection.

"I must therefore in this action find that the pursuer has not instructed any title to sue, and shall therefore dismiss the action. And with respect to expenses, I think the only course I can follow is to find no expenses due to or by either party in either action."

it was originally agreed that business was to be done. The extent of the transactions differentiated the case from that of Shaw,¹ in which they were on a very much smaller scale. According to Lowenfeld's own statement Howat had represented himself as "good for £15,000," and yet the company asked him on 26th April to take up stocks to the amount of £600,000. It was to be noticed that in every case (excepting the Brighton A and Dover A sales) Howat was a buyer; he was what on the Stock Exchange was termed a "bull," i.e., a person who bought stocks that he had not taken and could not actually take up. No doubt, upon the face of them the bought and sold notes represented real transactions, but if in truth the transactions were not real, and the inception of the original agreement was a dealing for cover, that shewed what the true contract was. (2) Upon the question of Lowenfeld's title to sue the first of the two actions it was quite true that a certified copy of the appointment of the liquidator would, in terms of the 6th section of the Companies Act, 1877, be good evidence of his title to sue the action. But the document which had been produced was not so certified, and it was too late to supply its place. It must be kept in view that the document which it was now sought to produce was not even in the inventory of documents put in by Lowenfeld at the close of the proof, and the Lord Ordinary had therefore rightly rejected it. The 72d section of the Court of Session Act, 1868, making provision for additional proof in the case of appeals before the Inner-House, excluded such additional proof in cases originating in the Court of Session.

No. 31.
Nov. 20, 1891.
Liquidator of the Universal
Stock Exchange Co.,
limited, v.
Howat.

Argued for Lowenfeld;—(1) The objection to title was of the most technical and unreal kind.² No doubt the certified copy of the liquidator's title which had been produced was not at first sufficiently authenticated. The objection to it had come too late after the proof had been closed. (2) The transactions of sale and purchase of stocks were admittedly real upon the face of the documents, and the proof corroborated their nature as shewn by the documents. The test was whether there was a contractual obligation to deliver and accept the stock sold, and it was clear here that there was.³

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The first question which has to be determined in order to enable us to reach the general question that has been argued is as to the title of the pursuer of the action at the instance of the liquidator of the Stock Exchange Company. This of course is a purely technical question of practice, and it is now admitted by Mr Dickson that there is no statutory incompetency in the Court allowing a document or title to be put in after the party who founds upon it has closed his proof. That being so, the question necessarily is one for the discretion of the Court, and I cannot say that the present case seems to present a very difficult question of discretion.

No doubt after a party's case is closed on the evidence after a proof, the Court ought to be very careful in allowing it to be reopened and redeveloped. But in this case the matter is one of the merest formality; and in regard to the measure and extent of the proof proposed to be offered a most exact estimate can be formed by the party opposing its admission, because the document in ¹ Shaw v. Caledonian Railway Co., Feb. 20, 1890, 17 R. 466; cf. also Heiman v. Hardie & Co., Jan. 7, 1885, 12 R. 406.

² Robertson v. Thom, Dec. 29, 1848, 11 D. 353, 21 Scot. Jur. 96; Christie v. Thompson, Jan. 28, 1859, 21 D. 337, 31 Scot. Jur. 186.

³ Shaw v. Caledonian Railway Co., Feb. 20, 1890, 17 R. 466, Lord Shand, p. 475; Newton v. Cribbes, Feb. 9, 1884, 11 R. 554.

No. 31.

Nov. 20, 1891.
Liquidator of the Universal
Stock Ex-
change Co.,
Limited, v.
Howat.

question differed from the document already produced by containing a docket of two lines. Accordingly I cannot help thinking that, sitting as we are now as a Court of review, it is our duty to permit the reception of this document. I therefore propose to your Lordships that we should allow the claimer to open up the proof for the reception of this document, and that we should deal with the title accordingly. So standing this title, there is no further objection made to it, because the pursuer is then the authentic and authorised liquidator of the company, and he is the creditor in the obligation sued on.

Accordingly that brings us to the question upon which truly both actions turn. It is raised by the fourth plea of the defender in the action at the instance of the liquidator against Mr Howat. He pleads that "the transactions upon which the alleged debt by the defender to the pursuer arose, not being real transactions, but gambling transactions for differences, the defender is entitled to absolvitor." I think that plea very fairly states the legal question in the case. As the transactions stand on the writings which evidence them, there is no doubt that they are transactions of sale of stocks. It appears that in some of the documents—in the contracts for the purchase—there is an order that in a certain event, viz., if there shall be a profit, there shall be a resale; but that does not seem to me really to alter the complexion of the case. Therefore, on the face of the documents, there is no doubt that these are sales enforceable by law, and can found the claim which is now made by the liquidator.

But it is said in the plea in fact that these are not real transactions. It is unnecessary to say that the fact that the transactions are evidenced by writing would not at all preclude the possibility of establishing that the writings are merely simulate, and represent another and totally different transaction from that which was really entered into. Our law knows cases of that kind where writings are used merely as a cloak and for collateral purposes, and where the substance of the transaction is entirely contrary to what is set out in the writings. But where writings evidencing a contract are to be so dealt with, and to be shewn not to set forth the truth of the transaction, but to be merely a device, it is necessary that some very definite and plain evidence should be brought for that purpose.

In this case the first thing which strikes one is that there is in the testimony of the two witnesses examined a direct conflict as to whether at the inception of these transactions there was or was not an agreement that they were to be merely transactions for differences as distinguished from what they purported to be in the documents which passed on each occasion. Mr Howat asserts that that agreement was expressed in words at his meeting with the liquidator. The liquidator pointedly asserts the contrary. If the evidence stood alone on the bare conflict of the two witnesses there could be no doubt that we should not be entitled to set aside the documents as being veils or cloaks and not realities. But Mr Dickson has founded upon a number of circumstances, which he says bear irresistibly in the direction of his contention. I cannot say that I am all convinced by them, even when they are taken collectively. It is necessary to see what is the proposition which Mr Dickson requires to make out by the aid of these circumstances. It is not enough for him to shew that both parties contemplated that these transactions might be fulfilled in the way of a resale taking place at the expiry of the natural period. I think, for my part, that looking to the various circumstances he has arrayed in support of his argument it is highly probable—nay, one may go the length of saying it is certain—th both parties contemplated that, at all events in the ordinary case, there should be a resale. And in some cases to which I have already adverted that expectation is expressed in words. But does that in itself, in the words of the plea, prevent the sales which are set out from being real transactions? On the contrary, it merely shews that the real transactions were expected to be financed in one way instead of in another. He has said, for instance, pointedly, that the very inadequate capital, as he describes it, which is known to be possessed by this company is totally disproportionate to the gigantic figures which even this account produces. But whether it is prudent to enter into engagements in which there might be embarrassment if they were enforced specifically is one question. It is quite another matter when you know the way in which those transactions are generally met to say that the smallness of the capital shews that the transactions are not real, but on the contrary are simulate.

No. 31.

Nov. 20, 1891.
Liquidator of the Universal
Stock Ex-
change Co.,
Limited, v.
Howat.

The other points which the reclainer has taken seem all to be susceptible of the same explanation, and that brings us back to the question raised by his plea, whether he has made out that gambling transactions for differences is the proper description of what was done between this gentleman and the manager of the company. I take it that, as was pointed out by Lord M'Laren in a previous case, it is extremely unlikely, as a matter of human probability, that a case will readily occur in which there is evidence producible that there was an agreement that there should be no transaction, and that matters should not be in the ordinary course of business.

It appears to me that there is here not merely a case of failure on the part of Mr Howat to shew that there was this antecedent or concurrent agreement that there should be no sale of stocks, but merely a gambling transaction for differences, but that the probability is really the other way. I think if one comes to form a conclusion on the state of the facts it is much more likely that the arrangement was that the transactions should be as was expressed in the writings, that the legal rights of parties should stand as so expressed, but that the attention of both parties should be directed towards escaping from the unpleasant consequences which might be brought about if, contrary to the interests of both, delivery were demanded and given.

The parties were not in dispute as to the law, and the decision which I propose that your Lordships should pronounce will be entirely in accordance with the principles which are laid down in the previous cases, both English and Scottish. Therefore in the action at the instance of the liquidator he is entitled to decree, and for the same reason the action at the instance of Mr Howat falls to be dismissed.

LORD ADAM.—I agree with your Lordships about the propriety of allowing the liquidator now to produce his title to sue—that is, to produce a document which had been produced before. The only difficulty was that there was an inadvertence to notice that what he had produced was not a certified copy. I think that is a mere inadvertence, and that it is quite within our power to allow a certified copy to be produced now. If that is so, then there is no further objection to the pursuer's title as liquidator of the company.

That being so, the only question that remains is the question on the merits, whether the transactions in buying and selling between this liquidator and Mr Howat, in shares and stocks, were real transactions? What I understand by a real transaction is a transaction in which the pursuer was to be seller or buyer as the case might be, and which could by law be enforced against the other

No. 31.

Nov. 20, 1891.
Liquidator of the Universal
Stock Ex-
change Co.,
Limited, v.
Howat.

party. If that be so I think, on the authorities, that the transactions in the present case are real transactions. If Mr Howat could enforce delivery of any of the stocks he bought from Mr Lowenfeld that was a real transaction. That is my view of the law applicable to such a case.

Now, it is not disputed that the documentary evidence shews upon the face of it—unless we can get behind it—that that was the nature of the transactions here.

There are bought and sold notes in every case, and so far as appears from the documents everything bought and sold was a real transaction. Now, I do not think anyone can dispute that it is competent to get behind the notes, and to shew that the contract apparently expressed upon the document was not a real contract between the parties; that although that contract so far as appears could be enforced, nevertheless it was, by some other contract or some other agreement provable by writing or parole, not a real transaction, and that that was the state of the fact. I do not in the least doubt that such a contract could be proved. I can quite understand that the contract might have included that, but I agree with your Lordships that there is no evidence of that here. I do not find in the state of the evidence that there was any such agreement or any necessity for such. I have no doubt at all that Mr Lowenfeld, the dealer in these stocks, knew his position quite well, and knew that any contract or agreement he made with Mr Howat for dealing in differences would render all his transactions with him illegal. In the circumstances, he would conclude that there was no necessity whatever for him to enter into such an understanding with the purchaser. I have no doubt, on the other hand, Mr Howat understood in his own mind perfectly well that Mr Lowenfeld would deal with him practically only for differences, and that the parties expected that that would be the course of dealing. But that to my mind is not enough. That is a great deal short of what I think is necessary. I think the party who admits that the contract disclosed by the documents does not shew any such transaction is bound to shew some other contract or some other thing which could be enforced by the one against the other, which would prevent either of them founding upon the contract produced. I find no such contract produced, and that being so, I think it is a real transaction, and that Mr Lowenfeld is entitled to recover the whole sum.

LORD M'LAREN.—The Lord Ordinary has decided the case on the question of Mr Lowenfeld's title. As I understand the argument, the Lord Ordinary's judgment is maintained because it is suggested that we have no power to allow additional evidence which the Lord Ordinary in his discretion has not seen fit to allow. We were referred to the provisions of the Court of Session Act, 1868, giving power to the Judges of the Inner-House on hearing an appeal from the Sheriff or inferior Courts to allow additional evidence to be taken before themselves. It was represented that the giving of that power in reference to cases coming before us on appeal was exclusive of the existence of a similar power in reference to actions which originate in this Court. But the conditions of the two cases are entirely different. It may have been very right to give a power of allowing additional evidence applicable to cases coming from the inferior Court which are defective in the matter of proof, in order to remove any doubt that may have existed as to whether the Supreme Court could deal with a Sheriff Court case otherwise than as an appellate Court. But when a case comes before us from the Lord Ordinary we are not reviewing the Lord Ordinary's judgment in the capacity of a Court of appeal. It is not a process of appeal at all; it is a reclamation, or, in other words, a rehearing of the case by the same Court differently constituted, and everything that might have been done by a single Judge may be done by the Court at the rehearing. Therefore it appears to me that it was quite unnecessary that the Act of 1868, which is not an exhaustive code of procedure, should deal with this subject, the power of this Court having existed all along, and being unquestionable. I am sure all your Lordships have known instances where this Court has ordered evidence to be taken on questions which have not been dealt with by the Lord Ordinary, because, perhaps in the view he has taken, evidence on those particular points was unnecessary. I am of opinion that we ought to allow production to be made, as your Lordship has suggested, of Mr Lowenfeld's title.

No. 31.
Nov. 20, 1891.
Liquidator of the Universal
Stock Ex-
change Co.,
Limited, v.
Howat.

On the merits of the case I may say, as I said in the case of Shaw, that it will always be extremely difficult to reduce a Stock Exchange transaction, or one carried out in a similar manner to a Stock Exchange transaction, to the level of a gambling debt. I think one of the difficulties is this, that the dealer generally has no interest as to the particular mode in which the settlement is to be effected. It is a matter of perfect indifference to him whether the account is to be closed by a resale or by a delivery of stock, because if his customer likes to take delivery of the stock the broker has only to go into the market and to supply himself at the market price of the day. It is therefore antecedently very unlikely that a dealer should enter into a subsidiary engagement that would be of no benefit to himself in the eventual settlement, and which would expose the original transaction to be set aside on the ground of illegality if it turned out to be favourable to himself. The unsupported evidence of either party would not in ordinary circumstances be sufficient to displace the inference arising from the documents, especially when the evidence of the dealer is to the effect that the transaction was a real transaction and in accordance with the documents. I must say that as regards such Stock Exchange transactions as are carried out in the ordinary course of business, the distinction between contracts for differences and real transactions is of purely theoretical interest, and really does not offer to speculators in stock any available means of being released from their obligations.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have no doubt that the pursuer should be allowed an opportunity of producing his title, although it certainly ought to have been produced before the close of the proof.

Upon the merits I also agree with your Lordship. There is no question as to the law that the Court may refuse to enforce bargains which are not real transactions between the various parties, but are mere wagers for differences on the prices either of stocks or any other commodity. I agree that the test which must be applied in order to determine whether any particular transaction is of that kind or not—whether it is a real transaction of purchase and sale, or a mere wager for differences—is to inquire whether or not by the contract as proved the purchaser would have an action to compel delivery of the subject sold and the seller to have the price paid. Upon the contract as it appears from the face of the documents, I do not think there can be any question that in that sense the transactions between the pursuer and defender were real transactions. The only difficulty appears to me to arise from the evidence of Mr Howat, because if we were to accept that evidence, I should be very much disposed for myself to come to the conclusion that there was no real contract at all, but a mere gambling transaction, which neither party intended to have any effect otherwise

No. 31. Nov. 20, 1891. Liquidator of the Universal Stock Exchange Co., Limited, v. Howat. than by payment of differences. But then the evidence of Mr Howat is directly contradicted by the evidence of Mr Lowenfeld, and the Lord Ordinary, who saw the witnesses, has come to the conclusion that we must accept Mr Lowenfeld's testimony and reject Mr Howat's. Reading the evidence and the documents before us, your Lordships have come to the same conclusion, and I certainly am not prepared to differ from your Lordships and the Lord Ordinary. I therefore agree in the judgment which your Lordship proposes.

IN the action at Lowenfeld's instance this interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor; allow the reclaimer to put in evidence copy resolutions No. 81 of process; and the same having been done at the bar, decern against the defender for the sum sued for, with interest as concluded for: Find the defender liable in expenses," &c.

IN the action at Howat's instance the Court adhered.

SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—J. & A. HASTIE, Solicitors—Agents.

No. 32. Nov. 20, 1891. Macrae v. Mackenzie's Trustees. HORATIO ROSS MACRAE (Neil Buchanan's Judicial Factor), Pursuer (Respondent).—Jameson—N. J. Kennedy. MRS ELIZABETH THOMSON OR MACKENZIE (Kenneth Mackenzie's Trustee), Defender (Reclaimer).—Dickson—J. Wilson.

Superior and Vassal—Feu-contract—Transmission of obligation to erect buildings upon personal representatives—Real burden.—A proprietor by feu-contract feued certain ground to three partners of a company, "and the survivors or survivor, and the heir of the last survivor," as trustees for behoof of the company, "with and under the burden of the whole conditions, reservations, burdens . . . which are declared to be real burdens affecting the lands conveyed," viz., that dwelling-houses of a certain value should be erected by the above-named vassals within two years upon the lands, and be upheld by them in good order, and insured and rebuilt if burnt down, "and failing such houses being erected . . . then and in that event these presents . . . shall, in the option of the superior, become null and void." After the lapse of the two years the last surviving partner of the company died in possession of the subjects without having implemented the obligation to build, and his widow, who had been appointed sole trustee under her husband's settlement, did not take up the feu.

The superior raised an action against her as her husband's sole trustee, concluding to have her ordained to implement the obligation, and failing implement to pay damages.

The Court assolized her from the conclusions of the action, holding (1) that as the obligation was by the express terms of the feu-contract imposed solely upon the vassals holding the lands under the contract it did not transmit against the last vassal's personal representative, and that (2) as the conclusion of the summons was for implement of a personal obligation attaching to the defender herself, and no such obligation was prestable, she was not liable in damages.

Opinions that under the terms of the feu-contract there was a personal obligation to build imposed upon the vassal in possession of the subjects, and that it might have been enforced by the superior by the ordinary remedies available to him at common law, notwithstanding the option expressly given him by the deed to irritate the feu in the event of the vassal's failure to build.

| Opinions that the obligation to build would transmit and be enforceable against anyone taking up the feu.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Wellwood. BY feu-contract, dated 26th May 1875, the trustees of Neil Griffiths Buchanan, of Knockshinnoch, Ayrshire, of the first part, contracted and agreed with John Mackenzie, John Hyslop, and Kenneth Mackenzie copartners carrying on the business of coalmasters at New Cumnock, under the firm of "Bank Coal Company" of the second part, in manner following:—"That is to say, the said first parties, in consideration of the feu-duty and other prestations after stipulated, hereby in feu-farm dispone to and in favour of the said John Mackenzie, John Hyslop, and Kenneth Mackenzie, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the heir of the last survivor, as trustees and in trust for behoof of their said company and the partners thereof, present and future, according to their respective rights and interests therein, or to any other person or persons who may hereafter become partners of their said company, heritably and irredeemably," certain portions of ground, amounting to nearly four acres, in the parish of New Cumnock, Ayrshire. The tenendas clause ran thus:—"To be holden the said subjects and others of and under the said first parties and their successors for payment of the feu-duty and other prestations after mentioned; but always with and under the burden of the whole conditions, reservations, burdens, qualifications, and irritancies underwritten, which are declared to be real liens and burdens affecting the said two pieces of ground hereby disposed, videlicet—That dwelling-houses, offices, and other buildings of the yearly value of at least £50 sterling per annum, or of the capital value of twenty years' purchase thereof, shall be erected by the said second parties within two years, upon both or either of the said two pieces of ground hereby feued, at the distance of not less than twenty-five feet from the centre of the said turnpike road . . . and that the said second parties shall maintain, uphold, and keep the said houses so to be erected in such good order and repair as will be sufficient to make them yield such rent, or continue of such value in all time coming: And failing such houses being erected, or in the event of the same, after having been erected, falling into decay, or being destroyed by fire, and the said second parties failing to rebuild the same within one year and six months after they and their foresaids shall have been required by the said first parties, or their successors, so to do, then, and in that event, these presents, and all following thereon, shall, in the option of the said first parties, become null and void."

No. 32.

Nov. 20, 1891.
Macrae v.
Mackenzie's
Trustee.

By the reddendo clause the second parties bound themselves to pay to the first parties and their foresaids the sum of £38, 7s. 10d. of feu-duty yearly, and further "by acceptance hereof" the second parties bound and obliged themselves to insure the houses to be erected on the ground against fire, and to rebuild them if burnt down.

The company entered into possession of the two pieces of ground, and continued to possess them till 1889, during which time they regularly paid the feu-duty.

John Hyslop died on 7th March 1878, and in 1879 the company was dissolved. John Mackenzie died on 16th May 1885, and with a view to complete the winding-up of the company's affairs Kenneth Mackenzie in 1889, with the consent of the trustees of the late John Mackenzie, disposed and conveyed the subjects contained in the feu-contract to himself, his heirs and successors whomsoever.

On 20th May 1890 Kenneth Mackenzie died, the stipulation in the feu-contract regarding the erection of houses upon the ground conveyed not having been implemented.

Mr Macrae, who had been appointed judicial factor in 1888 upon the trust-estate of the late Mr Buchanan, called upon the widow of Kenneth Mackenzie, as his sole trustee and executor, to implement the obligation, but she intimated by letter that "she did not claim the property feued under the feu-contract," and repudiated all liability in connection therewith.

No. 32.
 Nov. 20, 1891.
Macrae v.
Mackenzie's
Trustee.

On 19th February 1891 Mr Macrae raised this action against her, as sole trustee under her husband's settlement, concluding to have her ordained to erect upon the portions of ground conveyed by the feu-contract "dwelling-houses, offices, and other buildings of the yearly value of at least £50 sterling per annum, or of the capital value of twenty years' purchase thereof, . . . and when erected to maintain and uphold the same in such good order and repair as will be sufficient to make them yield such rent or continue of such value in all time coming . . . and in the event of the defender failing to erect the said . . . buildings, or in the event of decree for specific implement as aforesaid not being pronounced . . . the defender should be decerned and ordained to pay the sum of £600 sterling . . . in name of damages."

In cond. 13 the pursuer averred;—"In the event of the defender failing to implement the obligation to erect said buildings, the pursuer will suffer loss and damage to the extent of £1000, which corresponds to the pecuniary amount of the said obligation to build houses and others of the yearly value of £50 per annum, or of the capital value of twenty years' purchase thereof, or otherwise, to the saleable value of an undoubted annual payment of £38, 7s. 10d., being the amount of said feu-duty, less £400, the present value of the buildings already on said feu, and the feu itself as vacant ground. This leaves £600 claimable in name of damages."

The pursuer pleaded;—(4) In any view the pursuer is entitled to decree against the defender to erect dwelling-houses and others, as concluded for. (5) Alternatively, in the event of the defender not being ordained or failing to erect said buildings, the defender should be found liable in damages, in terms of the conclusion of the summons therefor.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant. (2) No title to sue. (5) The defender being under no obligation to implement the terms of the feu-contract, she should be assolizied.

On 8th July the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . Finds that, at the date of his death, the late Kenneth Mackenzie was personally bound, under the feu-contract condescended on, to erect buildings of the character and value specified therein, and that he failed to erect the said buildings within the time fixed: Finds that the said personal obligation is now binding on the defender as his general representative: Finds that it is inexpedient to order specific implement of the said obligation by the defender; . . . appoints the case to be put to the roll for further procedure," &c.*

* "OPINION.— . . . I am of opinion that the pursuer has stated a relevant case for inquiry. The defence is that, under the feu-contract, the condition of the erection of buildings by the second parties is merely a real burden which perhaps might be enforced against the vassal actually in possession, and failure to implement which might be followed in the option of the superior by irritancy of the feu, but that is not a personal obligation or debt which transmits against the representatives of the deceased vassal who do not take up the feu. I am of opinion that this defence is not well founded. The condition that buildings of the character and value of those specified 'shall be erected by the second parties' was a condition of the grant which was personally binding on the disponees, and became prestable, and should have been implemented within two years after the date of the feu-contract, a period which expired during Kenneth Mackenzie's lifetime. It is true that it is provided that, in the event of the second parties failing to build, the feu-contract shall, in the option of the first party, become null and void. But this provision, I take it, is in addition to the first party's right to demand and enforce implement of the obligation; and it scarcely can be disputed that the pursuer could have enforced it against the original vassal, or claimed damages instead of irritating the feu.

The defender reclaimed, and argued ;—The obligation in question was expressed in the ordinary words of style used in feu-contracts for making such an obligation a real burden running with the lands conveyed. It was a continuous obligation, which in the absence of express stipulation to the contrary was enforceable against the vassal in actual possession of

No. 32.

Nov. 20, 1891.
Macrae v.
Mackenzie's
Trustee.

"The obligation to build is just as much a matter of contract and condition of the right as the obligation to pay feu-duty. Now, the established rule in regard to the latter condition is, that the representatives of a deceased vassal are liable for arrears of feu-duty which became due during the vassal's lifetime, although they are not liable to implement such conditions of the feu as do not become due or prestatable until after his death. As the Lord President says in Aiton v. Russell's Executors, 16 R. 625,—'Under a feu-charter the vassal, by acceptance of the feu, puts himself under a personal obligation to pay the redendo, and subjects his representatives to pay whatever feu-duties may become due during the possession of the feu. That obligation becomes on his death a personal debt. On the other hand, his heir, if he takes up the succession in like manner becomes liable for feu-duties.' The decision in the case of Aiton, which was founded on by the defenders, does not, I think, apply, because it related to payment of feu-duties which became due after the vassal's death.

"The logical result of this would be that the defender should be ordained to implement her husband's obligation by building in terms of the feu-contract. But it appears to me that this is not a case in which specific implement should be enforced. No doubt specific implement is not impossible, but I think it would be inexpedient and unreasonable to ordain the defender to erect upon the pursuer's land buildings from which she can derive no benefit, especially as such a decree can only be enforced by imprisonment, if indeed that is competent.

"It seems to me that the pursuer's true claim is one of damages, if he can qualify damage. It will be for consideration what is the true measure of the claim. That is not a very simple question. The purpose for which the feuar was taken bound to build, so far as the superior was concerned, was not to make the buildings the superior's property, but to secure the superior's feu-duty by increasing the value of the subjects. If Mr Mackenzie had built, and the defender after his death declined to enter, no doubt the pursuer would have got back the land with the buildings on it. But if the feuar had built on the ground, it is not probable that the defender would have declined to take up the feu. Again, if the pursuer had irritated the feu during Mackenzie's lifetime in respect of his failure to build, he would have simply got back the lands without buildings on it. The present is a third case. The feuar dies, having failed to build, and his heir, as she is entitled to do, declines to take up the feu. The superior has not lost any feu-duties to which he was entitled, but he is thus left with the land on his hands, without the buildings which should have been erected. The land will therefore bring a smaller return, if sold or feued again, than if buildings had been erected; but is the superior entitled to the whole of the difference?

"I was referred by the pursuer to the case of Napier v. Speirs' Trustees, 9 Sh. 655, as a case in which the Court ordered specific implement by ordaining the representatives of the deceased vassal to build. That case is full of specialities, and is not very well reported. But it appears that, in the course of the inquiry ordered by the Court, it was ascertained that not merely the original feuar but also his trustees had been in possession of the feu. It would also seem, although this is not so clear, that the trustees were given an opportunity of building in order to avoid irritancy of the feu. For instance, the Lord Justice-Clerk says,—'Our present interlocutor must bear that now the condition of the contract shall be implemented within a reasonable time or the irritancy take place.'

"The case of Moore v. Paterson, 9 R. 337, may be referred to for opinions to the effect that the Court will, in some circumstances, not order specific implement, even although the factum prestatum may not be impossible of performance.

No. 32.
 Nov. 20, 1891.
Macrae v.
Mackenzie's
Trustee.

the feu, because it went "with the proprietorship of the time."¹ After his death, however, it did not transmit against his personal representative,² unless he had expressly bound himself, his heirs, executors, and successors, conjunctly and severally, to perform it,³ or (in the case of ground-annuals) had expressly bound himself and his representatives as well as his "successors" in the ground-annual.⁴ In the present case the obligation was imposed upon the vassal holding the lands under the grant for the time being, and upon no one else. The following cases relied upon by the pursuer could be thus explained. In Marquis of Abercorn v. Marnoch,⁵ the ground of judgment was that there were mutual personal rights created by the nature and terms of the arrangement between the parties. In *Hunter's*⁶ case, the question in the present case could not arise, because the action was raised by the superior against the first vassal who was still in possession of the lands. In *Napier v. Spiers' Trustees*⁷ there was a distinct personal obligation by the vassal imposed on himself, his heirs, and assignees, to build and maintain buildings. In any case, under the special terms of the grant, the superior's remedy was to irritate the feu, and as he had neglected to avail himself of that remedy, he must be held to have acquiesced in the non-fulfilment of the obligation.⁸ There being then no obligation enforceable against the defender, she could not be made liable in damages for its breach. It was said that the obligation not having been fulfilled by Kenneth Mackenzie during his lifetime, it transmitted at his death, like an obligation to pay arrears of feu-duty, against the defender as his personal representative. This question, however, could not arise on the present summons, the theory of which was that the defender should be ordained to pay damages, not for her husband's breach of the obligation, but for breach of an obligation attaching to herself.

Argued for the pursuer;—Under a feu-contract the vassal by accepting the feu placed himself and his representatives under a personal obligation to the superior to perform all the obligations contained in the feu-contract.⁹ This liability was always implied even though it was not expressed. The terms of a feu-contract were not those of a grant, but of a sale, and a sale necessarily implied a counter obligation as to price, which in a feu-contract was the obligation to pay feu-duty, and to fulfil the other prestations of the feu.¹⁰ Indeed, since the cases of Marquis of Abercorn and Napier,¹¹ it had never been doubted that in all building feu-contracts

¹ Marshall's Trustee v. Macneill & Co., June 19, 1888, 15 R. 762, per Lord Shand, p. 772; Marquis of Tweeddale's Trustees v. Earl of Haddington, Feb. 25, 1880, 7 R. 620.

² Police Commissioners of Dundee v. Straton, &c., Feb. 22, 1884, 11 R. 586, per Lord President, p. 590; Marshall's Trustee v. Macneill & Co., vide supra, note 1; Magistrates of Glasgow v. Hay, &c., Feb. 23, 1883, 10 R. 635, per Lord President, 638; Aiton v. Russell's Executors, March 19, 1889, 16 R. 625.

³ Police Commissioners of Dundee v. Straton, &c., vide supra, note 2; Burns v. Martin, Feb. 14, 1887, 14 R. (H. L.) 20.

⁴ Small v. Millar, Feb. 3, 1849, 11 D. 495, 21 Scot. Jur. 143; Gardyne v. Royal Bank, March 8, 1851, 13 D. 912, 23 Scot. Jur. 410 (H. L.) May 13, 1853, 1 Macqueen, 358.

⁵ Marquis of Abercorn v. Marnoch, Jan. 26, 1816, F. C., and June 26, 1817.

⁶ Hunter v. Boog, Dec. 16, 1831, 13 S. 205, 7 Scot. Jur. 107.

⁷ Napier v. Spiers' Trustees, May 31, 1831, 9 S. 655, 3 Scot. Jur. 458.

Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Begg, Dec. 20, 1883, 11 R. 352.

⁹ Bell's Prin. sec. 700.

¹⁰ Hunter v. Boog, vide supra, note 6; Napier v. Spiers' Trustees, supra, note 7.

¹¹ Marquis of Abercorn v. Marnoch, vide supra, note 5; Napier v. Spiers' Trustees, vide supra, note 7.

there was an implied personal obligation to erect houses as a security for the feu-duty. The fact that the obligation was made a real burden did not detract from its personal character.¹ The claim was analogous to that for arrears of feu-duty, which could undoubtedly be enforced against the personal representative of a deceased vassal.² The option of irritating the feu was just an additional remedy to what the law had already given to the superior, and it could not be maintained that by being given it he was deprived of the ordinary common law remedies of an action ad factum præstandum, or of damages in the event of non-fulfilment of the obligation. He was entitled then to ask the Court to order specific implement against the defender of the obligation to build.³ Failing that, damages. It was perfectly obvious that the land without the buildings stipulated to be erected would bring a smaller return if sold or feued again than if the obligation had been implemented.

No. 32.

Nov. 20, 1891.
Macrae v.
Mackenzie's
Trustees.

At advising,—

LORD KINNEAR.—The only question which we have now to decide is, whether the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right in so far as it gives effect to the conclusion of the summons by which the pursuer seeks to have the defender, as the personal representative of the deceased Kenneth Mackenzie, ordained to implement an obligation to build on certain lands in which Kenneth Mackenzie died infeft, and, failing implement, to pay damages for the loss sustained by the pursuer from such failure.

I think it is material to see, in the first place, what was exactly the position of Kenneth Mackenzie, the deceased, whom the defender represents, under his title. By feu-contract between the superior and Kenneth Mackenzie and others the superior conveys to him and two other persons named—John Mackenzie and John Hyslop—and the survivors and survivor of them, and the heir of the last survivor, certain lands, as trustees in trust for behoof of a company. Now, the effect of that conveyance was that Kenneth Mackenzie and his two partners were made conjunct fiars in the subject during their joint lives, but that on the death of the first deceiver of the three fiars the feu was not divided—the share of the first deceiver passing, in terms of the conveyance, on his death, to the other two, instead of descending to his own heirs, and the share of the second deceiver, in like manner, passing, upon his death to the sole survivor and his heirs. Therefore during the joint lives of John Mackenzie and John Hyslop, Kenneth Mackenzie was joint fiar with them in the lands. After their death he became the sole fiar and the sole vassal liable to the superior in the prestations of the feu. It appears that for reasons which were probably perfectly valid, but with which we have nothing to do, he was advised to execute a new conveyance in his own favour. But that made no difference in his feudal relation to the superior.

Again, it is of no consequence to the feudal relation, and therefore it is of no consequence to this case, what were his liabilities to the representatives of his deceased cofeuars or copartners during their lives, because he became on their death the sole vassal of the superior and the only person liable to perform the prestations of the feu-contract. Now, Kenneth Mackenzie died in 1890, and

¹ Marquis of Abercorn v. Marnoch; Marquis of Tweeddale's Trustees v. Earl of Haddington, vide supra, notes 1 and 5.

² Aiton v. Russell's Executors, vide supra, note 2.

³ Napier v. Spiers' Trustees, vide supra, note 7; Bell's Prins. iii. 29.

No. 32.
 Nov. 20, 1891.
 Macrae v.
 Mackenzie's
 Trustee.

it is said that the defender is the sole trustee under his trust-disposition and settlement, and it is upon that ground that the action is brought against her. We know nothing as to her beneficial interest under this trust-disposition, and in particular, we are not informed whether she had any right to take up the feu, or whether it passed to the heir of the last vassal. I infer from the statement in the 12th article of the condescendence that the pursuer means to represent that the feu was conveyed to her, because he says that she is desirous of disposing of it, but he does not explicitly state that. At all events, I take it to be clear, from what is stated upon the record, that she is not now in the position of being the pursuer's vassal in these subjects. That being so, it appears to me to be of no consequence to inquire whether that is because Kenneth Mackenzie's right to the lands has passed to someone else, or because she, having right to take up the estate as disponee, has refrained from doing so. The only ground in law which the pursuer alleges against the defender is, that she is the personal representative of her deceased husband, and if she is liable in that character, it is of no consequence whether the estate has passed to the heir of the last vassal or to some stranger disponee, or whether it is in the hereditas jacens of the deceased. If she is not liable in that character, then it is equally of no importance what has become of the estate. The only question therefore is, whether the defender, as the personal representative of the late vassal, is liable to perform the conditions of the feu-contract.

Now, the particular condition which she is required to perform in this action is to erect certain dwelling-houses, and after having erected them, to maintain and uphold them in good order. I am unable to agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that any obligation to that effect has been imposed upon the representatives of the late vassal, so as to subject them to an action for specific implement of the obligation.

The general rule in the construction of feu-contracts upon which the Lord Ordinary considers that this case depends is perfectly well settled. It had been settled long before the cases of Aiton v. Russell and The Police Commissioners of Dundee v. Straton, to which his Lordship refers; but it is stated nowhere more clearly than in the judgment of the Lord President in the latter case. The only difficulty in these arose from the imposition of an obligation on the vassal, and his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever. If that means that all the heirs, executors, and successors are bound conjunctly and severally, then there can be no doubt they are all liable in solidum, and no question would arise: but if they are not bound jointly but severally, then a question which is sometimes of difficulty arises—since the vassal has bound himself and his executors to a certain extent, and his successors in the feu to a certain extent—on what conditions the obligation arises against each of the different sets of successors.

Now, the rule which has been laid down in the cases to which I have referred is perfectly clear, at all events in its application to the main prestation in a feu-contract—the obligation to pay feu-duty—because the Lord President says,—“According to invariable practice, an obligation imposed in the terms which I have quoted is an obligation upon the vassal himself so long as he remains vassal and lives, and after his death upon his heirs and executors, for payment of arrears, but upon his successors in the feu only, to the exclusion of his personal representatives, for payment of the feu-duty in future.” Now, if the obligation which we have to consider had been expressed in the same terms as those which are contained in an ordinary feu-contract, and if the vassal had thus bound himself and his heirs, executors, and successors to build and uphold the buildings after they had been erected, I confess I should not have thought there was much difficulty in applying the general rule explained by the Lord President to such a case, because it really rests upon this principle—that every continuous obligation in a feu-contract or feu-charter, in the absence of special stipulation to the contrary, must be transmissible and enforceable against the vassal in the feu, and not transmissible or enforceable against the personal representatives of the deceased vassal, who are not themselves vassals in the feu.

No. 32.

Nov. 20, 1891.
Macrae v.
Mackenzie's
Trustee.

In applying that rule I should certainly think it very difficult to suppose that a superior imposing an obligation to build houses upon his land should look to anyone for the performance of that obligation, excepting to the owner of the land for the time being, and it is not conceivable that he should look to anybody else for implement of an obligation to uphold and maintain houses after they had been erected. Therefore, if the condition in question were imposed upon the vassal, and his heirs and successors, by the words of the obligation in ordinary feu-contracts, I should, as I have said, have very little difficulty in holding that that transmitted to the successive feuars, but did not transmit against personal representatives.

But in this case it appears to me that the question does not even arise, because it is absolutely excluded by the terms of the feu-contract itself.

For the obligation to build, whatever may be its effect, is not in terms imposed upon heirs, executors, or successors whatsoever, but solely upon the vassal holding the lands under the grant for the time being. The feuars do not, either in words or substance, undertake an obligation that they are to build houses, and to perform any one of the prestations which are to be found in that part of the deed. The subject is conveyed under certain conditions and obligations, which are declared to be real burdens affecting the pieces of ground thereby disposed, and one of these obligations is that dwelling-houses of a certain value shall be erected "by the second parties within two years upon both or either of the said two pieces of ground," and that "the said second parties shall maintain, uphold, and keep the said houses so to be erected in" good order and repair. Now, the second parties are simply the first feuars—that is to say, the three persons to whom the subject is conveyed in the feu-contract. There is no obligation undertaken or imposed upon anybody else. I am very far indeed from saying that a conveyance in these terms does not create a personal obligation enforceable against anybody who may take up the land under this grant. I think it is settled law—at all events since the case of Hunter v. Boog—that when land is leased out for onerous considerations on certain conditions, these conditions are imposed as obligations upon the feuar or vassal who accepts delivery of the land. They are obligations ex contractu, which he is bound to perform, because they are the conditions upon which the grant is made, and upon which he has accepted it. I think such obligations are binding upon him and enforceable against him in exactly the same way as if he had undertaken and bound himself to perform them in express terms. It appears to me to be of no consequence whether such obligations are expressed in a feu-charter or in a bilateral contract; or if in a bilateral contract, whether they are expressed in that part of the deed by which the superior conveys under certain express conditions, or in that part of it by which the feuar undertakes to perform certain prestations in return for the grant. It is of no consequence in what form the conditions are expressed. The feuar who takes the land under the superior's grant puts himself under the personal

No. 32.

Nov. 20, 1891.
Macrae v.
Mackenzie's
Trustee.

obligation to perform the conditions of the grant. I think it equally clear in the present case that nobody could take the land from the first feuar as heir or disponee, and so become the vassal in his place, without subjecting himself to the same conditions and to the same extent as the original grantee, because by declaring that the conditions are to be real burdens the superior has taken the ordinary and perfectly effectual method of providing that they shall attach not only to the first vassal but to all heirs or singular successors who take the estate from him. But then these are obligations or conditions of the grant binding upon the vassal who for the time being holds the land in terms of the grant, and upon nobody else. Therefore, it appears to me to be quite out of the question to hold that they affect not only the grantee and his successors in the feu, but also the personal representatives of the deceased vassal who had no interest in the land.

I think it is of no consequence whether such representatives are also mortis causa disponees of the original grantee, who have declined to take benefit from his conveyance, or whether they are in the position of being personal representatives merely, who have no right under the grant.

As personal representatives they are in my opinion in no way liable to perform any conditions attaching solely to the vassals holding the land under the grant. I am therefore unable to agree with the Lord Ordinary.

His Lordship thinks that the defender ought not to be compelled to implement the obligation, because it would not be expedient to enforce specific implement. I think the true reason that she cannot be compelled to do so is that there is no obligation affecting her which could be enforced.

If that be so—if the defender is under no obligation to build, and cannot for that reason be compelled to do so—it follows as a matter of course that she is under no liability in damages. She cannot be subjected to damages for failing to perform an obligation which does not attach to her.

But the Lord Ordinary suggests a different ground—and it has been urged on us in argument—upon which he thinks the defender may be made liable, because he says that there was, no doubt, a personal obligation upon the late Kenneth Mackenzie, whom she represents, that he failed in breach of his contract to perform that obligation, that in consequence he became liable in damages to the superior, and that that liability transmits as a personal debt against the defender, as his representative; and he likens the case to that of a claim for arrears of feu-duty, which could undoubtedly be enforced against the personal representatives of a deceased vassal, although a claim for future feu-duties could attach only to the deceased vassal's successors in the feu. But arrears of feu-duty become debts of the debtor's representatives, not because they are under any continuous obligation to pay feu-duty, but because the debt has arisen against the deceased during his life, for which they, as his representatives, are liable.

As I have already indicated, I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that there was a personal obligation binding upon Kenneth Mackenzie, and I do not see any reason to doubt—although I do not think it is absolutely necessary to decide the point—that that was an obligation which might be enforced by the ordinary legal remedies, either by an action for implement, or by an action to recover damages for breach of contract. It does not occur to me that the stipulation by which the superior declares that in the event of the obligation to build not being performed, the grant shall, in his own option, become null and void could be construed as excluding the ordinary legal remedies which would be available to him in the event of failure to perform the obligation. I think that is a provision by which the superior secures to himself, in his option, an additional right beyond what the common law would have given him if it had not been expressed. A provision that he shall have a further and exceptional remedy does not appear to me to import that he is excluded from enforcing his obligation by the ordinary remedies that would be available to him at common law.

No. 32.
Nov. 20, 1891.
Macrae v.
Mackenzie's
Trustee.

But assuming that there was a good personal obligation affecting Kenneth Mackenzie, and that the superior might have recovered damages from him for his breach of contract during his life, then the question might arise whether a debt has been created against him which may now be enforced against his personal representative. I do not think it necessary to decide that question, because that is not the demand which the pursuer makes in this case. If there is any such liability, it is the liability of a representative for her ancestor's breach of contract; and that is not what the pursuer seeks to enforce in this case. The conclusion of the summons is for implement of an obligation attaching to the defender herself; and the conclusion for damages is a conclusion "that in the event of the defender failing or refusing to erect said dwelling-houses" and so on, the defender "should be decerned and ordained to make payment to the pursuer of £600" in name of damages. That is to say, there is an obligation now attaching to the defender; she is to be compelled to perform that; and if she does not perform it, then she is to be liable in damages in consequence of her breach of her own obligation. Now, it is quite impossible to make any use of that conclusion for the purpose of recovering from her damages, not for her own breach of the obligation at all, but for a previous breach of contract by the person whom she represents. Upon that ground I am of opinion that it is neither necessary nor proper to consider the question whether if there was a personal obligation affecting the deceased vassal, the defender, as his representative, is liable in damages for his failure. The conclusions of the action exclude any other demand except a demand that she should perform an obligation attaching to herself, or pay damages for her own breach. I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor must be recalled, and that the defender should be absolved from the conclusions of the action.

LORD ADAM.—The question in this case arises upon the construction of a feu-contract by which the superior conveys and disposes to the three partners of the Bank Coal Company, and to the survivors and survivor of them, and the heir of the last survivor, in trust for behoof of their said company, certain pieces of ground, to be holden "of and under the first parties and their successors for payment of the feu-duty and other prestations after mentioned," but under the burden of the whole conditions, reservations, and so on, which are declared to be real burdens. Then follows the particular condition in question.

There was first a provision that the vassal should build dwelling-houses of a certain annual value, and that he should maintain them, and if burned down should rebuild them; and then there follows this condition—not very happily expressed—that in the event of the feuars failing to implement their obligations, "these presents and all following thereon shall, in the option of the said first parties, become null and void." These are the three clauses of the feu-contract with which we have to deal. The husband of the defender, Mr Kenneth Mackenzie, came to be the last survivor of those mentioned in the contract, and he died in possession of the subjects. Now, I do not see any reason to doubt that

No. 32.

Nov. 20, 1891.
Macrae v.
Mackenzie's
Trustee.

Kenneth Mackenzie, the defender's husband, by accepting the feu and becoming vassal under this feu-contract, came under the conditions on which alone he was entitled to hold the subjects, viz., that he would erect dwelling-houses of a certain value. I should not doubt that in a feu-contract so expressed—where lands are given under the express condition of something being done, and these lands are accepted by the vassal under that condition—that out of that state of circumstances a personal obligation arises against the vassal to fulfil the condition during his tenancy of the feu. I think that the vassal's duty would have been better expressed if the feu-contract had in this particular case used words of direct obligation. But anybody accepting it under these conditions necessarily came under an obligation to fulfil them. That is my construction of this part of the deed.

The superior stipulated that in a certain event there should be an irritancy imposed, in his option. I concur with Lord Kinnear's observations on that matter. Of course we are familiar with an irritancy in respect of arrears of feu-duty for two years, but I do not think that there would have been any legal irritancy implied here for infringing this condition. But I quite agree with Lord Kinnear in his observations in this matter, that unless there be something in the deed to shew the contrary, where a superior stipulates for an irritancy of that sort, he is merely stipulating for an additional remedy, by the use of which he may enforce performance of the conditions of the contract, and that because he so stipulates for an additional remedy he does not, and the parties do not, mean that that should in any way interfere with the use and employment of the ordinary remedies which he has in such cases. I have no doubt that it might be stipulated that such irritancy should be the only remedy, but I find nothing to indicate such intention here. Therefore I think, although that clause of irritancy be there, the vassal who holds the feu is not relieved from the personal obligation to fulfil it, and I think he undertakes it by entering into and taking possession of the subjects.

Now, the facts being so, I should have thought that the defender's late husband, Kenneth Mackenzie, was, as the Lord Ordinary says, under a personal obligation to fulfil the conditions of this feu, and therefore that he was bound to build, and that he having failed in that obligation, the defender, as his trustee, is bound to fulfil that debt of his. But that is not the nature of this action at all, because, as Lord Kinnear has stated, it is an action to have her compelled to perform a personal obligation which is alleged to be incumbent upon herself, and for damages for failure to fulfil that personal obligation of hers. Now, that is just where I think the Lord Ordinary has gone wrong in this case. He "finds that the said personal obligation is now binding on the defender as his general representative." I do not think that it falls upon the defender as personal representative of the late Kenneth Mackenzie. I think that the obligation is transmissible and enforceable against nobody but the vassal himself. I agree with Lord Kinnear that the questions which arose in the cases of Russell v. Aiton, and the Magistrates of Dundee v. Straton, are not in this case, because from the very nature of the case it can only arise where a person becomes vassal in the feu, because these conditions are not imposed as separate obligations; they are only imposed as conditions of the acceptance and holding of the feu. Now if that be so—if a person never takes possession and never accepts the feu, and the defender has not—there is no condition which can raise an obligation against her. It is only in respect of the acceptance of the feu that the oblig-tion arises. If the feu is never accepted, the obligation can never arise. In my view that is enough for the disposal of this action, because, as Lord Kinnear has pointed out, this action is founded upon a certain obligation the fulfilment of which is personal to the defender. If she is under no obligation to fulfil any stipulation, it is clear that she can be under no liability in damages for not fulfilling a condition which is not binding upon her at all; that is the state of this process.

No. 32.
Nov. 20, 1891.
Macrae v.
Mackenzie's
Trustee.

Upon these grounds I entirely concur in all that Lord Kinnear has said.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in Lord Kinnear's opinion, and I only wish to express one qualification which I think is implied in the opinions which have been given—I mean, when we say that an obligation of this kind if unfulfilled by the immediate grantee transmits against the next vassal, it is understood that we are speaking of an obligation which has some natural relation to the lands or the subjects of disposition. This is the character of the obligation in the present case. It is an obligation to put buildings on the lands. We know that there are decisions of this Court, and also of the House of Lords, where the subject has received very great consideration, to the effect that a continuing obligation having relation to lands, such as an obligation to relieve the other party of the payment of tithes or public burdens, will transmit against the heir in heritage, assuming that the relation of superior and feuar existed between the original contracting parties. But it is conceivable that obligations unconnected with the land or subject of conveyance may be undertaken in a feu-contract, and such obligations would not in general affect the heir in heritage. There are, of course, some obligations which would not be binding on anyone—I mean such as are annulled by the operation of the statute law. Of this nature are obligations to render personal services to the superior, and obligations restraining alienation without the consent of the superior, both of which are prohibited as to all future grants by the Act abolishing Ward Holdings, 20 Geo. II. c. 50. Another instance is the condition that deeds of transmission of the feu are to be prepared by the superior's agent—a condition which is made illegal by one of the sections of the Conveyancing Act. But setting aside these cases, it is evident that these are conditions which may be binding as matter of contract between the parties to the original feu-contract or charter although not relating to the subject-matter of the charter, and as to these the question might arise, whether the obligation, after the death of the original obligant, is to be performed by his heir or by his executors. Such cases of course are not very likely to arise, and I only wish to say that our decision in this case would not necessarily govern the case of the effect to be given in a question with the grantee's heirs to an obligation which is outside the proper scope of the feudal contract.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree in holding that the defender, who is not the vassal, is not bound to erect houses in terms of the clause in this feu-contract, and by consequence that she is not bound to pay damages if she does not do so. The conclusion of this action being solely to compel her to do one or other of these things, I think she is entitled to absolvitor.

We recall the interlocutor and assoilzie the defender.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and assoilzied the defender from the conclusions of the action.

R. D. C. MARSHALL, W.S.—GRAY & HANDYSIDE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 33.

ARIZONA COPPER COMPANY, Appellants.—Asher—Ure.

Nov. 20, 1891.

SURVEYOR OF TAXES, Respondents.—Lord-Adv. Pearson—A. J. Young.

Arizona
Copper Co. v.
Surveyor of Taxes.

Revenue—Income-Tax—Profits—Deduction—Bonus—Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. c. 35), Schedule D, First Case, Rules III. and IV. and sec. 159.—A company borrowed a large sum of money, and undertook, along with repayment of the capital sum borrowed, to pay the lenders a bonus of 10 per cent thereon. Held that, in estimating the balance of profits and gains chargeable under Schedule D, the company were not entitled to deduct the amount of the bonus from the profits of the year in which it was paid.

Exchequer Cause.

1st Division.

THE ARIZONA COPPER COMPANY, LIMITED, was formed and registered on 11th August 1882, and was reconstructed in 1884. On 4th December 1883 a company called the Arizona Trust and Mortgage Company, Limited, was formed and registered, as the prospectus bore, "primarily for the purpose of acquiring and holding the obligations of the Arizona Copper Company, Limited, and to provide the funds necessary to complete its works."

By agreement between the two companies, dated 8th and 11th December 1883, it was provided, inter alia (1) that the Mortgage Company should lend to the Copper Company the whole sum required for their purposes, not exceeding in all the sum of £360,000; (2) that the Copper Company should repay all such sums as were lent, on 15th May 1894, with an option to the Copper Company, upon giving six months' notice to the Mortgage Company, to pay a part or the whole of the advances made to them at 15th May 1889, and that on repayment of any capital sum the Copper Company should also pay to the Mortgage Company along therewith a bonus of 10 per cent on the amount repaid; and (3) that the Copper Company should pay interest at the rate of 10 per cent on the amount of the advances due by them.

Following upon this agreement the Mortgage Company lent the Copper Company sums amounting to £337,414, and the Copper Company repaid these sums under an agreement dated 2d and 4th June 1888, and along with repayment of the capital sum borrowed they paid the Mortgage Company the stipulated bonus of 10 per cent, which, less 7 per cent discount, amounted to £31,379, 11s. 9d.

In making their return for assessment to income-tax, under Schedule D* for the year 1889-90, based on the profits of the three preceding

* Rule Third of the First Case under Schedule (D) provides: "In estimating the balance of profits and gains chargeable under Schedule (D), or for the purpose of assessing the duty thereon, no sum shall be set against or deducted from or allowed to be set against or deducted from, such profits or gains, on account of any sum expended for repairs of premises occupied for the purpose of such trade, manufacture, adventure or concern, nor for any sum expended for the supply or repairs or alterations of any implements, utensils, or articles employed for the purpose of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, beyond the sum usually expended for such purposes according to an average of three years preceding the year in which such assessment shall be made; nor on account of loss not connected with or arising out of such trade, manufacture, adventure or concern; nor on account of any capital withdrawn therefrom; nor for any sum employed or intended to be employed as capital in such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern; nor for any capital employed in improvement of premises occupied for the purpose of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, nor on account or under pretence of any interest which might have been made on such sums if laid out at interest; nor for any debts, except bad debts proved to be such to the satisfaction of the Commissioners respectively; and years, 1886-8, the Copper Company stated a sum of £27,462, 8s. 7d. as the amount of their profits for the purpose of assessment, and on that sum they were assessed and paid income-tax. In making that return the Copper Company had deducted from the profits of the year ending 30th September 1888, inter alia, the amount of the bonus of £31,379, 11s. 9d., but this and certain other deductions were disallowed by the Income-Tax Commissioners, and an additional assessment intimated. No. 33. Nov. 20, 1891. Arizona Copper Co. v. Surveyor of Taxes.

The Copper Company then appealed to the General Commissioners of Income-Tax. In support of their appeal they stated,—“The above sum of £31,379, 11s. 9d. was duly debited to profit and loss, as a charge on the business of the company, and it remained at the debit of that account until, in order to identify the larger sums so dealt with, and, if deemed expedient, spread them over longer than one year, the said suspense capital account was opened. The amount debited to that account was in due course charged against and paid out of the profits of the company.”

The General Commissioners refused to allow the deduction claimed for the amount of the bonus, and at the request of the Copper Company a case was stated for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer.

Argued for the company ;—The company’s right to deduct the amount of the bonus was not rested on the ground that such a deduction was among those specially authorised by the Income-Tax Act. The deductions there authorised were of payments out of profits, but the bonus was not in the sense of the Act a payment out of profits at all. It was part of the expense of carrying on the business of the company, without which no profits could be earned, and was to be deducted before the profits could be ascertained. The prohibitions contained in the statute against deductions out of profits had, therefore, no application. Assuming that these prohibitions did apply, there was none directed against deducting a payment of this kind, and, as the scheme of the Act was to enumerate all the deductions not allowed, the inference was that the deduction here claimed was one which might be made. In the cases of *Addie*¹ and the *Coltness Iron Company*² it had been held that coalowners were not entitled to deduct the expense of sinking new pits, and in *Forder v. Handyside*³ that an ironfounder was not entitled to deduct a sum set aside for depreciation of plant, the ground of judgment being that the payments in question were really payments to account of capital. These cases were accordingly distinct from the present, as the payment for any average loss beyond the actual amount of loss after adjustment ; nor for any sum recoverable under an insurance or contract of indemnity.”

Rule 4th provides : “In estimating the amount of the profits and gains arising as aforesaid, no deduction shall be made on account of any annual interest, or any annuity or other annual payment, payable out of such profits or gains.”

Section 159 provides : “And be it enacted, that in the computation of the duty to be made under this Act in any of the cases before mentioned, either by the party making or delivering any list or statement required as aforesaid, or by the respective Assessors or Commissioners, it shall not be lawful to make any other deductions therefrom than such as are expressly enumerated in this Act, nor to make any deduction on account of any annual interest, annuity, or other annual payment, to be paid to any person out of any profits or gains chargeable by this Act, in regard that a proportionate part of the duty so to be charged is allowed to be deducted on making such payments. . . .”

¹ Addie v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue, Feb. 16, 1875, 2 R. 431.

² The Coltness Iron Co. v. Black, April 7, 1881, 8 R. (H. L.) 67.

³ Forder v. Handyside, 1876, L. R., 1 Exch. Div. 233.

No. 33. In this case was not of that character. In *Watney & Co. v. Musgrave*¹ a brewer was not allowed to deduct the amount of premiums paid by him on the purchase of leases of public-houses, in respect that these were payments made outside his business. Here the payment was made in order to carry on the business of the company. Whether the bonus was to be looked upon as additional interest payable for the year immediately preceding repayment of the loan, or as a commission to a financial agent for getting the loan, it was in either case a payment quite distinct in character from interest paid to the debenture-holders of a company, which was the payment under consideration in the Alexandria Water Company's case.² There was one decision³ on the quality of a bonus, but it threw no light on the present question, the payment there being quite different in character from the payment in this case.

Nov. 20, 1891.
Arizona
Copper Co. v.
Surveyor of Taxes.

Argued for the Surveyor of Taxes;—The sections in the Act dealing with deductions made no reference to gross or nett profits. A trader was therefore required to return for assessment everything in the nature of profits, subject only to the deductions allowed by the Act itself. The only allowable deduction from receipts other than those authorised by the Act was of legitimate working expenses, which had to be deducted before profits could be ascertained. The sum for which deduction was claimed here fell under neither category. In any view that might be taken of it, it was a payment made out of profits, and bearing express relation to capital. It therefore fell under the prohibition in Rule 3 of the First Case of Schedule D.⁴ It was not a commission, for there was no intermediary, but even if looked upon as a commission it would not be an allowable deduction.⁵ Any idea that the claim of the Crown could be resisted on the ground that the bonus was the payment of a debt was excluded by the decision in the Mersey Docks case. It was either an "annual payment" in the sense of Rule 4 of the First Case, and of section 159,⁶ or—and this appeared to be the most correct view—it was additional interest on borrowed capital, and so fell under the prohibitions contained in the same clauses.⁷ It much resembled in character the premiums, deduction of which was disallowed in Watney & Company's case.¹ So far as the Crown was concerned, it was a question inter alios whether or not the borrower was entitled to deduct the amount of the tax before paying the lender.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Arizona Copper Company, Limited, borrowed from the Arizona Trust and Mortgage Company, Limited, moneys amounting to £337,414, for the purpose of completing their works. By the agreement between the two companies under which these loans were given, they were to be repaid on 15th May 1894; but the borrowers were entitled, upon giving six

¹ Watney & Co. v. Musgrave, 1880, L. R., 5 Exch. Div. 241.

² Alexandria Water Co. v. Musgrave, 1883, L. R., 11 Q. B. D. 174.

³ Irving v. Houstoun, July 27, 1803, 4 Pat. App. 521.

⁴ Southern Cemetery Co. v. Surveyor of Taxes, Nov. 29, 1889, 17 R. 154; Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Lucas, 1883, L. R., 8 App. Ca. 891; Paddington Burial Board v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 1884, L. R., 1 Q. B. D. 9.

⁵ City of London Contract Corporation, Limited, v. Styles, 1887, 2 Tax Cases 239.

⁶ Last v. London Assurance Corporation, Limited, 1885, L. R., 10 App. Ca. 438; Gresham Life Assurance Society v. Styles, 1890, L. R., 24 Q. B. 1500.

months' notice, to pay off the whole, or such portion as they thought fit, at 15th May 1889. On the repayment of any capital sum the borrowers undertook to pay to the lenders, along therewith, a bonus of 10 per cent upon the amount of the repayment.

No. 33.
Nov. 20, 1891.
Arizona
Copper Co. v.
Surveyor of Taxes.

The option thus given was exercised, and the whole loan has been repaid before the stipulated term, along with £31,379, 11s. 9d. as the covenanted bonus. This sum, according to the statement of the appellants (the borrowing company), was in their books debited to profit and loss, as a charge on the business of the company; it remained at the debit of that account until, in order to identify the larger sums so dealt with, and, if deemed expedient, spread them over longer than one year, it was put to a suspense capital account; but the amount was in due course charged against and paid out of the profits of the company.

The question before the Court is, whether the Arizona Copper Company, the borrowers, are entitled to deduct this bonus in returning their profits under the Income-Tax Acts.

There cannot be said to be any complexity or ambiguity in the application of the money or in the source from which it was paid. It was paid in a lump payment as one of the considerations stipulated for a loan of capital employed in the adventure,—to wit, in the completion of the works,—the other consideration being interest at 10 per cent per annum, and it is in terms admitted in the case to have been paid out of the profits of the company.

Now, at this stage of the development of the law of the income-tax, it is not to the purpose to consider whether such a payment is a proper deduction from the point of view of a business concern, making up its own balance-sheet for its own purposes. The question is, whether such a payment out of profits is an authorised deduction in estimating the balance chargeable under Schedule D. It appears to me, as a sum paid in return for a loan of capital, to be entirely heterogeneous to those outlays the deduction of which is permitted as being necessarily incidental to the earning of profit; and I think to deduct it would be contrary to the prohibitions laid down in Schedule D and in the 159th section of the same Act.

LORD ADAM.—I confess I cannot see upon this case, and I do not think the case tells us, when the various sums of capital were repaid by the Copper Company to the Mortgage Company and when the 10 per cent bonus accresced and became due. I rather gather that the matter is one of adjustment in the Copper Company's books. But however that may be, I think the most favourable way to take the question for the Copper Company is to assume, as was assumed in the discussion, that this whole sum of £31,379, 11s. 9d. was paid within the year in which it is proposed to be assessed, although, I confess, I do not see that that appears upon the face of the case.

Now, if that be so, my opinion is with your Lordship, that this sum of £31,379, 11s. 9d., is simply a debt due by the Copper Company to the Mortgage Company. So far as I can see it is not a loss incurred in carrying on the business of the Copper Company in any way. If it were, it might or it might not be a proper sum to deduct before striking the balance of profit and gains, even in a question with the Crown. But it is not a loss; it is merely a debt incurred in carrying on the business of the company. I do not see, if we were to allow a deduction of this debt, on the ground that it was paid out of profits,

No. 33. where we should be able to stop. I find no authority in any of the taxing statutes for allowing such a deduction.

Nov. 20, 1891.
Arizona
Copper Co. v.
Surveyor of Taxes.

Now, if the amount of this bonus be not, as I think it very clearly is not, a sum which ought to be deducted before striking the balance of profit and gains on which this company falls to be assessed, I think there is no question in this case, because if it is not to be deducted in order to ascertain the balance of profits and gains, then to be deducted it must fall under some of the clauses of the statute which allow deductions to be made. But there is no clause allowing such a deduction as this. Therefore I agree with your Lordship.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair, and the only remark I would make is, that if this is not profit, then the amount of profit earned in a particular year must depend on the resolution of the company to pay off debt or not to pay off debt. Now, that seems to me to reduce the case contended for against the Crown to the absurd proposition that the company should be entitled to fix what they consider profit, and be assessed upon that sum.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion.

THE COURT affirmed the determination of the Commissioners.

DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE—Agents.

No. 34. JOHN TURNBULL, Pursuer (Respondent).—Comrie Thomson—John Wilson.
JOHN OLIVER, Defender (Reclaimer).—Jameson—Sym.

Nov. 21, 1891.
Turnbull v.
Oliver.

Proof—Lease—Process—Jury Trial.—In an action of damages for wrongful sequestration at the instance of a tenant against his landlord the pursuer averred that the sequestration for non-payment of rent was in breach of an agreement to give an abatement from the rent stipulated in the written lease. The alleged agreement was not said to be instructed by any writing. Held that it was incompetent to prove it by parole, and (following Law v. Gibson, 13 S. 396) that an issue must be disallowed.

Reparation—Slander—Dishonourable conduct.—In a letter by a landlord to his tenant complaining of the failure of the latter to make immediate payment of a debt alleged to be due by him under a reference to an arbiter, the writer stated,—“I am surprised at your conduct, which you must see is very dishonourable.” Held that the letter was not actionable.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

JOHN TURNBULL brought this action for damages for wrongous sequestration and slander against John Oliver, solicitor in Hawick.

With reference to the claim for damages for wrongful sequestration, the pursuer made the following averments,—“By lease, dated 15th September 1876, the defender let to Thomas Turnbull,” the pursuer’s father, “the land of Burnflat for fifteen years from Candlemas 1876, at the yearly rent of £4 sterling for the first ten years of the said lease, and of £45 sterling for the remaining five years thereof. The lease was, however, of consent departed from in several respects, and, in particular, notwithstanding the terms of the lease, it was agreed between the parties that £40 per annum should be accepted during the last five years of the lease, and, in accordance with this agreement, £40 per annum was paid and accepted down till the last year. For that year, however, viz., the year from Candlemas 1890 to Candlemas 1891, the defender at first claimed at Lammas 1890 from the pursuer, as heir-at-law of his father, the sum of £22, 10s., being the half year’s rent at the rate of £45 per annum. In September 1890 the pursuer called on the defender at Hawick, and, as the result of the meeting the defender then and there distinctly agreed to accept of the rent at the former rate of £40 per annum, to allow an abatement of 5 per cent on said amount, and it was specially agreed he was to accept payment of the rent for the year when the whole produce from the farm had been realised by the pursuer"; that it had not been so realised when, on 26th September, the defender, without any notice, presented a petition for sequestration for payment of £22, 10s. as the half year's rent due at Lammas 1890, which was followed, on 29th September, by sequestration of stock, crop, &c. at Burnflat; that these proceedings were in direct breach of the agreement, and were wrongful and oppressive.

No. 34.

Nov. 21, 1891.
Turnbull v. Oliver.

With reference to the pursuer's claim for damages for slander, the pursuer averred that on the termination of the lease in February 1891 the defender called upon the pursuer to put the farm fences into repair in terms of the lease, and it was ultimately agreed to refer the matter to the arbitration of Mr Hobkirk, farmer, Hawick. "He was to point out what repairs ought to be done by the outgoing tenant, and to state an equivalent in money, and the pursuer was to have the option of adopting either method. The arbiter estimated that it would require certain quantities of paling, stobs, wire, &c. to put the whole fences on the farm in order, and, with the labour, estimated the cost at the total sum of £5, 19s. 6d., and awarded that sum, but did not specify what repairs ought to be done by the tenant. He embraced the march fences as well as the divisional fences; and on 21st April defender wrote the pursuer with a note of what he claimed under the reference. On the same day the pursuer replied as follows:—'I have received your letter of to-day's date. I return Mr Hobkirk's letter. I have sent the award by Mr Hobkirk to Hawick to be advised on it; and am writing to-night for its return. I regret Mr Hobkirk did not follow out his instructions and state the repairs required; and in order that I may write you definitely would you please say how you purpose dealing with the repairs required on the boundary fences? You previously charged the adjoining proprietors with half of these.—Yours, &c. JOHN TURNBULL. The amount in the award is £5, 19s. 6d.'" On the 22d the defender wrote to the pursuer,—“Dear Sir,—Burnflat Fences—I have received yours of yesterday and am surprised at your conduct, which you must see is very dishonourable. We agreed to abide by the arbiter's decision. The arbiter having decided that you are to pay a sum of money in settlement, your duty is now to fulfil your obligation by sending me a cheque in payment as per note of yesterday. If I do not receive payment by return I shall immediately serve you with a summons.” And on 23d April 1891 he wrote another letter, viz.:—“Since writing you yesterday I have seen Mr Hobkirk, who informs me that he sent you a copy of his award, and that he has never heard from you on the subject since. Behaviour of this kind is simply scandalous. You have no right to trouble Mr Hobkirk any further in the matter, and if I do not receive payment by to-morrow I shall take legal proceedings without delay.”

The pursuer further averred,—“The said letters are of and concerning the pursuer, and they represented, and were intended to represent, that the pursuer was a man of dishonest and dishonourable character, who was unjustly endeavouring to evade payment of a debt due by him to the defender. The said representations were absolutely false and unfounded, and they were made by the defender falsely, calumniously, and maliciously, and without any cause whatever. The pursuer has reason to believe, and he avers that the defender has falsely, calumniously, and maliciously circulated statements regarding him to the foresaid effect, and that the pursuer is a dishonest and dishonourable man and behaved scandalously, in the

No. 34. neighbourhood of Hawick, with the result that the pursuer's reputation has been seriously injured. The pursuer is a native of Hawick and is well known there."
 Nov. 21, 1891. —
 Turnbull v. Oliver.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action.

On 31st October 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) allowed issues of wrongful sequestration and slander.*

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—No issue should be allowed upon either ground. (1) It was incompetent to prove the averment, regarding the abatement of rent, by parole. It was not alleged that the pursuer had any written evidence in support of such an agreement as the Lord Ordinary seemed to imply. Further, he had not moved for a diligence to recover documents to support the averment. The case of *Law*¹ was entirely in point—it was likewise a case of damages for wrongful sequestration for non-payment of rent. In that case there was much more speci-

* "OPINION.—I have come to the conclusion, although with considerable hesitation, that the issues as finally proposed should be allowed. The first issue is proposed to try the conclusion for damages for wrongous sequestration, and is admittedly expressed in the appropriate terms—Watson v. McCulloch, 1st July 1878, 5 R. 843. But the defender maintains that the record does not warrant any such issue. What the pursuer alleges is, that the landlord agreed to abate the rent and to allow time for payment of it, and that the sequestration was used for the full rent and before the lapse of the time allowed. It is not maintained that it was wrongous for any other reason. It is indeed averred that the stock sequestered was greatly in excess, but it was explicitly admitted at the debate that no more was meant by that averment than that it exceeded what was necessary to cover the abated rent, and it was conceded that there would have been no actionable excess had there been no abatement.

"The defender's objection was that it was incompetent to prove by parole the alleged agreement to abate the rent and to allow time for payment, and reference was made to Gibb v. Winning, 28th May 1829, 7 S. D. 677; Law v. Gibsone, 3d February 1835, 13 S. D. 396; Kirkpatrick v. Allanshaw Coal Company, 17th December 1880, 8 R. 327.

"I express no opinion on this argument at present, but it appears to me that it does not follow from it that the issue must be disallowed. The question may arise at the trial, or perhaps it may not arise. The pursuer does not admit that there is no written evidence of the alteration of the terms of the lease which he alleges. If he recovers such evidence, the question will not arise at all. If he fails to recover it, then the defender's plea will arise, and if it be sound, and I indicate no opinion to the contrary, then the result will be that the pursuer will lose this issue. But I incline to think, having regard to the averments on record, that it is safest to allow the case to go to trial without any prejudgment of this point.

"The pursuer desired to delete the word 'dishonest' in the second proposed issue, and did not desire to innuendo the word 'dishonourable,' used in the first letter, as meaning 'dishonest.' He held that it was actionable without an innuendo to characterise a man's conduct as dishonourable.

"The case of Macrae v. Sutherland, 9th February 1889, 16 R. 476, is a judgment to the effect that it is actionable to represent that a man's character is dishonourable, and it appears to me to follow that it is equally actionable to accuse a man of dishonourable conduct. It is true that considerable doubt is thrown on this point by the opinion of Lord McLaren in Archer v. Ritchie, 19th March 1891, 18 R. 719; but I think I am bound to follow the judgment in the case of Macrae; and I confess that it appears to me that the epithet 'dishonourable' is almost, if not altogether, equivalent to 'dishonest,' and is in ordinary language equally expressive of moral turpitude."

¹ Law v. Gibsone, Feb. 3, 1835, 13 S. 396; cf. also Kirkpatrick v. Allanshaw Coal Co., Dec. 17, 1880, 8 R. 327.

scation in regard to the verbal agreement for abatement than there was here, and yet proof was not allowed. (2) It was not libellous to say in the course of a dispute that a particular act was dishonourable or scandalous where there was no misrepresentation of the facts.¹ Two persons disputing with one another had a right of fair comment on one another's conduct.² In certain cases an issue of dishonourable conduct had been allowed, but this was always where an innuendo to that effect had been put upon the language used to a third party regarding the pursuer.³ The present case was very different. "Dishonourable" was not synonymous with "dishonest."

No. 34.

Nov. 21, 1891.
Turnbull v. Oliver.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The averment that the terms of the written lease had been altered by a parole agreement were relevant to be admitted to probation, and the issue ought to be allowed.⁴ (2) The defender was charged with dishonourable conduct, and the allegation was, that not only was the charge made in a letter to the pursuer, but that the statements were thrown broadcast over the neighbourhood.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The first ground upon which this action is laid, and to which the first issue relates, is that the defender carried out a sequestration of the pursuer's effects wrongfully. The alleged wrong is that the proceedings in question were in direct breach of an agreement with the pursuer—that instead of the full half year's rent of £22, 10s. payable under a lease, the defender had agreed to accept £20. When one looks at the averment as to the agreement, it is plain upon the statement of it that it is a mere parole agreement, and the position of the pursuer, who asks the issue, is that, having alleged an agreement of this nature without any averment that it is in writing, he does not produce any writing in support of it nor ask a diligence for recovery of documents to instruct it. Accordingly, I think the Court is bound to deal with it upon the footing de non apparentibus et non existentibus eadem est ratio.

The question is, should an issue be allowed in these circumstances? I think the case of Law v. Gibsons is directly in point, for while the other cases cited by the Lord Ordinary, in which an averment of a verbal abatement of rent below that contained in the written lease was made, were not cases of actions of damages for wrongful sequestration, the case of Law was. Where, as here, the enforcing of a claim of abatement of rent payable under a lease depends upon an allegation of a bare verbal promise or agreement, I do not think that parole testimony is competent to cut down the written instrument. Accordingly, it appears to me that the proper course in dealing with the first branch of this case is to disallow the first issue.

The second ground of action is based upon two letters written by the defender to the pursuer himself, regarding a transaction which arose upon the termination of the lease. When one looks at the first of these letters, it is manifest that what the defender is there complaining of is, that the pursuer had not forthwith sent him a cheque in payment of the amount for which he was found liable by an arbiter's decision. The ground of action is founded upon the use of the word "dishonourable," but it is important to observe that there are prefixed to

¹ Archer v. Ritchie, March 19, 1891, 18 R. 719, Lord M'Laren, p. 727.

² Watson v. Duncan, Feb. 4, 1890, 17 R. 404.

³ Macrae v. Sutherland, Feb. 9, 1889, 16 R. 476; Blasquez v. Lothians Racing Club, June 29, 1889, 16 R. 893; Drew v. Mackenzie & Co., Feb. 28, 1862, 24 D. 649, 34 Scot. Jur. 320.

⁴ Wark v. Bargaddie Coal Co., March 15, 1859, 3 Macq. (H. L.) 467.

No. 34.
Nov. 21, 1891.
Turnbull v.
Oliver.

the words "very dishonourable" the words "which you must see." I think the terms of the letter itself enable one to judge with complete confidence of the meaning attached to that word by the writer. The word is used by the defender by way of remonstrance against the action of the pursuer, and an appeal is made to the pursuer's sense of honour. I presume that the pursuer would not have it supposed that his sense of honour was not punctilious and acute, and the question being whether the pursuer did not consider it inconsistent with his sense of honour not to send the cheque in question immediately, I do not think that the language used is sufficient to found an action of damages for slander. The word "dishonourable" when applied to an act of omission (and not as in the case of Macrae to a man's character) does not appear to me to necessarily convey any specific charge of turpitude. As Lord Adam has said, the sense of honour varies in different professions, and when an appeal is made to the sense of honour of an individual regarding an act or omission, it cannot be said to involve an attack upon his moral character. It is, of course, not to be supposed that any general rule is now laid down that the word "dishonourable" when applied to conduct may not be actionable, for this must depend on whether circumstances are or are not averred which will support an innuendo. In the present case I think the action is untenable, and that the second issue must also be disallowed.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with your Lordships in regard to both issues.

I desire to add only an observation regarding the proposed issue of slander, because the Lord Ordinary has made reference to some remarks which are to be found in my opinion in the case of Archer. I there said, with the concurrence of my colleagues, that I thought we ought not to allow the pursuer to take an issue putting the question whether he had been accused of dishonourable conduct. We thought that the word "dishonourable" as applied to character was too indefinite to be put in issue, and that it would need an innuendo to explain it. But I did not say, and do not now say, that the word "dishonourable" may not be used in such a way as to give rise to an action of damages for libel, e.g., where in a letter to a third party the writer characterises as dishonourable the general conduct or behaviour in matters of business of the pursuer with the view of injuring him in the estimation of his fellow men. But where two persons stand to one another in the relations of debtor and creditor,—the one disputing liability and the other seeking to enforce it,—the one party is well entitled to express to the other his opinion of the conduct of the other in the matter in controversy; and even if the language which he uses be intemperate, yet, if it does not amount to anything more than an expression of opinion on facts which are not in dispute, it will not found an action. Mere vituperative epithets are not enough to found an action of damages. Such I conceive to be the character of the letter in the present case, and in the circumstances I am of opinion that the issue must be disallowed.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, sustained the defender's first plea in law, and assoilzied him from the conclusion of the summons.

JOHN ELDER, S.S.C.—W. & J. BURNES, W.S.—Agents.

No. 35.

DAVID CAMPBELL, Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Murray—Craigie.
MAGISTRATES OF EDINBURGH, Respondents.—Comrie Thomson—Boyd.

Nov. 24, 1891.
Campbell v.
Magistrates of Edinburgh.

Police—Paving private street—Lands and heritages “abutting” on street—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. c. cxxxii.), sec. 130—Edinburgh Municipal and Police (Amendment) Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. c. cxxvi.) sec. 33.—The proprietor of an upper flat of a tenement and of a plot of garden ground fronting A Street on the west, and bounded by B Street on the north, objected to a notice under the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Acts, 1879 and 1891, calling on him to pave and causeway B Street, as owner “of lands and heritages fronting or abutting on the same.” The only access to the flat was from A Street, but the conveyance also included a pro indiviso right to the solum on which the tenement was built. Objection repelled.

Police—Notices to pave or causeway a street—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. c. cxxxii.)—Edinburgh Municipal and Police (Amendment) Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. c. cxxvi.).—Notices to pave or causeway a street under the provisions of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Acts held to be insufficient in respect that they did not sufficiently specify the nature of the work required to be done.

DAVID CAMPBELL, S.S.C., was proprietor of subjects at 23 Lady Menzies Place, Edinburgh, consisting of the northmost upper half-flat of the northmost tenement in the street, and of a plot of garden ground in front of the tenement, bounded on the west by Lady Menzies Place, and on the north by Rossie Place, a private street. His house was entered by an outside stair from Lady Menzies Place, common to him and to the proprietor of the southmost upper half-flat. There was no entry from Rossie Place. His title-deeds gave him a pro indiviso share of the ground or area on which the dwelling-house was built, along with the proprietor of the dwelling-house below him. He and the other three proprietors of the tenement were all equally interested in the maintenance of the north wall of the tenement. 1ST DIVISION.

On 21st October 1891, the following notice from the Magistrates of Edinburgh was served upon Campbell:—“Notice regarding foot-pavements of Rossie Place, 21st October 1891.—Edinburgh Roads Department.—Notice is hereby given to owners of lands and heritages fronting or abutting on the private street of Rossie Place, that the Magistrates and Council of the city of Edinburgh call upon them to free the foot-pavements or footpaths of said street from obstructions, and to properly level, make up, construct, pave, and complete the same to the reasonable satisfaction of the Magistrates and Council within one month from and after the 22d day of October 1891; and in case this notice is not complied with within the time specified, the Magistrates and Council shall themselves, on the expiry of said period, cause the said foot-pavements or footpaths of the said private street, or part thereof, to be freed from obstruction, and to be properly levelled, made up, constructed, paved, and completed in such way and manner and with such materials as the Magistrates and Council may think fit, and the costs and expenses which may be incurred by them in connection therewith shall be charged as a debt against such owner or owners in default; all in terms of section 130 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879,* and section 33 of the Edinburgh Muni-

* The Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, sec. 130, enacted,—“The owners of all houses and buildings or of gardens and grounds, whether houses or buildings are erected on the same or not, which are adjoining to or fronting any street or court, shall, where foot-pavements or footpaths shall be deemed requisite, cause the same, to the extent of their respective houses and buildings,

No. 35.

Nov. 24, 1891.

Campbell v.

Magistrates of Edinburgh.

cipal and Police (Amendment) Act, 1891.* Given under my hand at Edinburgh the 21st day of October 1891. WM. SKINNER, Town-Clerk."

A similar notice was served upon him in regard to the causewaying of the carriageway of Rossie Place.

Campbell appealed to the Court of Session under the 62d section of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police (Amendment) Act, 1891,† maintaining that he was not bound to free and construct the carriageway of Rossie Place, or to make up the foot-pavements as required by the notices, in respect, inter alia, "(1) that he is not the owner of lands and heritages fronting or abutting on Rossie Place, and that he is not the owner of houses and heritages adjoining or fronting said street, in the sense of the Acts under which said notices are issued; (3) that the said notices, dated 21st October 1891, are not sufficiently specific in their terms, and that the time allowed for the execution of the work mentioned in them is too short."

The Magistrates lodged answers in which they maintained, inter alia, that the appellant was the owner of lands and heritages fronting or abutting on Rossie Place, and that the notices were expressed in terms of the statutes, and sufficiently indicated the nature of the operations required to be executed on Rossie Place.

Argued for the appellant;—(1) He could not be said to be the owner of buildings abutting upon Rossie Place. His house was in Lady Menzies Place, and was entered from that street alone. Before a house could be to be well and sufficiently formed and paved or surfaced in such manner and way and of such width as the Magistrates and Council may direct."

* The Edinburgh Municipal and Police (Amendment) Act, 1891, sec. 33, enacted,—“Where in any private street or court, houses or permanent buildings have been erected on one-half or more of the ground fronting or abutting on the same, or where such ground has been otherwise than temporarily enclosed and laid out to at least the said extent, and where such street or court is not, together with the foot-pavements or footpaths thereof, made up, constructed, causewayed, paved and in a complete and efficient state of repair, to the reasonable satisfaction of the Magistrates and Council, the Magistrates and Council may, if they think fit, by notice, call upon the owners of the lands and heritages fronting or abutting on such street or court to free the same, and any foot-pavements or footpaths thereof, from obstructions, and to properly level, make up, construct, causeway, pave, channel, and complete the same to the reasonable satisfaction of the Magistrates and Council, within a time to be specified in such notice, and in case such notice is not complied with within the time so specified therein, the Magistrates and Council may themselves, at any time thereafter, cause any such street or court, or part thereof, and any foot-pavements or footpaths of the same, to be freed from obstruction, and to be properly levelled, made up, constructed, causewayed, paved, and channelled, and completed in such way and manner, and with such materials as the Magistrates and Council may think fit, and the costs and expenses which may be incurred by them in connection therewith shall be recoverable as a debt from the owner or owners in default.”

† The Edinburgh Municipal and Police (Amendment) Act, 1891, sec. 62 enacted,—“Any person aggrieved by any order, deliverance, notice, or requisition pronounced under section 33, &c. . . . may appeal, by way of summary application, to either Division of the Court of Session . . . which application shall be presented within fourteen days after the date of the intimation of any such order, deliverance, notice, or requisition, and any such appeal shall extend to any act to be done or suffered, or any costs, or the liability therefor to be incurred or received under any of such sections, and the Division of the said Court to which the application shall have been made . . . shall hear parties and determine the matter of the appeal, with or without expenses. . . .”

No. 35.

Nov. 24, 1891.
Campbell v.
Magistrates of Edinburgh.

said to abut upon a street, it must have physical access to that street.¹ It was no answer that the appellant had an interest in the maintenance of the gable wall, nor that he had a pro indiviso right to the ground on which the house was built, so long as he did not own any ground abutting on the level of the street. It would be an injustice to hold that he was bound to pave and causeway a street from which he could take no benefit. The terms of the notices did not include the garden ground, even if it could be said to abut upon the street. (2) The requirement of the 33d section of the Act of 1891 was that the street should be paved and causewayed "to the reasonable satisfaction" of the Magistrates. The Magistrates were bound to state more specifically than they did in the notices what they required the appellant to do. It would then be for him to consider whether he would do the work himself or allow the Magistrates to undertake it. If no such specification were given, it would be impossible for the appellant to take any benefit from the right of appeal given to him by the 62d section of the Act of 1891. The appeal was given on the question of the reasonableness of the Magistrates' demand, but he could not judge of this from the notices he had received, because these merely echoed the terms of the statute.

Argued for the respondents ;—(1) It was clear that the property abutted on Rossie Street. If the house did not, at anyrate the plot of garden ground did. (2) In so far as the notice fell under the 130th section of the Act of 1879, it was not appealable, as no right of appeal was conferred except under the 1891 Act. As regarded the want of specification, the respondents referred to the foot-note which was appended to such notices, shewing the willingness of the Magistrates to give any particulars which were required of them.*

Lord President.—The two questions on which our judgment is asked in this case are (1) whether the appellant is owner in the sense of the Act of lands and heritages abutting upon Rossie Place ; and (2) if so, whether the notices which have been issued by the Magistrates are sufficient intimation to the appellant of the requirements of the Magistrates.

As regards the first question, I cannot say that I entertain any doubt. The appellant is an owner of lands and heritages in the sense of the Act ; the plot or garden which belongs to the appellant and adjoins his house in every sense of the term "abuts" on Rossie Place ; and, further, as the appellant is a pro indiviso proprietor of the solum on which his house is built, he is an owner of lands and heritages abutting on the street in question, although his interest is a limited interest. Accordingly, I think that the Magistrates have stated a sufficient case upon this point upon record, and that the appellant's contention is untenable.

The second question, regarding the sufficiency of the notice, appears to me to be in a very different position. The Magistrates have acted upon the theory that all that they have to do is to serve notices, which amount to nothing more than a reminder to the proprietor of the terms of a section of the Act of Parliament. The notice tells him that the street must be properly levelled, made up, constructed, paved and completed, but as to the way or manner in which the proprietor is to set to work, the notice is absolutely silent. We have to con-

¹ Magistrates of Leith v. Gibb, Feb. 3, 1882, 9 R. 627.

* "NOTE.—Mr Proudfoot, city road surveyor, will give information to any owner who may apply to him at his office, City Chambers, as to what repairs are proper and necessary."

No. 35.

Nov. 24, 1891.
Campbell v.
Magistrates of Edinburgh.

sider, having regard to the alternative provisions contained in the Act for paving or causewaying the streets, whether that was an adequate requisition or notice. It is to be observed that the statute contemplates that the proprietor shall be apprised of what the Magistrates call upon him to do at his own hands, and that failing his doing this himself, the Magistrates may do it themselves. I take it that, according to the statutory provision, a proprietor is entitled first of all to know specifically what he is required to do, in order that he may consider whether he can conveniently undertake the work at his own hand, or whether he will allow the second alternative of the section to come into play, under which the Magistrates do it at his expense. There might be circumstances under which the proprietor would prefer to execute the work himself, and a great deal must necessarily depend upon the nature and quality of the work he was called upon to perform. Accordingly, I think the Magistrates are bound to give, not minute details of the work to be done, but an indication of it sufficiently specific to enable the proprietor to take advantage of the provisions of the statute, and to judge between the alternatives which are offered to him.

We have further to bear in mind the right of appeal which is given by the 62d section of the Act of 1891. It has been argued to us by Mr Thomson that a mere general notice from the Magistrates in the terms of that now before us is enough in the first instance, and that thereafter conferences may take place between the proprietor and the Magistrates in regard to the nature and character of the works which he is required to execute. But then, all this while, the time for appealing is running from the date of the general notice, while the proprietor has only acquired the means of judging whether he ought to appeal when he has seen the burgh surveyor or his plans. Now, I cannot sympathise with a view which would saddle a private citizen with the burden and trouble of such negotiations when there need be no occasion for them. I think the simple plan is for the Magistrates to make up their minds in the first instance, before they send out their notice, what it is reasonable to ask and to state what they require. I do not think that we are making an undue demand upon the Magistrates in laying down that their notice, which is the statutory communication of their requirements, and from the date of which the time for appealing runs, must contain further information, and must state specifically what the proprietor is called upon to do. This does not imply that the notice requires to enter into minute specification, for this is not necessary to apprise the proprietor of what he is interested to know, where the matter in hand is the construction of a carriageway or the making up of a footpath.

I am clearly of opinion that this notice is bad, and that the Court should sustain the appeal.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion on both points. In the first place, I think that the statute can only be construed to include all the properties into which a tenement is divided. It would be most inconvenient were a proprietor's duty to depend upon a matter of convenience, whether the proprietor of a flat had also a pro indiviso interest in the basement or not. The obligation imposed by the statute applies to all who have a substantial heritable interest in any stratum of a building situated in a street and not separated from it by any other intervening property. Secondly, it is necessary if any appeal can be brought, that the notice must specify generally the kind of pavement which the Magistrates desire. There may be individual circumstances which make it very important for the ratepayer to decide which course to pursue. No. 35.

 Very often a builder or contractor in house property would prefer to do the Nov. 24, 1891.
 work himself, and he must know how the Magistrates wish it to be done. It Campbell v.
 would be most inconvenient if all the proprietors in a long street were to come Magistrates of and wrangle with the City Surveyor as to the way in which the street should Edinburgh.
 be paved. They would be far more likely to agree to a proposition sent them in the notice by the Magistrates. I am of opinion therefore that the notice is insufficient, because it does not specify the kind of pavement which the Magistrates require.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree upon both points, and have nothing to add.

LORD ADAM was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal:
 Find that the notices, dated 21st October 1891, are not sufficiently specific in their terms, and that the appellant is not bound to carry into effect the work under said notices, and decern: Find the appellant entitled to expenses," &c.

ROBERT STEWART, S.S.C.—WM. WHITE-MILLAR, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN RENWICK, Complainer (Respondent).—R. V. Campbell.
 STAMFORD, SPALDING, AND BOSTON BANKING COMPANY, LIMITED, Respondents (Reclaimers).—Lees—R. L. Orr.

No. 36.

Bill—Suspension of charge—Caution.—Circumstances in which (rev. judgment of Lord Low, Ordinary) the Court refused to allow suspension of a charge upon a bill without caution.

Nov. 24, 1891.
 Renwick v.
 Stamford,
 Spalding,
 and Boston
 Banking Co.,
 Limited.

On 5th October 1891, John Renwick, builder, Glasgow, was charged at the instance of the Stamford, Spalding, and Boston Banking Company, Limited, to make payment, as acceptor, of a bill for £248, 18s. drawn by Robert Bertram & Company, of which the Banking Company were the holders. The bill, which was dated 2d April 1891, became due on 5th
 July 1891.

Bill-Chamber.
 1st Division.
 Lord Low.

Renwick brought a suspension of the charge in which he averred that, requiring some accommodation in his business, he had been "induced by a person named Charles Engelhard, of whom he had accidentally heard, to entrust him with the four acceptances after mentioned. In order that the said Charles Engelhard might get these acceptances discounted and remit to the complainer the proceeds, the said Charles Engelhard wrote to the complainer with the proposal on 2d April last, conform to letter produced. The inducements held out by the said Charles Engelhard were false and fraudulent. They were part of a scheme and of a system of fraud concocted and carried on by him and others, whereby the complainer's acceptances were to be obtained on the assurance and agreement that they would be discounted at certain fixed charges, and the proceeds remitted in due course, and that they would not be issued or parted with at all unless upon such discount and remittance, the real intent being not to discount nor to remit as aforesaid, but to use the acceptances as a means of extorting money from the complainer without any value received by him." (Stat. 2) "Under the influence of this fraud, the complainer on 7th April last sent to the said Charles Engelhard four three months' acceptances, drawn up by Engelhard blank on the drawer's name, viz.:—
 . . . " one of these being the bill now in question. (Stat. 3) "Engel-

No. 36. hard never sent to the complainer any remittance, nor any money or other valuable consideration whatever for these acceptances."

Nov. 24, 1891.
Renwick v.
Stamford,
Spalding,
and Boston
Banking Co.,
Limited.

The complainer further averred that after repeated letters to Engelhard, who had in the meantime got the bills drawn by Messrs Robert Bertram, he, on 2d May 1891, obtained an interim injunction from the English Courts against Engelhard and Bertram & Company, parting with or negotiating the bills. This injunction was afterwards repeated.*

The complainer further averred;—(Stat. 5) "On 7th May last Engelhard still had all the four bills in his possession, and they had not, by that date, been passed to any third party, although they were by that time said to have been signed by the nominal drawers. Engelhard on the said date, in pursuance of his said fraudulent scheme for extorting money, then offered to give up all the four bills to the complainer on payment of £25. The complainer's solicitors replied, on 8th May last, refusing to make any payment, and intimating the further proceedings in the injunction. Despite these proceedings, Engelhard still attempted to pass the bills to third parties, in pursuance of his fraudulent scheme, Ultimately the complainer got back three of the said bills, and the fourth, being fraudulently retained, is now the subject of the present charge. It was indorsed and was received by the indorsees after notice of the pending Chancery proceedings, and with intent to evade the said injunctions and orders of Court." (Stat. 6) "On 7th July last the bill now in question, and which was then overdue, the last day of grace thereon being 5th July last, was in the hands of a firm call Boehmer & Hertz, of London. They professed to be indorsees of another firm, called Feldman & Woolf, of London, who were pretended indorsees of the alleged drawers, Robert Bertram & Company, also of London. None of the said parties were known to the complainer. They are friends and associates of Engelhard. The complainer was by letter, on 7th July last, herewith produced, called on to pay the £248, 18s. now in question, to Boehmer & Hertz, as the last pretended indorsees, and his solicitor's reply is produced and is referred to."† (Stat. 7) "The chargers and respondents now assert themselves to be holders of the said bill. If they are holders in their own right, they

* The complainer produced copies of the injunctions by the High Court of Justice, Chancery Division, viz.:—(1) Interim orders, dated 2d and 8th May 1891, restraining Engelhard and Robert Bertram & Company from parting with or negotiating the said bills, and (2) an order dated 25th May ordaining the same persons to deposit the bills in Court.

† Ralph Raphael to "George Renwick," dated London, 7th July 1891.—"Sir,—I am instructed by Messrs Boehmer & Hertz to apply to you for payment of the sum of £248, 18s., the amount of a dishonoured bill of exchange dated the 2d April 1891, payable three months after date, drawn by Messrs Robert Bertram & Company upon and accepted by yourself, and indorsed by Messrs Feldman & Woolf to my clients Messrs Boehmer & Hertz, and I have to inform you that unless the same, together with 6s. 8d., my costs, are paid to me by return of post, I shall have no alternative but to take proceedings without further notice." The letter in reply, dated 8th July, by Messrs Taylor & Foulis, writers, Glasgow, the complainer's agents, was similar to that subsequently sent to the bank on the following day, quoted infra.

The bill was in the following terms:—"£248, 18s. 0d. London, April 2 1891. Three months after date pay to our order the sum of two hundred and forty-eight pounds and eighteen shillings value received.

"ROBT. BERTRAM & COMPANY.

"To Mr John Renwick, 16 Kew Gardens, Kelvinside, Glasgow.

"Accepted, payable at the Clydesdale Bank, London.

JOHN RENWICK.

"Endorsed Robt. Bertram & Company, Feldman & Woolf, O. F. Feldman, Boehmer & Hertz, Anglo-Saxon Condensed Milk Company, & E. Boehmer."

acquired the said bill without value after it was overdue, and with notice that it had been obtained, issued, and negotiated by fraud. They are believed not to be holders in their own right, but to be merely giving their name as collecting agents to and for Boehmer & Hertz. The complainer, on the chargers' first demand, in July last, for payment, denied liability, and indicated the fraud which had been perpetrated on him. No more was heard of the matter for three months, until the respondents, on 5th October last, gave the complainer the charge now sought to be suspended."

No. 36.

Nov. 24, 1891.

Renwick v.

Stamford,

Spalding,

* and Boston

Banking Co.,

Limited.

The respondents answered that the bill was endorsed by Boehmer & Hertz, and delivered to them by a partner of that firm in the ordinary course of business, on 25th May 1891, during its currency, and that they paid full value for it. They stated that they had no notice or knowledge of the Chancery injunctions or of any defect in the title of the prior holders.

The complainer pleaded, inter alia;—(5) At common law and under the 30th section of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the bill having been effected by fraud, and having been the subject of legal proceedings before the chargers acquired the same, the burden of proving value given in good faith is upon the chargers, and the note should be passed without caution or consignment.

The Lord Ordinary (Low), on 31st October 1891, passed the note without caution.

The respondents reclaimed, and argued that the note ought not to be passed without caution.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—On this record the complainer certainly makes strong and up to a certain point plausible averments as to the circumstances under which Engelhard came into possession of the bill in question, and his subsequent use of it. If the present question had arisen between the complainer and him, very different considerations would have come into play.

But we must concentrate our attention upon the position of the holders of the bill, who are the present reclaimers. The question is, whether the complainer is

* Taylor & Foulis, writers, Glasgow, to the Stamford, Spalding, and Boston Banking Company, Limited, dated 9th July 1891:—"Dear Sirs,—Mr John Renwick here has handed us your memorandum of yesterday, and we have to explain that the bill referred to is the subject of legal proceedings. No value was given for it, and no action either in law or equity can be taken upon it against our client. The holders of the bill had better be careful of the use they put it to, as any attempt to enforce payment will involve serious responsibility. We refer you to Messrs Morten, Cutler, & Company, 99 Newgate Street, London, E.C., our correspondents, who have charge of this business." The Banking Company to Messrs Morten, Cutler, & Company, dated Northampton, 10th July 1891:—"Dear Sirs,—The bill we hold accepted by John Renwick is for £248, 18s., dated 2d April 1891, at three months' date, due 5th July 1891. It is drawn by Robert Bertram & Company, and bears the following endorsements:—Robert Bertram & Company, Feldman & Woolf, Boehmer & Hertz, and Anglo-Saxon Condensed Milk Company, to whose credit it was placed on 25th May 1891. The bill was received by us from our clients in the ordinary course of business, and as we have given value for it, we shall expect it to be paid, and if we are unable to obtain payment we shall be compelled to place the matter in our solicitor's hand."

¹ Reclaimers' Authorities.—Simpson v. Brown, June 9, 1888, 15 R. 716; Mackay's Practice, ii. 192; Simpson v. Taylor, Nov. 4, 1874, 2 R. 75. Respondents' Authority.—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 61), secs. 29 and 30.

No. 36.

Nov. 24, 1891.
Renwick v.
Stamford,
Spalding,
and Boston
Banking Co.,
Limited.

to be allowed to go into a litigation with the reclaimers, a bank who came into possession of the bill in the ordinary course of business, without first finding caution. We are not entitled to assume anything against the bank beyond the admitted statements on record, or such other statements as can be instantly verified. There is nothing, I think, upon record to derogate from the position of the bank to be considered holders of this bill in due course. The 30th section of the Bills of Exchange Act does not in terms apply, because in the present case it is neither "admitted nor proved that the acceptance, issue, or subsequent negotiation of the bill is affected with fraud." The bank makes no admission which at all touches that question, and I do not think that the section can be cited as in terms applicable to the present question, or as furnishing more than instructive suggestion upon the question of discretion which we have to decide at a stage antecedent to proof.

Upon the whole, I think we should be founding a dangerous precedent if we were to allow the complainer to proceed further in this litigation unless he first finds caution.

LORD M'LAREN.—It appears to me that there is one, and only one, circumstance which induces hesitation as to altering the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and that is that the banking company have not clearly explained why they have commenced proceedings against the parties whose names are on the bill by an action against the acceptor, after he had explained to them the circumstances in which he came to put his name to the bill. One would like to hear that the Banking Company had endeavoured first to recover payment from those who are directly liable to them on the bill. But in considering the question of security, which depends entirely on presumption, or on the prima facie case made by the parties, we expect always the utmost candour from a complainer who asks to have diligence suspended without finding caution, and especially that he should confine himself to the real point of his case, and not make averments difficult of proof and improbable on the face of them. If the complainer in this case had come here averring merely that the bank was using diligence against him oppressively and asking that they should not be allowed to proceed, I should have been more inclined to accept the Lord Ordinary's view. But here the complainer in his averments seeks to identify the Banking Company with the fraud which he says was committed by other parties to the bill, making statements which are apparently not founded on information, and of which there is no corroboration. I think accordingly that we must follow the ordinary rule, and that the complainer can only be allowed to proceed on finding caution.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD ADAM was absent.

THE COURT accordingly recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and remitted to his Lordship to pass the note on caution or confirmation.

KEITH R. MAITLAND, W.S.—WINCHESTER & NICOLSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

CHARLES YULE, Complainer (Reclaimer).—Comrie Thomson—Salvesen.
 GEORGE RUSSELL ALEXANDER AND HIS CURATOR BONIS, Defenders (Respondents).—M'Kechnie—Dean-Leslie.

No. 37.

Nov. 25, 1891.
 Yule v. Alexander.

Judicial Factor—Curator bonis—Title to charge upon a warrant in a heritable bond.—The debtor in a heritable bond was taken bound to repay the loan to the lender, his executors and assignees whomsoever. The lender was an insane person to whom a curator bonis had been appointed by the Court. In a charge, proceeding upon the warrant in the bond, and bearing to be at the instance of the ward, the debtor was charged to make payment to the curator bonis.

In a suspension the debtor pleaded that the charge was wrongous as bearing to proceed at the instance of an incapax. The Court repelled the plea, holding that the curator was entitled to use the ward's name.

On 26th April 1888 Charles Yule borrowed, over certain heritable sub-^{1st Division.}
 jects belonging to him at Fauldhouse, Linlithgow, the sum of £500 from ^{Ld. Wellwood.}
 Mr Clayton Alexander, then curator bonis of Mr George Russell Alexander, his father. The obligation in the bond was to repay the sum borrowed "to the said George Russell Alexander (the ward), his executors and assignees whomsoever." The clause in the extract authorising execution was,— "And the said Lords grant warrant for all lawful execution hereon."

Mr M'Meeken was appointed by the Court of Session curator bonis to Mr Alexander, on Mr Clayton Alexander resigning office, in January 1890. The debtor having failed to pay the interest on the bond, he was charged, on 10th October 1890, on a warrant proceeding upon an extract of the registered bond, "at the instance of George Russell Alexander," to make payment of £400, the principal sum then due, with interest, "to James M'Meeken, accountant, Glasgow, curator bonis to the said George Russell Alexander."

Yule brought a suspension of the charge on various grounds, alleging, inter alia, that "the said George Russell Alexander never authorised such proceedings. In fact, he is not in a condition to give instructions regarding his affairs, or to receive payment of said sum, or give a discharge therefor."

He pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The charge under suspension, bearing to proceed at the instance of and for payment to a person who is not capable of giving instructions or authority thereanent, is wrongous, and should be suspended, as craved.

The ward and his curator pleaded, inter alia;—The statements of the complainer are irrelevant.

The Lord Ordinary (Wellwood), on 15th January 1891, repelled the complainer's second plea,* and allowed proof upon other parts of the case.

* "OPINION.—The complainer's counsel addressed to me a subtle argument in support of the complainer's second plea in law, which is founded on the allegation that the charge sought to be suspended proceeds at the instance of the ward, George Russell Alexander, and not of the respondent, his curator bonis.
 I am not prepared to sustain that plea. The obligation in the bond, which was granted when the ward was under curatory, is to repay the sum borrowed 'to the said George Russell Alexander (the ward), his executors and assignees whomsoever.' Thus the creditor in the bond is the ward. The granter of the bond consents to registration for preservation and execution, and the registered deed is therefore equivalent to a decree in favour of the ward. The warrant authorising execution, which is inserted in terms of 40 and 41 Vict. c. 40, simply runs,— 'And the said Lords grant warrant for all lawful execution hereon.' Now, it is true that the charge bears to be given by virtue of the bond and warrant thereon, 'at the instance of George Russell Alexander'; but then it charges the debtor to make payment to the respondent, curator bonis to the said George Russell Alexander. Now, it may be that it would have been more

No. 37.

Nov. 25, 1891.
Yule v. Alexander.

After judgment upon the concluded proof the complainer reclaimed, and argued;—The charge here ought to have proceeded at the instance of the curator bonis, who alone had a title to give it.¹ On the face of the charge itself, the ward was entirely divested of his estate, and he could not therefore be in titulo to give a charge, even with the concurrence of his curator bonis.²

The respondent argued;—It had been held that special powers to discharge a bond were not required by a curator bonis.³ A curator bonis was in the position of a commissioner or factor, and was entitled to instruct that diligence be used in the name of his ward.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This question is of a technical quality, but is sufficiently important. It proceeds upon the terms of the charge, which is the subject of the present suspension. The charge bears to be at the instance of the ward, but the debtor is called upon to make payment to Mr M'Meeken, the charger's curator bonis. It is admitted that it would have been competent for the curator to have stated his own instance, and with that difference to have proceeded with the charge as at present, and it is contended that the use of the ward's name vitiates the charge.

The position of a curator bonis is not that he has transferred to him the estate of the ward, nor is the ward divested of that estate. The more accurate statement is that made by Mr Bell (Bell's Prin. sec. 2121), viz., that the ward's management of his estate is superseded in favour of the curator. Accordingly, it would undoubtedly be incompetent for a person who had a curator bonis to charge for payment to himself, as that would be an act of management. On the other hand, because the ward is not divested, it follows that he is the creditor, and the title is in him. Accordingly, the curator has a right to make use of the title in the ward and of his name in managing his affairs, and, among other things, in charging for his debts. In theory, therefore, and principle the objection now made does not appear to me to be a valid objection to the charge, which shews on its face that, demanding payment in the name of the ward, the curator requires it to be made to himself. The point is a somewhat fine one, but I think the charge is good.

LORD ADAM.—I agree with your Lordship that this point turns on the question whether or not the ward is divested of his estate by the appointment of the curator bonis. In this case the ward's estate has not been sequestrated. If that had been done I do not know, and it is not necessary to consider, what effect it would have had on the present question, but the estate is still vested in the ward. It appears to me that the curator is appointed to supersede the ward in the management of his estate, as it is put in the passage quoted by your Lordship from Mr Bell, and the charge here seems to correct to have stated at the outset of the charge that it was given at the instance of the curator bonis, but I think it sufficiently appears from the charge that it was given with the concurrence of the curator bonis, who was to receive the money and discharge the debtor. The debt is a debt due to the ward, and the decree is a decree in favour of the ward, and the position of the curator bonis in recovering the debt is simply that of commissioner or factor enforcing his ward's rights. I therefore think that this very technical objection, although specious, is not well founded, and should be repelled."

¹ Scott, Feb. 21, 1856, 18 D. 624, 28 Scot. Jur. 274.

² Hislop v. M'Ritchie's Trustees, June 23, 1881, 8 R. (H. L.) 95.

³ Wills, June 20, 1879, 6 R. 1096.

me to proceed on the authority of the curator, though in form at the instance of the ward. That I think is quite clear on the face of the charge from the fact that it demands that payment shall be made to the curator, and I think it is sufficient for the disposal of the case.

No. 37.

Nov. 25, 1891.
Yule v. Alexander.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with your Lordship that the authority and right of a curator bonis is correctly defined by Mr Bell, when he says that a curator is appointed to supersede the ward in the management of his affairs. The appointment of a curator does not imply that the ward is divested of his estate, or deprived of his civil rights, except in so far as is inconsistent with the institorial power given to the curator. When therefore an act, such as giving a charge, is done by the ward with the consent of the curator, it does not appear to me that the recognition of a right in the ward to act with the consent of the curator is in any way inconsistent with the view that the curator is the sole administrator of the ward's estate. It must be kept in view that these appointments are made on prima facie evidence (usually medical certificates) pointing to permanent or temporary incapacity on the part of the ward. The proceedings are not of a contentious nature, because everything that is done is supposed to be for the benefit of the ward, and he is not to be put under disability except in so far as necessary for the protection of his estate. When it is desired to have a person declared incapable of doing any legal act, e.g., making a testament, a different form of proceeding is necessary. Therefore, while I do not doubt that in most cases the more convenient course is for a curator bonis to act in his own name, I am not prepared to say that an act done by the ward with his consent is incompetent or invalid.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. The point is highly technical; but in the execution of diligence technical rules must be strictly observed, and if this objection were well founded we should be bound to give effect to it however unsubstantial the point may be. But I agree with your Lordship, for the reasons that have been stated, that it is not well founded, because, although the ward is superseded in the management of his estate, the estate is not transferred to the curator, and the ward still remains vested in the rights of creditor in the bond. But since he is superseded in the management of his estate a charge in his own name for payment to himself would be bad, not upon any technical but on this very substantial ground, that the purpose and effect of the appointment of a curator is to disable the ward from determining for himself questions of management such as whether a bond should be called up or not. That became a question for the curator, irrespective of the ward's wishes, who was bound to act upon his own responsibility, and could derive no additional authority from the consent or concurrence of his ward. The ward, therefore, cannot charge for payment, because he has no power to grant a valid discharge. But I think that this charge discloses that it is not a charge at the instance of the ward at all, but at the instance of the curator using the ward's name, that the charge is at the ward's instance in form only, and that the curator is shewn to be the real charger by his demanding payment to be made to himself.

THE COURT adhered.

THOMAS M'NAUGHT, S.S.C.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 38.

Nov. 25, 1891.
Dalglish's
Trustees v.
Crum.

ROBERT LOCKHART DALGLISH AND OTHERS (Dalglish's Trustees),
First Parties.—Kirkpatrick.

MISS AGNES MARGARET CRUM AND CURATOR, Second Parties.—
D.-F. Balfour—Dundas.

ROBERT DUNDAS AND OTHERS (Dalglish's Residuary Legatees), Third Parties.—Lord-Adv. Pearson—Dickson.

Succession—Revocation—Codicil—Re-execution of settlement.—A lady left (1) a trust-disposition and settlement, partly signed by her and also executed notarially of date 8th March; (2) a codicil executed notarially on 14th March; and (3) a trust-disposition and settlement executed on 9th April in the ordinary way, all in the year 1890. (1) and (3) were both universal settlements, and were practically identical. There was no express revocation of prior settlements in (3). The codicil bequeathed a legacy to a person to whom a legacy was bequeathed in the first trust-disposition, and again in identical terms in the second trust-disposition, the codicil bearing that its provision was "in addition to the provisions in my trust-disposition and settlement in favour of the" legatee.

In a special case brought to determine whether the codicil was or was not recalled by the second trust-disposition, it was stated that the first trust-disposition of the 8th of March was executed notarially, because from bodily weakness the testator had not been able to complete the execution of it in her own hand; that her man of business had explained to her that, if she recovered strength, "it might be better to have the deed re-executed and signed by herself"; that accordingly, she having recovered, it was so "re-extended and re-executed," this deed being the trust-disposition of 9th April; and that the notary who prepared and executed the codicil was not the same person who prepared the two trust-dispositions and took charge of their execution.

Held that the codicil was not recalled, the trust-disposition of 9th April being merely a re-attestation of the will of 8th March.

2D DIVISION.

MISS JANE DALGLISH, of Dunrowan, died on 27th April 1890, at the age of eighty-three. She left personal estate amounting to about £13,000.

A special case was presented to the Court to determine a question arising under her testamentary arrangements, the parties to it being (first) her testamentary trustees; (second) a niece to whom a legacy had been left; and (third) her residuary legatees.

The following statement was made by the parties as to the testamentary writings of Miss Dalglish, viz.:—"In March 1890, Mr John Roberts, S.S.C., Miss Dalglish's law-agent, prepared a trust-disposition and settlement for execution by her, in terms of instructions which Miss Dalglish had previously given to him. On the 8th of March, Mr Roberts waited on her to have the trust-disposition and settlement signed, and by her instructions appended thereto a writing leaving legacies to two servants in the shape of a codicil. The deed was then read over to Miss Dalglish, she approved thereof, and desired to sign the same. From bodily weakness, however, she was unable to subscribe the same satisfactorily, and after several ineffectual attempts, the deed was again read over to her in presence of two witnesses, and was, at her request, subscribed by Mr Roberts notarially on her behalf. Mr Roberts explained to Miss Dalglish that it might be better, if she got stronger, to have the deed re-executed and signed by herself with her own signature, and arranged that, in the event of her recovery, she would send for him for that purpose. Accordingly the deed was re-extended and re-executed, with the differences that the deed as re-extended contained in its body the legacies to servants contained in the writing appended to the deed as executed on the 8th March 1890, and that it was executed by the testatrix herself in common form. In all other respects the two deeds were in identical terms. On 9th April 1890, Mr Roberts was telegraphed for, and went to Helensburgh, and the re-extended deed was read over and subscribed by Miss Dalglish." No. 38.

It appeared from an examination of the deed of 8th March, which was produced in Court, that it had been signed by the testator herself on several of its pages, but in an illegible fashion, and from this circumstance Mr Roberts' doubts as to its validity, and his recommendation to have it re-executed, proceeded. Nov. 25, 1891.
Dalglish's
Trustees v.
Crum.

The following clause occurred in each of the said deeds of 8th March and 9th April. ". . . (Fourth) . . . To Agnes Margaret Crum the sum of £600 sterling."

The case proceeded to state,—“After 8th March 1890, Miss Dalglish expressed a strong desire to make an additional provision for Agnes Margaret Crum, and to regulate the distribution of her trinkets and jewellery. Accordingly, on 9th March 1890, being a Sunday, when Mr Roberts could not be sent for, Miss Dalglish had a codicil prepared and signed notarially for her by Mr Miller, writer in Glasgow, and notary-public, who resided in Helensburgh.” Helensburgh was not far from Miss Dalglish's house. It is not necessary to refer further to this codicil.

Finally it was stated,—“On the 14th March 1890, Miss Dalglish again sent for Mr Miller, and had a second codicil prepared and signed for her in like manner by him. Miss Dalglish thereby, ‘in addition to the provisions in my trust-disposition and settlement in favour of the said Agnes Margaret Crum,’ made a provision of £500 in her favour.”

The question put to the Court was,—“Is Agnes Margaret Crum entitled to the legacy or provision of £500 bequeathed to her by the codicil executed on 14th March 1890, in addition to the legacy of £600 bequeathed to her under the said trust-dispositions and settlements?”

Argued for the second parties;—The Court was entitled, besides knowing the terms of the deeds, to know in what circumstances they were executed.¹ Hence the Court might look at the statement in the special case to help it in determining the question raised as to the meaning of the deeds. Now, revocation was not to be implied; all the writings must be read together, so far as that was possible.² Again, there was authority in England, if not in Scotland, which would justify the Court in upholding both codicil and settlement. It had been held that where a testator had merely “republished” his settlement, codicils appended to the earlier will, so “republished,” would stand.³ It was true that in all these cases the two wills were on the same paper, but that was merely evidence that one was a re-execution of the other, which was here admitted in the case. The question for the Court must be,—what was the intuitus of the second deed? Was it revocation? Surely not. If the second deed was the real deed, there was no revocation of the first, it simply became inoperative in so far as the second repeated it, but its annexum, the codicil, would stand. On the other hand, if the re-execution did not affect the first deed, there was no more possibility of debate about the matter. An argument was also submitted on the question of the revocation of a special bequest by a subsequent general settlement.⁴

¹ Forlong v. Taylor's Executors, 1838, 3 Sh. and Macl., Lord Chancellor, at p. 210.

² Grant v. Stoddart, Feb. 27, 1849, 11 D. 860, 21 Scot. Jur. 241, see Lord Moncreiff's opinion, rev. H. of L., June 28, 1852, 1 Macq. 163, 24 Scot. Jur. 555; Sibbald's Trustees v. Greig, Jan. 13, 1871, 9 Macph. 399, 43 Scot. Jur. 150.

³ Wade v. Nazer, 1847, 1 Robertson's Eccl. Reps. 627; Green v. Tribe, 1878, 9 Ch. Div. 231; In bonis Rawlins, 1879, 48 L. J., P. and D. 64, per Lord Hannen.

⁴ Cases referred to.—Campbell, 1743, 1 Pat. App. 343; Walker's Executor v.

No. 38. Argued for the third parties;—It could not be said, whatever words were used in the case as stated, that the second deed was a mere re-execution of the first, for it incorporated what had been a codicil to the first, viz., the provisions in favour of servants. This was therefore Sibbald's case,¹ and the Court must determine which of the deeds should stand. The first deed was necessarily recalled by the second, for both were general settlements, and the codicils were intended to be swept away, for one of them, viz., that in favour of the servants, which it was desired to keep in force, was repeated in the second settlement. The facts here did not let in the principle of the English cases, which were all cases in which the re-execution was on the same paper, and obviously was a re-execution. That could not be said here.

Nov. 25, 1891.
Dalglish's
Trustees v.
Crum.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question in this case arises in connection with the testamentary arrangements of the late Miss Jane Dalglish. On the 8th March 1890 Miss Dalglish endeavoured to execute a settlement, which had been prepared for her by her agent, with her own hand, but from bodily weakness she was unable to complete the signing of the deed, and the signatures were, as we see from looking at them, so unsatisfactory that her agent, Mr Roberts, thought it would not be satisfactory to leave the deed in that state, and accordingly he executed the deed notariaily.

The only peculiarity of this deed is this,—It appears that when Mr Roberts arrived with the deed prepared for signature, Miss Dalglish desired that something should be added to its provisions. What she desired was added in a codicil and executed in the same way as the main settlement. Mr Roberts also expressed the view that it would be desirable, if strength returned, that Miss Dalglish should re-execute the deed in the ordinary way. Miss Dalglish did recover strength sufficiently to execute the deed, and on 9th April she signed a settlement identical with that of 8th March, with this difference only, that there was inserted in the body of it what had been contained in the codicil of 8th March.

Between 8th March and 9th April Miss Dalglish desired to make some other alterations on her settlement. Mr Roberts not being able to come, she sent for Mr Miller, a writer who lived near her, and executed another codicil. This occurred on 9th March, and another codicil was executed on 14th March.

On 9th April, as I have said, Miss Dalglish was sufficiently recovered to execute the deed herself. Mr Roberts was telegraphed for, he came, and Miss Dalglish signed the deed. Mr Roberts knew nothing of the two codicils which had been executed in the meantime, and therefore, of course, took no notice of them in the settlement.

The question now is whether the will, which is dated 9th April, is to be held to cancel the codicil of 14th March.

It is necessary to the disposal of that question that we should consider carefully what was done. This special case puts it as a re-extending and re-execution of the deed of 8th March. That seems to make it practically the deed of 8th March, although of course it could only be the date when it actually was signed.

Being a mere re-execution or re-attestation, we are, I think, in a position to hold that it did not cancel the codicils. The expression of the will of Miss Dalglish on the 8th March was repeated on the 9th April, and as a mere repetition it had no effect as a cancellation of the codicils. They are not affected by it.

Walker, June 19, 1878, 5 R. 965; Kenmore's Trustees, May 18, 1869, 7 Macph. 771, 41 Scot. Jur. 399; Thomson v. Lyell, Nov. 18, 1836, 15 S. 32.

¹ See supra, note 2.

No. 38.
Nov. 25, 1891.
Dalglish's
Trustees v.
Crum.

This question would be a very difficult one but for the authorities that have been cited to us. I was much impressed with the case of Wade. The testator in that case drew up a will with his own hand and signed it, and then added codicils. Subsequently he was advised that it was of importance that there should be certain words of style in the will. Accordingly he re-executed the will, at a date of course subsequent to the codicils. It was held that a mere re-execution or re-attestation of the will had not the effect of wiping out codicils subsequent to the original will. It is consistent with the meaning and intention of the testator that his testamentary arrangements should remain as these are expressed in the original will and the codicils.

I am therefore of opinion that the question must be answered in the affirmative.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and I do not know that I can usefully add anything. What appeared to myself, and I think to all of us, to be the real difficulty in the case was whether we could, and how we should, reach a judicial conclusion as to the state of facts here; for none of us doubted that, if we were judicially satisfied that the deed of 9th April is simply a re-attestation of the deed of 8th March, it would not have any effect in recalling the intermediate codicil. Our difficulty lay in reaching the fact that the deed of 9th April was only a re-attestation or re-execution of the deed of 8th March.

Having overcome that difficulty—which I think we can quite safely and satisfactorily do on the language of the case stated—I have no hesitation in acting on the principle of the case of Wade. That principle was very distinctly expressed by Lord Hannen, in a subsequent case, when he was President of the Probate Court. The principle is that a mere re-attestation of a deed, though that re-attestation be subsequent to a codicil, will have no effect in recalling that codicil. Indeed it is an inaccurate use of language to speak of a re-attested will as a new will. The will remains the same, though evidenced by writing on a new piece of paper. The will of 9th April is the very will of 8th March. That being so, we should act unjustly if we imputed to the testator any intention of recalling the codicil. If she had no such intention, we should do manifest injustice if we held that it was recalled.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT answered the question in the affirmative.

IRONS, ROBERTS, & CO., For First and Third Parties—BELL & BANNERMAN, W.S., For Second Parties—Agents.

No. 39.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, Pursuer (Respondent).—Lord-Adv. Pearson—H. Johnston—Dickson.

Nov. 25, 1891.
Lord Advocate v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

THE TRUSTEES OF THE CLYDE NAVIGATION, Defendants (Reclaimers).—D.-F. Balfour—Asher—Ure.

Crown—Property—Trust for public—Sea below low-water mark—Sea water intra fauces terræ—Three mile limit—Territorial waters.—The Crown has a right in the water and the solum of sea lochs intra fauces terræ below low-water mark such as will entitle it to prevent any person from using them for purposes other than the recognised public uses, and that without any allegation of injury, actual or prospective, to these public uses.

The rule applied to prevent the Clyde Navigation Trustees from depositing dredgings from the Clyde in Loch Long.

Opinions that the right of the Crown to the solum of sea lochs intra fauces terre is a proprietary right, and not a mere trust for public uses.

Opinions (per Lord Young and Lord Kyllachy) that the Crown has also a proprietary right in the solum of the sea from low-water mark as far as the three mile limit, upon the open coast.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

THE TRUSTEES OF THE CLYDE NAVIGATION, in pursuance of their statutory duties and powers, were in use to dredge large quantities of material from the bed of the Clyde to make and maintain the navigable channel of that river. The material so dredged consisted of earth, gravel, stones, mud, and sewage. For some years this was deposited on the banks of the river near where it was taken out, but for convenience and economy's sake, the dredgings having come to amount to several hundred thousand tons per annum, the trustees fell upon the plan of carrying the dredgings to Loch Long, a sea loch running twenty-four miles up from the Firth of Clyde, and nowhere more than two miles broad, and depositing them at a place where the water was about thirty-five fathoms deep.

This had gone on for many years, when in 1891, the Lord-Advocate, for the Crown, raised an action against the trustees for declarator "that the defenders are not entitled to deposit or place earth, gravel, stones, mud, soil, or other material, dug, cut, dredged, or otherwise removed from the banks or bed of the River Clyde, as defined by the said Clyde Navigation Consolidation Act, 1858, in any part of the narrow seas of our kingdom of Scotland, and in particular in Loch Long, being part thereof, and extending from Arrochar on the north to a straight line drawn from Strone Point, in the county of Argyll, on the west, to Baron's Point, in the county of Dumbarton, on the east." A conclusion for interdict, to correspond with this declarator, followed.

In his condescendence the Lord Advocate merely set out the constitution of the Clyde Trust, and the fact that they were disposing of their dredgings as stated. He averred as to his own title,—“The narrow seas of that part of Her Majesty's dominions known as the kingdom of Scotland, and the solum or bed thereof below low-water mark, belong to Her Majesty jure coronæ, subject to the public rights of navigation and fishing. The salt water loch or arm of the Firth of Clyde known as Loch Long is part of the said narrow seas.” He made no averment of damage or nuisance of any kind.

He pleaded;—(1) The narrow seas surrounding the kingdom of Scotland, and the bed and solum thereof, belonging to and being vested in the Crown, subject to the public rights of navigation and fishing, and Loch Long as defined in the summons being part of said narrow seas, the pursuer is entitled to decree as concluded for. (2) The defenders having no right, either by statute or at common law, to deposit their dredging in the narrow seas, and particularly in Loch Long, or on the bed or solum thereof, their doing so without permission is illegal, and the pursuer is No. 39.

entitled to interdict as concluded for.

The defenders did not deny the facts alleged against them. They stated, however, that investigations had been made by the Admiralty and by skilled persons on behalf of the Government to ascertain what effect the defenders' operations had had upon the soundings of the loch or the purity of its waters, and that the result had been to shew that the soundings were unaltered and the purity of the water unaffected. They averred as matter of fact that the dredgings never reached the bottom. They further averred that the action was not taken in vindication of any public interest, and was inimical to the important public interests committed to the defenders; that the Crown were not really acting in the public interest, but to further the private interests of persons living on Loch Long, who had guaranteed the expenses of the Crown in this action.

Nov. 25, 1891.
Lord Advocate v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

The Crown admitted that there was no obstruction to navigation, and admitted further the alleged guarantee.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (4) In respect that the defenders' operations do not in any way interfere with the rights of the Crown, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.*

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 13th June 1891, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds and declares that the defenders are not entitled to deposit or place earth, gravel, stones, mud, soil, or other material dug, cut, dredged, or otherwise removed from the banks or bed of the River Clyde, as defined by the Clyde Navigation Consolidation Act, 1858, in Loch Long, being part of the narrow seas of the kingdom of Scotland, extending from Arrochar in the north to a straight line drawn from Strone Point, in the county of Argyll, in the west, to Baron's Point, in the county of Dumbarton, on the east, and decerns: Reserves meantime the question of interdict, and continues the cause," &c.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The action takes the form of a declarator and interdict at the instance of the Lord Advocate as representing the department, and the decree asked extends not merely to Loch Long but generally to what are termed 'the narrow seas of the kingdom of Scotland.' There is not, however, any allegation of any deposit elsewhere than in Loch Long; and I am not prepared, and indeed have not been asked, to pronounce a judgment applicable to other places. If I were, I should require some further definition of the expression 'the narrow seas.' It is an expression which, in the literature of this subject, is used in different senses. It is sometimes used to denote the sea within cannon-shot of the shore, together with the estuaries, bays, &c., within the fauces terre—The Queen v. Keyn, L. R., 2 Exch. Div. 109-110, 119-174, et passim. But it is also used in another and wider sense, viz., as comprising the whole seas and channels around Great Britain, and between Great Britain and other countries on the continent of Europe.

"I propose therefore to deal only with the case actually before me, viz., the alleged invasion by the defenders of the Crown's alleged proprietary rights in the land-locked loch, creek, or bay known as Loch Long. Upon that question I have come to the conclusion—and I am bound to say, without difficulty—that the Crown is entitled to my judgment.

"It is quite true, as the defenders have anxiously urged, that the action is based entirely upon the proprietary right of the Crown, or, if the expression is preferred, of the State. There is no averment of injury, actual or anticipated, either to fishing or navigation, nor is there any averment of nuisance or of injury to the foreshore. Whatever may be the fact as to those matters, and whatever may be the motives of the Crown in asserting its alleged rights, the action is based on trespass, and on trespass alone.

"On the other hand, however, it has to be noted that the defenders rest ex-

No. 39.

Nov. 25, 1891.

Lord Advocate v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued ;—The Crown's right must be put as high as a proprietary right, for there was no averment of any interferclusively on the alleged absence of any title on the part of the Crown to interfere with their operations. They do not assert that they themselves have under their statutes or by municipal law any title to turn this inland loch into what is known in Scotland as a 'free toom.' Their statutory powers do not extend below Port-Glasgow, nor does our municipal law recognise the right to deposit rubbish as among the rights which the Queen's subjects possess in the seas and navigable rivers within the realm. The only such public rights known to the law are navigation and fishing. The defenders' case therefore is and must be this—not that they are exercising any right which is a burden on the Crown's right, and which the Crown, as trustees for its subjects, is bound to recognise, but that the Crown's right, not only in the seas around the coast, but also in the estuaries, bays, and sea lochs within the territory, is confined to a mere protectorate for the purposes of fishing and navigation, so that, except where the interest of fishing and navigation are concerned the Crown has no higher or better title to the water and bed of this inland loch than the defenders themselves. In short, the defenders' case is that—apart from fishing and navigation—Loch Long is just as free as the centre of the Atlantic, and that therefore not only all British subjects, but also all foreigners, may make such use as they please of its water and of its solum, provided only they do no injury, or no injury which can be proved, to the interests of fishing and navigation.

"I am bound to say that, so far as I can discover, this proposition is entirely novel, and is altogether opposed to every authority on the subject. It is true that there has been some controversy—turning, however, largely upon words—as to the exact nature of the Crown's right in what I may call the external sea, and particularly that portion of it which international law recognises as territorial and within the realm. But there has never, so far as I know, been any suggestion by any writer or by any Judge that inland lochs, bays, or estuaries within the fauces terre, are in any different position from navigable rivers. Nor has it ever, so far as I know, been doubted that, subject to such rights of navigation and fishing as the municipal law recognises, the solum of such lochs, bays, and estuaries belongs to the Crown. There may have been questions as to the Crown's right to exclude foreigners from the external sea within three miles of the shore, as to the jurisdiction of the Queen's Courts over foreigners within the three mile limit, and generally as to the nature of the Crown's right to the sea and the bed of the sea within that limit. But the most extreme advocates of public or rather international rights have always, I think, distinguished between the external sea and land-locked waters within the fauces terre. In the latter it has, so far as I know, been always recognised that the Crown has not merely a territorial but a proprietary right,—a right differing from the Crown's right to the land of the kingdom only in this, that being burdened with certain public uses, viz., navigation and fishing, the right of property is to a large extent extra commercium, or, in other words, within the regalia majora—Kent's Com. i. pp. 27-30 (edition of 1884); Wheaton's International Law, c. 4, sec. 10, pp. 188-190; Hale, De Jure Maris (as reprinted in Moore on the 'Sea and Seashore'), pp. 353, 377, 381, 384, 399, 401.

"I do not think that all this could be better illustrated than by a perusal of the judgments of the English Judges in the recent case of the 'Franconia.'—The Queen v. Keyn, supra. The question there was as to the criminal jurisdiction of the English Courts over foreigners sailing in foreign ships within three miles of the English coast; and although the decision went ultimately upon a special ground, the question was largely canvassed whether, within the three mile limit the right of the Crown was proprietary, or was a mere protectorate for the purposes of fishing and navigation. I shall have to refer presently to some of the opinions which were there expressed, but in the meantime the important fact is that even those Judges who held views opposed to the Crown's claim, drew a careful distinction between the external sea to which the question applied, and estuaries, bays, and inland waters, as to which it was common ground that they ence with navigation, fishing, or any other public use, nor was it said that the defenders were creating a nuisance. Now, the Crown had no proprieformed part of the counties into which they ran, and were within the jurisdiction of the Courts of common law. I may refer on this subject specially to the judgments of Sir Robert Phillimore and Chief-Justice Cockburn—The Queen v. Trustees.

No. 39.

Nov. 25, 1891.
Lord Advocate v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

Keyn, L. R. Exch. Div. ii, pp. 71 and 162.

"I confess, therefore, that it seems to me that the particular case with which I have to deal is entirely outside the sphere of the controversy to which the defenders appeal. In other words, I can find no authority for the defenders' argument; and, apart from authority, I should think it tolerably clear, in point of principle, that a sea loch, or land-locked bay, running up from the Firth of Clyde into the centre of Argyllshire was, for all practical purposes, part of that county, subject to the jurisdiction of its Sheriff, and differing from the fresh-water lochs within it only as being navigable, and so subject to the public uses of navigation and fishing.

"It follows that the Crown are entitled to my judgment on the only question which is properly before me; but as the larger question, that, viz., as to the nature of the Crown's right within what has been called the 'narrow seas,' has been made the subject of argument, it may perhaps be right that I should indicate the opinion which I have formed on that subject.

"(1) I hold it to be now acknowledged as matter of international law that the territory of Great Britain does not extend to the narrow seas surrounding the kingdom in the older and wider sense of that expression. That is to say, the ancient claims of the kings of England to the whole seas and channels between England and other countries on the Continent cannot now be maintained. This I do not understand to be in controversy.

"(2) I hold it to be still an open question whether the territory of the kingdom extends, e.g., to those seas and channels along the coast which are outside the fauces terræ, and more than three miles from the shore, but which are situated between the mainland and islands forming part of the kingdom, such as e.g. the island of Arran and the Hebrides. This question may possibly come to be material between the present parties in the event of the defenders seeking another place of deposit; but in the meantime it is hardly a question of practical interest.

"(3) The more practical question, and that on which alone I heard argument, was with respect to the nature of the Crown's right in what is now acknowledged to be part of the territory of the kingdom, viz., the strip or area of sea within cannon shot, or three miles of the shore. Is the Crown's right in that strip of sea proprietary, like the Crown's right in the foreshore and in the land? or is it only a protectorate for certain purposes, and particularly navigation and fishing?

"I am of opinion that the former is the correct view, and that there is no distinction in legal character between the Crown's right in the foreshore, in tidal and navigable rivers, and in the bed of the sea within three miles of the shore. In each case it is of course a right largely qualified by public uses. In each case it is therefore to a large extent extra commercium; but none the less is it, in my opinion, a proprietary right—a right which may be the subject of trespass, and which may be vindicated like other rights of property.

"Such I consider is the result of all the best authorities—Scotch, English, and foreign.

"It is the doctrine of Craig, Stair, Erskine, and Bell—(Craig, i. 13, p. 140; Stair, ii. 1, 2; ii. 1, 5; Ersk. ii. 1, 6; ii. 6, 13; Bell, 639). It is the doctrine of Seldon and Hale, of Grotius and Vattel—(Grotius, ii. 2, 13; Vattel, i. 23, Puffendorf, iv. 2, 6; see also authorities cited by Lindley, J., L. R. 2 Exch. Div. p. 90-91; Hale, De Jure Maris, 358, 367 (Moore); Hall's Essay, 667, 671 (Moore);—and it has been affirmed on many occasions by high judicial authorities both in Scotland and England. It has also received practical effect in various judgments with respect, inter alia, to minerals under the sea, mussel-beds and oyster-beds, maritima incrementa, and flotsam and jetsam—(Smith v. Officers of State, 8 D.

No. 39.

Nov. 25, 1891.
Lord Advocate v. Clyde
Navigation
Trustees.

tary right. [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—Is the solum of Loch Long part of the United Kingdom?—It was. [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—Then, according to your argument, there is a part of the United Kingdom not given out to anyone which does not belong to the Crown?—Yes, the reason being that its physical conditions did not allow a right of property to exist. There was no such distinction as the Lord Ordinary thought there was between sea-water intra fauces terræ, and on the open sea-coast. Nor could there be, for there was in both cases alike an impossibility of continuous dominium or possession. Rights of jurisdiction might be much larger on land-locked seas than on the open coast, but that again was based on fact. You could shut up an intruder in such a loch, or you could prevent him entering. The narrow seas were as 722; Gammell v. Lord Advocate, 3 Macq. 419; Duchess of Sutherland v. Watson, 6 Macph. 199; Gann v. Whitstable Fishers, 11 C. B., N. S., 337, 13 C. B., N. S., 353, 11 H. L. 192; The Queen v. Duke of Cornwall, see L. R., 2 Exch. Div. 156; 21 and 22 Vict. c. 109).

“Altogether, it is, I think, too late now to dispute a proposition so long recognised and so well established, and in saying so I hope I am not treating with disrespect certain dicta of eminent Judges to which the defenders referred. For I think it will be found that, for the purposes of the present question, the distinctions which these dicta involve are hardly material. It may be, for example, that the Crown’s right in the sea within the three mile limit is not merely burdened with certain public uses, but that altogether it is a right which is properly described as a trust for the British public. It may therefore be not merely to certain effects, but altogether, extra commercium, and so not properly to be described as ‘patrimonial.’ But whether held in trust or not, it is none the less, so far as I can see, a proprietary right—that is to say, it is a right of property, and not a mere protectorate for the limited purpose of fishing and navigation. And if the right is a right of property either in the Crown or in the State, of which the Crown is the Executive, I do not think that any of the learned Judges referred to will be found to dispute that it includes a right to prevent acts of trespass like those of the defenders—acts which, as I have said, are not in pursuance of any private or public right, and of which the only justification alleged is that the Crown is not prepared to take the burden of proving that they are injurious.

“I do not think it necessary to do more than notice the defenders’ averment, introduced by way of amendment at the close of the discussion, to the effect that ‘the defenders have not deposited any material on the solum of Loch Long. The dredgings which are discharged from their barges do not, in fact, reach the bottom of the loch.’ I am, I suppose, bound to assume that this statement is made seriously, and that the defenders are serious in their demand to be allowed a proof of it. If, therefore, I thought it relevant I should have felt bound to have allowed such proof; but I do not think it relevant. For, assuming that in some unexplained manner the law of gravitation is suspended or counteracted in this part of the Firth of Clyde, I do not for my part see that it makes any difference whether the defenders’ deposits reach the bottom of Loch Long or are carried out to the Firth of Clyde, or are carried out to sea. The Crown, if proprietor of the solum, must also in my opinion be proprietor of the water above it; and, at all events, must have a sufficient proprietary interest in the water to have a good title to prevent acts of trespass like those in question. It certainly does not appear to me that the Crown is bound, in a question with persons who have no title of any kind, to enter into a proof as to whether the unauthorised deposits in question appreciably or injuriously affect the solum. It must be assumed that the Crown advisers have good reasons for their interference; and they are not, in my opinion, bound to discuss those reasons in a Court of law.

“I shall therefore grant the declarator concluded for, except with respect to the narrow seas, but I shall reserve in the meantime the question of interdict.”

common as the high seas as regards their uses, for the one was as inexhaustible as the other. In truth, no distinction could be taken between the open coast and such a loch as regarded property. Property in the solum was not in the least necessary for the full enjoyment of the rights for which Government were, by tacit international agreement, allowed to exercise their protectorate.¹ Look at the measure of the right as regarded extent. It was measured by a cannon shot, an excellent way of measuring jurisdiction, but not appropriate to property. Again, unless the line beyond which there was no property were fixed at low-water mark, where was it to be drawn? Why at three miles? But unless some natural limit was taken, and good sense could recognise none but the shore, very awkward international complications would certainly arise. Now, as regarded authority, the "Franconia" case decided nothing as to property, for the point there was jurisdiction, and there were dicta on both sides. Stair² did, no doubt, say that the ocean in the narrow seas "may become proper," but that was on the view that it might be appropriated by "bounds and meaths," which, it was submitted, was impossible. The passages quoted by the Lord Ordinary from Erskine and Bell did not affirm property, but only a trust for certain public uses, a trust which the Crown did not say was infringed by the defenders. So, too, the cases cited by the Lord Ordinary did not affirm anything more than rights of fishing³ and free navigation.⁴ Any further doctrine was obiter merely. The doctrine of the Crown's right being a mere trust was supported by obiter dicta quite as weighty.⁵ The point was not decided in Officers of State v. Smith.⁶

Argued for the pursuer;—The Lord Ordinary's judgment was sound, and was borne out by the cases to which he had referred. The same controversy between a protectorate on the one hand and property on the other had been raised as to the foreshore, but it had been shewn there,—and the same reasoning would apply here,—that it was fallacious to attempt to separate a trust right entirely from a right of property. The right in the one case as in the other was a right of property extra commercium to a certain extent, i.e., although it might be alienated, the trust for the public would still be imposed on it.⁷ The "Franconia" case was no doubt a case of jurisdiction, but the opinion of Cockburn, C. J., pointed out very clearly the distinction between the high seas and estuaries or lochs, a distinction which was all important here. To the other authorities there fell to be added the weight of Lord Stowell's opinion in the case of the Twee Gebroeders,⁸ in which his Lordship held that portions of the sea might be prescribed for.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer in this case is the Sovereign acting

No. 39.

Nov. 25, 1891.
Lord Advocate v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

¹ Bell's Prins., sec. 640.

² Stair, ii. 1, 2; ii. 1, 5.

³ Commissioners of Woods and Forests v. Gammell, March 28, 1859, 21 D. 4, 31 Scot. Jur. 431, 3 Macq. 419; Duchess of Sutherland v. Watson, Jan. 10, 1868, 6 Macph. 199, 40 Scot. Jur. 119.

⁴ Agnew v. Lord Advocate, 11 Macph. 309, 45 Scot. Jur. 214; Gann v. Whistable Fishers, as cited by Lord Ordinary.

⁵ E.g., per Lord Fullerton in Lord Advocate v. Clyde Trustees, Jan. 23, 1849, 11 D. 391, 21 Scot. Jur. 110, in H. L., March 12, 1852, 1 Macq. 46, 24 Scot. Jur. 379, Paters. Ap. 6.

⁶ Officers of State v. Smith, March 11, 1846, 8 D. 711, 18 Scot. Jur. 364, in H. L. July 13, 1849, 6 Bell, 487, 21 Scot. Jur. 534.

⁷ Agnew, as cited; Smith's case, per Lord Wensleydale in the House of Lords; Duchess of Sutherland, ut cit.—see Lord Neaves, 6 Macph. 213.

⁸ 1801, 3 Rob.'s Adm. Reps., p. 336.

No. 39.
Nov. 25, 1891.
Lord Advocate v. Clyde
Navigation
Trustees.

through the properly appointed Department, and the purpose of the action is to interdict the defenders, who are the statutory commissioners in charge of the Clyde Navigation, from throwing large quantities of solid matter into the waters of Loch Long. The basis of the case for the Crown is that the place at which it is alleged that these masses of matter are thrown into the sea forms part of the realm, and that the Department, which is authorised to act for the Crown in matters relating to such part of the realm, is entitled to prevent any person, who has not received lawful authority to do so, from depositing anything upon the solum. The contention of the Crown is that it is not necessary to aver that any damage is being done by the acts of the defenders, but that the Crown, holding Loch Long as part of the realm, has a title to prevent any interference with it, if no legal right can be shewn to justify such interference and to exclude the original right in the Crown to the loch.

The defenders, on the other hand, state no defence in the nature of a claim of right to do what they are doing, based upon any grant, express or implied, in their favour obtained from the Crown, or conferred by parliamentary authority, such as will supply them with an answer, as on the ground of right conferred, to the contention of the Crown. Their only plea upon the merits of the case is that, as their operations do not in any way interfere with the rights of the Crown, they are entitled to absolvitor. Claiming no special right in themselves, their defence is that the Crown has no right which they are infringing.

It would appear from the Lord Ordinary's opinion that there was an elaborate discussion before him upon the rights of the realm to the solum of the sea below low-water mark upon the open sea-coast, and there was a considerable amount of argument and a citation of numerous authorities upon the same subject in the debate before us.

In the view I take of this case, it is quite unnecessary for us to consider any such matter as the Crown's right to the solum of the sea within the three mile limit from the coast, where that coast faces the open sea. The considerations of law applicable to the three mile limit could only be of consequence in this case if the solum of Loch Long could be held to be in the same position as the solum of the sea below low-water mark. I understand that the defenders maintain that there is no difference. Their argument is that, as the sea comes up Loch Long, the solum of the loch is in exactly the same position as regards the rights of the Sovereign to the property as the solum below the sea on the coast within the three mile limit. They maintain that, if they can shew that the realm has no right of property within that three mile limit, then it can have no right of property in the solum of Loch Long.

Whether the Crown has or has not a right of property ex adverso of the coast does not, in my opinion, affect the question which is before us. It is, of course, clear that, if the solum on the coast is the property of the Crown, fortiori the solum of a narrow land-locked arm of the sea, not two miles broad at any point, must be in the Crown also. But the converse would by no means necessarily hold, that, if the solum on the coast is not in the Crown, then the solum of a narrow estuary is not part of the realm, but is a "no-man's land" like the bed of the Atlantic Ocean. On the contrary, it appears to me that the considerations which might apply to the solum opposite to the sea-coast would not apply to the other at all. Let it be assumed to be settled law that there is no right of property below low-water mark on the sea-coast—an assumption which, in my opinion, is not sound—the question whether the solum of a strip of land-locked water such as Loch Long belonged to the realm would by no means be closed by such settlement of the law in relation to the solum on the sea-coast. I therefore prefer to consider the case quite apart from questions regarding the solum within the three mile limit. If it be plain that Loch Long is part of the realm, without its being necessary to rely upon any law relating to the three mile limit, then all considerations in regard to the three mile limit are unnecessary to the case.

No. 39.

Nov. 25, 1891.
Lord Advocate v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

The first question is this—is Loch Long part of the realm? This is a question the answer to which can be given without any proof. There is no more need for proof on that question than there would be in a case relating to the City of Edinburgh to establish that that city is part of the British realm. The geographical position is known. It is a narrow estuary running inland from the Firth of Clyde, enclosed by Scottish land except at its narrow outlet to the Firth of Clyde.

That such a place should not belong to the country which practically encloses it and shuts it off from the ocean except at its outlet, but should be as free to all the world to do anything with it as a part of the open sea, is, in my opinion, not only not in accordance with law, but contrary to all accepted ideas as to the occupation and ownership of a country by the chief power of the nation which actually possesses it. I hold it to be quite settled law that such an estuary as Loch Long is as much a part of the property of the realm as the counties within the embrace of which it may lie, that the chief Courts of the country have the same jurisdiction over it as they have over the immediately neighbouring locality, and that no other Courts than those of this country have any jurisdiction over it whatever. In short, I hold it to be part and parcel of the country. The common consent of nations recognises the sole right of each nation in its own estuaries, such as that of Loch Long, to the exclusion of all intrusion on the part of other nations, unless permitted by treaty following on conquest or by pacific international agreement for common benefit.

In opposition to this view it is maintained for the defenders that, whatever may be the territorial right of the State in such an estuary, it is not a proprietary right, and that therefore the Crown cannot exercise the same right to prevent trespass which can be exercised by an ordinary proprietor of a part of the solum of the country. Their case is that the right of the State is one of mere protectorate, for the purposes of navigation, fishing, and the like, but that in all other respects the State has no right to interfere with anything done in Loch Long, whether by a British subject, or by a Frenchman, German, American, or any other foreigner, unless in the execution of its duty of protectorate of public uses such as I have stated.

I can find no authority for any such proposition, which is certainly startling as well as novel. It appears to amount to this, that the Crown is limited, as regards localities such as Loch Long, to a duty of police, while all the world can use the loch at pleasure as long as it cannot be shewn that damage is actually being done to those interests for which the protectorate exists. The defenders practically maintain that, unless the Crown in its police capacity undertakes to prove that what is being done is in fact injurious to the uses to which the community has right, independent of property, it cannot succeed in preventing what would be a palpable act of trespass if done on any property above high-water mark, and this even although the person or body committing

No. 39.

Nov. 25, 1891.
 Lord Advocate v. Clyde
 Navigation
 Trustees.

the act have no right whatever greater than that possessed by any individual citizen, or even by a foreigner. It seems strange that, if such a view of the law be sound, it should not long ere this have been so established as to be found formulated in our authoritative law treatises and confirmed by decisions. But I can find no trace of any such law. On the contrary, whatever questions may be raised as regards the solum within the three mile limit, all the authorities concur in giving the proprietary right in estuaries to the Crown. It is true, of course, that the powers of proprietary right are modified by certain public uses which the community are entitled to enjoy, but these are restrictions solely in the interest of the whole public, and in no way impinge upon the rights of the Crown to deal with members of the public who go outside the public uses which are admitted to be a restriction on the full exercise of proprietary rights, and commit trespasses, which have no connection with these public uses, unless, indeed, it be to infringe them and to endanger them.

I hold on the authorities that the right of the Crown in Loch Long and its solum is a right of property, and that the Crown is entitled to stop any intruder from coming to Loch Long, and there throwing large quantities of solid matter into the loch. Having that right, I further hold that it is not a relevant defence on the part of those admittedly so casting solid matter into the loch to aver that they are doing no harm. They are doing that which they have no right by statutory or customary law or by contract to do, and I am unable to see how the Crown can be prevented from interdicting the trespass. This is on the view of property which I hold to be very clear, but I should hold the same as regards the Crown's right even if that right was one of property in trust only for the recognised public uses of such a place. Even in that view the Crown would, in this matter, be in no different position from that of many public bodies who hold property expressly for the public use, the conditions of their trust preventing the sale or alienation of the property, but who, nevertheless, are entitled to exercise all the rights of proprietors to prevent those having no title from interfering with it in any other way than in the reasonable exercise of such admitted public rights of use. It is certain that what the Clyde Trustees have been doing does not fall within any of the public uses, subject to which the Crown holds Loch Long, and I can see nothing to prevent the proper authority acting for the Crown from interfering to stop any persons from doing in Loch Long acts which they can shew no title to do, and which on any other property would amount to a trespass if done without title.

I am therefore very clearly of opinion that the title of the Crown to ask for declarator and interdict against these proceedings is beyond all question, and that, accordingly, the Court should adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and, if it prove to be necessary, grant interdict against the defendants.

LORD YOUNG.—I greatly regret—we all regret—everybody must regret—that this question should have been raised, and I cannot help thinking that it might have been avoided. The Clyde Trustees have a public duty to perform, not only to the harbour of Glasgow, but through that to the whole community. They must, until some useful method is discovered for the employment of the dredgings which they take from the bed of the river, have some place to put them, or cease to take them out. It seems to be contemplated in the Clyde Statutes that they should place the dredgings on the banks, but it is quite intelligible that that plan is too expensive to be encountered if it can be avoided.

I cannot doubt that there is some place within measurable distance where these dredgings may be thrown out into the sea without detriment to the public interests. I cannot help thinking that on a conference between these two public authorities, the Clyde Trustees and the Crown, an arrangement might have been arrived at without raising any legal question. Unfortunately, however, the legal question is raised; the Clyde Trustees claim right to deposit their dredgings in Loch Long, the Crown asserting that they have no such right.

No. 39.

Nov. 25, 1891.
 Lord Advocate v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

The question having arisen, we have to determine it, and it is, whether there is a legal title of property to Loch Long in the Crown. My opinion is, and, I confess, without doubt or hesitation, that Loch Long is part of the territory of Scotland. Any part of it that is not in Argyllshire is in Dumbartonshire. It is the property of the Crown, if it is part of the territory of Scotland, as it certainly is. The use of it, of course, is subject to such limitations as nature puts upon it. It can only be used as property so far as that is consistent with the fact that it is constantly covered with salt water to a great depth. But it is the property of the Crown jure coronæ. On that I have no doubt.

The Crown must use the property in the public interest. But that is not a matter for us. If the department of Government which is charged with the administration of the Crown's duties in this matter uses this property in a manner detrimental to the public interest, or fails to use it in the interest of the public, there is a remedy, but it is not to be found here. The Government must be called to account, and it can be most sharply and effectually called to account elsewhere. It is said that they are using their right in a way that is inimical to the public interests committed to the defenders, and it is said they have taken a guarantee from private individuals for their expenses. The Crown admit they have taken such a guarantee, and I shall only say I am surprised that, acting, as they say they are, in the public interest, they should have condescended to do so. But I am bound to assume, even although I thought the contrary to be the case, that the Crown is using this Crown property consistently with the public interest, and is forbidding all uses of it that are inconsistent with the public interest. I think it is the absolute legal right of the Crown authorities to prevent a use of the solum which is inconsistent with their view of the public interest.

That would be sufficient for the decision of the case. But we had much discussion and citation of authority on the question of the three mile limit. But that authority is pertinent only if the property there is in the same position as in Loch Long. Otherwise it is not. I have no objection to indicate my own view, it is only my individual view, that the Crown has a right of property within the three mile limit. What about the building of piers and jetties? Is it doubtful that piers so built are built on Scottish land, on ground vested in the Crown, and applicable to any purpose which it will serve? There are many such piers. I cannot distinguish between that part of the three mile limit on which these piers are built, the part adjacent to low-water mark, and that part which lies further out.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think it unnecessary to express any opinion in this case on the question which was argued before us as to the extent and character of

No. 39. Nov. 25, 1891.
Lord Advocate v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

the Crown's right to the solum underlying external seas within what is known as the three mile limit. That question does not and cannot arise in reference to the solum of Loch Long, which forms no part of the external seas surrounding the United Kingdom, but is an inland arm of the sea, or Firth of Clyde, entirely within the United Kingdom. Being within the territory of the United Kingdom, the solum of Loch Long must either be vested in the Crown or in a subject proprietor deriving right from the Crown. It is not suggested, however, that the solum of Loch Long is or has ever been vested in any subject of the Crown, and therefore it follows that it is still vested in the Crown.

To what extent and effect it is vested in the Crown is a different question. It was maintained for the defenders that the right of the Crown in the solum of such a loch (as in the foreshore, or the solum of a tidal navigable river) is not proprietary, but merely a right in trust for the public for certain public uses. On this question there is a considerable difference of opinion. For my own part, I agree with those who think that the right of the Crown is a proprietary right, burdened with rights in favour of the public, no doubt, but still a proprietary right.

But it is not necessary to maintain that view for the decision of the present case. Assume that the only right which the Crown has is a trust right for public benefit. The title of the Crown to the solum of Loch Long is the only title to that solum which exists, and in respect of that title is in a position to resist any attempt to invade the rights which the trust title confers. A trustee vested in lands for trust purposes has a good and sufficient title to prevent any stranger from squatting thereon, or from interfering in any way with the lands to which he has no title whatever.

Now, this appears to me to be the position of parties in the present case. The Crown has, and alone has, a title to the solum of Loch Long; the defenders have no title to it whatever. The defenders have, therefore, no right to use the solum of Loch Long, and the Crown has the right and title to prevent them using it if they try to do so.

The defenders, however, maintain that the Crown cannot interfere with the proceedings complained of, except it shews that these proceedings are injurious to the special public uses in trust for which the Crown holds. I think this argument cannot be sustained. It is the duty of a trustee to prevent any unwarranted invasion of the trust subjects, and he is, in my opinion, entitled to interdict any such invasion on the ground, admitted or proved, that he is the vested holder of the subjects and that the invader has no title to them whatever. He is under no necessity to state or to prove that the invasion of his right, threatened or actual, is or will be injurious.

I agree substantially with the views expressed by the Lord Ordinary, and I am of opinion that his interlocutor should be affirmed.

THE COURT adhered.

DONALD BEITH, W.S.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

MRS CAROLINE JANE WILLIAMSON OR IMRIE, Pursuer (Respondent).—

No. 40.

*Cosens.*JAMES WILLIAM IMRIE, Defender (Reclaimer).—*Younger.*Nov. 26, 1891.
Imrie v. Imrie.

Husband and Wife—Constitution of Marriage—Proof.—Where a man and woman had mutually exchanged written declarations acknowledging each other to be husband and wife, in a declarator of marriage by the woman against the man, which was founded upon the declarations, held that the pursuer was bound to prove the circumstances in which the writings had been exchanged and that they were consistent with the matrimonial intention expressed in the writings.

Circumstances in which it was held that the declarations had been exchanged with the intention of constituting marriage, and that the contract of marriage was thereby proved.

CAROLINE JANE WILLIAMSON OR IMRIE, residing at York, brought an ^{1st Division.} action against James William Imrie, residing in Glasgow, concluding, ^{Ld. Stormonth.} inter alia, for declarator that in May 1889 she and the defender were lawfully married to each other at Glasgow. ^{Darling.}

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 2) "In October 1888 the pursuer went to Glasgow to pay a visit to the defender's parents at 17 Florence Place, Mrs Imrie, the defender's mother, being the pursuer's aunt. . . . An engagement to marry was soon afterwards entered into between them. On the strength of this engagement, and after many and ardent solicitations on the part of the defender, and renewed promises by him to marry her, the pursuer, in May 1889, consented to surrender her person to him, and carnal connection took place between them at the house in Florence Place. . . ." (Cond. 3) "Within a few days after the said promise and copula the defender proposed that the pursuer and he should formally acknowledge each other in writing to be husband and wife. Of this proposal the pursuer approved, and holograph documents in the following terms were exchanged between the parties, viz.:—'I acknowledge Caroline Jane Williamson as my lawful wife. (Sd.) JAMES WILLIAM IMRIE. Witness, Jessie Scott Stewart; Witness, Henry Murphy, 8th May 1889. I acknowledge James William Imrie as my lawful husband. (Sd.) CAROLINE JANE WILLIAMSON. Witness, Jessie Scott Stewart; Witness, Henry Murphy. . . .' On the faith of these declarations the pursuer allowed the defender to cohabit with her, and they acted towards each other as husband and wife."

In answer to cond. 2 the defender admitted that carnal intercourse had taken place between him and the pursuer during this visit, and explained,—“After this intercourse had continued for some time the defender promised to marry the pursuer when he had reached the age of twenty-five years, but this engagement was afterwards broken off by mutual consent as hereinafter mentioned.”

The defender's answer to cond. 3 was;—“(Ans. 3) Denied. Explained that on or about the date mentioned, the defender being ill of an attack of pleurisy, and it being doubtful whether he would recover, the pursuer proposed that the defender should sign a document which would, in the event of his death, enable her to claim an insurance which she informed him existed upon his life. The defender, being willing to assist her, did sign a document for that purpose, as did also the pursuer. There was no intention on the part of either of the parties that these documents should constitute a marriage between them, or have any effect during the lifetime of the parties, nor were they ever regarded or treated by the parties as having any such effect. The terms of the documents are not admitted. They were not holograph. They were not signed in the presence of witnesses. About the month of July following there was some disagreement between the parties, and the alleged acknowledgments were destroyed,

No. 40. the pursuer tearing up the document in her possession in the defender's presence. The parties also returned each other's letters. The pursuer declared to the defender that she wished him to understand she was to have nothing further to do with him, and released him from any promise of marriage he had ever made to her."

Nov. 26, 1891.
Imrie v. Imrie.

The pursuer pleaded ;—(2) Marriage between the pursuer and the defender having been duly constituted per verba de presenti, and by acknowledgment, declarator ought to be pronounced to that effect.

The following digest of the evidence is taken from the note to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling) :—"The facts are that in October 1888 the pursuer, who is a first cousin of the defender, came from York to Glasgow on a visit to the defender's father and mother. The pursuer, who had been a hospital nurse in London, was then not less than twenty-five years of age, and probably as much as twenty-eight. The defender was in his twentieth year, in delicate health, and employed in his father's business as a tailor. Very soon a courtship sprang up between them, which resulted in a promise of marriage, and during the pursuer's visit, which lasted till the end of May 1889, they had repeated acts of connection. The first of these acts, according to the defender, took place in the month of December, and, according to the pursuer, on the 1st of May. The pursuer says that they became engaged on 25th November, and the defender says not till the middle of March. I do not think it is of much consequence to decide which of them is speaking the truth, for both admit that connection took place before the 8th of May, and both admit that the engagement to marry was qualified by the stipulation that the marriage was not to take place for several years. The importance of the 8th of May is that on that day they exchanged writings acknowledging each other to be husband and wife. These acknowledgments bore to be attested by two witnesses; but it appears from the proof that these persons were not witnesses in any proper sense of the term, for they neither saw the parties sign nor heard them make any acknowledgment either of their signatures or of the fact that they were husband and wife. The writings are not now in existence. The defender says that the pursuer tore up hers in the course of a quarrel which they had towards the end of July 1889, and that he destroyed his immediately afterwards. The pursuer, on the other hand, denies that she ever destroyed her document, and alleges that it was taken out of her box by some member of defender's family. But the defender admits the terms of the documents, and he explained the circumstances under which he prepared and got them signed.*

"About the end of May the pursuer left the house of the defender's father, and took employment as a nurse at Gartnavel Asylum. She remained either there or at similar work in the country till the end of September, when she went to visit a maiden aunt at Port-Bannatyne. Her pregnancy having then become apparent, and her intimacy with the defender having been discovered, she returned to Glasgow in November and was at once sent home by the defender's parents to her mother at York, where she was delivered of a child on 2d March 1890. From th

* The defender deponed,—“There was no intention at that time on my part that that should constitute a marriage. The whole thing was done on the 8th of May. When pursuer made the proposal that I should do something to keep the insurance money for her, I suggested that it might just be as well to get married before the registrar, and I was quite willing to do so. The pursuer, however, said that she would not hear of that on any consideration, and said that when she was to be married she would go to church. I kept one of the documents and the pursuer kept the other.”

time when the pursuer left the house of the defender's father, in May 1889, till she left Port-Bannatyne, in November of that year, a correspondence was kept up between her and the defender, in which he habitually addressed her in such terms as 'My own dear wife,' and subscribed himself as 'Your loving husband,' while she addressed him as 'My dear' or 'My darling husband,' and signed herself 'Your loving wife.'

No. 40.
Nov. 26, 1891.
Imrie v. Imrie.

"In the month of July he presented her with a wedding ring, which she sometimes wore, and on one occasion, if not oftener, she introduced him to a friend as her husband, and he did not in any way repudiate the description."

The Lord Ordinary on 11th July 1891 gave decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

* "OPINION.—. . . It is firmly settled in the law of Scotland that marriage may be constituted by the deliberate interchange of consent de presenti, that the consent may be evidenced by written acknowledgments, and that these need not be either holograph or tested. It is also settled that parole evidence is competent to shew that the consent so interchanged, though in form present and deliberate, was not truly understood or intended by the parties to make marriage, and that if such evidence is forthcoming there is no marriage. But I take it that such evidence must shew an intention on both sides inconsistent with the natural meaning of the words used, and that a mere mental reservation on one side will not be sufficient—(see the opinion of Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis at p. 1045-6 in Fleming v. Corbet, 21 D. 1034). I also think that where an explanation is made by one of the parties and denied by the other of a purpose other than marriage as existing in the minds of both, it must be scanned very closely to see whether it is a rational explanation, and whether it is borne out by their conduct both before and after the granting of the documents.

"Now, the explanation made by the defender is that the pursuer suggested the granting of the documents in order to give her a claim, in the event of his death, to an insurance of £100 which was supposed to exist on his life, and that he agreed to become a party to the documents for that purpose and no other. In point of fact there was no insurance on his life except one for some £15 or £20 taken out by his parents when he was a child, and to which, I apprehend, he personally had no right. He does not even say that he wished the pursuer to have the rights of his widow, whatever these might be, but only that he thought the production of the documents, in the event of his death, might induce his parents to pay her a sum of money rather than have any disclosure.

"I cannot say that this explanation strikes me as probable or even rational.

"But I think it is displaced by the conduct of the defender himself. In the first place, he admits that, both before and after the documents were granted, he was willing to marry the pursuer before the registrar, and he says that he proposed this course to her and she declined. She denies that he made any such proposition, but the important thing is that he was prepared in his own mind to go through a ceremony of marriage, and if so, it is difficult to understand why, being situated as he was, he should not have been willing to accomplish the same object by an easier, more secret, and less formal method. Then, if his object was only what he now says it was, I cannot account for his constantly addressing her in letters as his wife, his permitting her to describe him to others as her husband, and his presenting her with a plain gold ring. All these circumstances seem to me consistent with the acknowledgments having meant what they professed to mean, and what she says they meant, and inconsistent with the meaning which he ascribes to them.

"Thus far I have considered the case as if the documents were still in existence. But it was strenuously and ably maintained by Mr Younger that the destruction of them left the pursuer entirely at the mercy of the defender, and that his admission of their terms could only be taken subject to the qualification that they were not intended to make marriage. I cannot assent to that proposition. The moment the defender admits their terms, I think the Court is bound to inquire, not only by his own evidence and his own writ, but by

No. 40. The defender reclaimed, and argued ;—The interchange of the documents might be a good foundation for the pursuer's case, but they were far from being sufficient to substantiate it. Previous cases and dicta came to this, that however explicit the terms of the documents were, the pursuer must prove by direct evidence that the intention of the parties when they exchanged the writings was to constitute a marriage.¹ At any-rate, she must prove that she was actually made to believe that marriage was intended, whether the defender had a mental reservation or not.² This onus the pursuer had failed to discharge, and accordingly the documents were worthless to constitute marriage.³

Nov. 26, 1891.
Imrie v. Imrie.

The respondent's argument sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Judges.⁴

LORD PRESIDENT.—The case has been argued to us on the assumption that the pursuer's averment in cond. 3 is well founded, to this extent at least, that on 8th May 1889 documents were interchanged between the pursuer and defender in the terms set out on record, these terms being completely explicit,—“I acknowledge Caroline Jane Williamson as my lawful wife.” “I acknowledge James William Imrie as my lawful husband.” I say the case was argued other evidence as well, whether they were seriously meant. It is clear that if they were sufficient to signify consent de presenti, the marriage so constituted could not be undone by the mere destruction of the documents. The act of destroying them can only be important as throwing light on the intention with which they were granted. Even if they were destroyed, as the defender says they were, in the course of a sudden quarrel, it would not go far to shew that they were regarded by the parties as insignificant. It would rather seem to me to indicate the contrary. But I am by no means satisfied that the defender's statement on this head ought to be accepted. His candour in admitting the terms of the documents disposed me on the whole to believe him, and I am sorry to add that the pursuer's admission of the untruthfulness of some of the statements in her letters very seriously shakes her credibility. But it is remarkable that the correspondence about the time when the alleged destruction of the documents took place, while it contains evidence of the parties having had a quarrel, does not indicate any serious change in their relations, and in particular, the defender continues, after that, to call the pursuer his wife, exactly as he had been doing all along. On the whole, I think it is more probable that the destruction of the documents took place about the time of the rupture, consequent on the discovery by the defender's parents of the pursuer's pregnancy, and that the pursuer was not herself a party to it.

“I do not forget that the defender was much younger than the pursuer, and, indeed, little more than a boy when he granted his acknowledgment, and that his circumstances at the time were such as to make marriage in the highest degree imprudent. But he was undoubtedly at the time attached to the pursuer, they were in the same rank of life, and nearly related, and marriage was the best reparation for the wrong which he had done her (with however little resistance on her part, and it was, I fear, but little) in obtaining possession of her person. On the whole, it seems to me that the pursuer is entitled to the declarator which she asks.”

¹ Lockyer v. Sinclair, March 3, 1846, 8 D. 582, L. J.-C. Hope, p. 595, 18 Scot. Jur. 290; Fleming v. Corbet, June 24, 1859, 21 D. 1034, L. J.-C. Inglis, p. 1043, 31 Scot. Jur. 562.

² Robertson v. Steuart, Feb. 27, 1874, 1 R. 532, Lord Deas, p. 639.

³ Anderson v. Fullerton, Nov. 13, 1795, Hume, 365.

⁴ Authorities cited.—M'Kie v. Ferguson, Aug. 2, 1781, Hume's Decisions, 358; Forster v. Forster, June 11, 1872, 10 Macph. (H. L.) 68; Maloy v. M'Adam, Jan. 9, 1885, 12 R. 431; Leslie v. Leslie, March 16, 1860, 22 D. 993, 32 Scot. Jur. 423; Fraser on Husband and Wife, i. 317; M'Alister v. Dun, May 2, 1759, 2 Pat. Apps. 29.

on that assumption, because on record the defender gives a general denial to the averments in cond. 3, and further says,—“The terms of the documents are not admitted,” but in her evidence the pursuer swears to the terms of the documents as being those set out in cond. 3, and there is no attempt made to impugn her evidence on that point. Accordingly, we must take it that on 8th May 1889 documents in these terms were exchanged between the parties.

No. 40.
Nov. 26, 1891.
Imrie v. Imrie.

Mr Younger has quite rightly said that it is not sufficient for the pursuer to table these documents, and upon that to demand the judgment of the Court, but that it is for the pursuer to explain by evidence what were the circumstances in which they were exchanged, so as to shew that they were given with the animus which the writings themselves express. I do not think that the dicta quoted by the reclaimer's counsel go so far as to shew that, however explicit the documents may be in their terms, the Court will require direct evidence of the intention of the parties in exchanging them, other than evidence shewing that the circumstances were consistent with or corroborative of the expression of matrimonial intention contained in the documents. We have to examine the circumstances of the case, not merely to see whether they support the pursuer's story, but also to see whether the competing theory advanced by the defender to account for the exchange of the documents can be sustained. If the pursuer can shew that at the time when these documents were exchanged the parties were minded to enter into marriage, the burden of proof will, I think, to a large extent be discharged, while, on the other hand, if the counter explanations offered by the defender appear to be of too flimsy and unsubstantial a nature, that will again lead directly to the result that the opposite theory must be accepted, namely, that these documents were intended to attest a marriage between the parties.

On examining the evidence I find no difficulty in ascertaining the state of mind of the defender, whose interest is now to challenge these documents as documents evidencing a marriage. He says,—“When pursuer made the proposal that I should do something to keep the insurance money for her I suggested that it might be just as well to get married before the registrar, and I was quite willing to do so.” His theory in the present controversy is that the pursuer proposed the exchange of these documents, not as expressing matrimonial consent, but in order to give her a right over some insurance money, the existence of (which, he says, had not been known to him until he heard of it from her. I shall have immediately to say that I consider that too flimsy and unsubstantial an explanation of what took place, but at present my desire is to point out that the way in which he met the pursuer's proposal, whatever it was, was by suggesting that they should go to the registrar and get married. Then the Lord Ordinary, this being a critical matter, put some questions to the defender upon it, and we therefore may be quite sure that, taking his answers to the questions of the Lord Ordinary along with his previous answers, which were given to his own counsel, this is his deliberate account of what took place. In answer to the Lord Ordinary he says,—“I asked the pursuer twice to go with me and be married before a registrar. I said that we should do so rather than sign these documents,” and a little further on he says,—“I was perfectly willing on the 8th of May 1889 to marry the pursuer outright if she would go before a registrar, but not unless she did so.” Accordingly, the difference which he represents to have existed between what the pursuer requested and what he was himself willing to do was as to the mode of constituting marriage,

No. 40. his counter proposal being that they should not enter into the occult and clandestine form of marriage suggested by the pursuer, but be, as he calls it, Nov. 26, 1891. "married outright" before the registrar. It is therefore proved that when these Imrie v. Imrie. documents were exchanged the defender was matrimonially inclined, and minded to instant marriage.

The counter theory advanced by the defender I have described as flimsy and unsubstantial. It is said that the pursuer had found out that the defender was "insured" in a burial society, and communicated this fact to him, and proposed that he should give her a writing professing to be a declaration of marriage in order to enable her to secure the insurance money. The defender says that he had not known of this insurance until he heard of it from the pursuer. I am bound to say, especially when the counter proposal of the defender that they should be married outright is borne in mind, that I am quite unable to accept the view that the proposal made by the pursuer, and so met by the defender, was not a proposal for marriage, but for a simulation of marriage, in order to achieve such an exceedingly small and shadowy result.

The facts with regard to the exchange of the writings are not matter of controversy. It is true that they were not signed in presence of the witnesses, also that they were signed by the witnesses ex post facto, and on a representation that they were not to attest any solemn act. The conclusion I draw from the fact that names of witnesses were added is, that the parties desired to give an appearance of importance and authenticity to the writings they were exchanging.

Again, when we look at the surrounding facts, I cannot say that I find anything which renders the exchange of documents, such as these bear to be, improbable, either having regard to the circumstances or the apparent character of the two parties. There is no doubt that the woman had good ground for desiring marriage, having yielded her person before that date. Whether the illicit connection began early in the history of the parties' acquaintance is not a conceded point; I have not made up my mind when it began; but both parties are agreed that it began before the exchange of documents, and the position of parties makes it not unlikely that the pursuer should make, and that the defender should accept, a proposal of marriage.

The sequel seems not so important to the case of the pursuer as to that of the defender. I could understand the defender producing proof of a series of facts shewing that the transaction had not been entered into for the purpose of marriage, and that the letter had not been treated seriously by the pursuer, but I have failed to discover such facts. The first pointed out for this purpose is the pursuer's relations with Hamley. These certainly put the pursuer in an unfavourable position, for either her letters or her evidence are untrue. My conjecture is that Hamley came to Scotland and carried on a flirtation with her, but I cannot say that that shakes in my mind the evidence as to the quality of the transaction of 8th May. It is said also that the pursuer's attempts to bring about abortion (of which there is some cogent though not conclusive evidence) were not the conduct of a woman who considered herself married. But we must bear in mind that, even assuming that the pursuer and the defender looked upon themselves as married people, her position was an ambiguous and in some ways a precarious one, and if in certain matters her conduct was not that of an exemplary wife, I do not think that that leads to a conclusion adverse to the import of the documents exchanged between the parties. It is said that the fact that the document given to the pursuer is not extant now, and the fact, which we are asked to accept, that it was torn up by her, bear strongly against it being looked on by her as the charter of her position as a married woman. Taking the defender's own account of the circumstances in which it was destroyed, I cannot say that it proves to my mind that the document was not given to the pursuer for the purpose of constituting a marriage, but in order to secure her right to the insurance money. The defender says,—“We quarrelled very bitterly at that time, and there had been a good deal of nagging on both sides. The feeling got worse and worse, and ultimately the pursuer flew out of my room into her own, and came back flourishing the document in my face. She then tore it in two, and said that that finished it for good and all.” What was it that was finished for good and all? Her claim for the insurance money? The other view appears to me much more likely that (however futile such a proceeding was) she tore in pieces in anger what was the symbol and proof of her marriage. As to whether the defender's account is the true explanation of the disappearance of the document or not is not very clear. There is, I think, much to be said for the Lord Ordinary's view, that the destruction of the document probably took place much later, and that the pursuer herself was not a party to it. Although this matter is not put sharply to Mrs and Miss Imrie, I cannot say that it is unlikely that, in the course of their rummaging the pursuer's box, the document may have gone amissing. It is said, however, that the pursuer damaged her case by not at once demanding the letter when she found she had lost it. But I am not at all sure that, in acting in the way that she did, it may not have been to the advantage of the position in which she ultimately stands, because the letters written by both Mr and Mrs Imrie shew keen hostility, and it may have been worldly wisdom on the pursuer's part not to mention that a document of such importance was, in her belief, in the hands of her enemies. Be that as it may, however, the fact does not seem to me to be of sufficient importance to affect the result of the case.

No. 40.

Nov. 26, 1891.

Imrie v. Imrie.

No doubt your Lordships have, like myself, scrutinised the case for the pursuer with vigilance and scepticism. It is our duty to prevent the decree of the Court going out on the words of such documents merely without submitting to a searching scrutiny the conduct of the parties. But having brought the keenest scrutiny I can to bear upon the case, I am unable to resist the conclusion at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived.

LORD ADAM.—The pursuer's case is rested entirely on the two documents set forth in cond. 3, and it is not disputed that, if the documents were delivered with the object of constituting a marriage between the parties, their terms are sufficient for that purpose. I, however, agree with what your Lordship said, and I think it is in accordance with the cases quoted to us, that it is not sufficient proof of the constitution of the marriage for the pursuer merely to present to the Court documents bearing to contain the consent de presenti of the parties to marriage. We are entitled to know the circumstances in which the documents were exchanged, how they were looked upon by the parties subsequently, and in fact the whole facts and circumstances bearing on the purpose with which they were exchanged.

The proof has now been led, and I do not know that we are to deal with the evidence on any other principle than is usual in other cases. We must say, taking the whole facts of the case into consideration, whether the documents in question were exchanged by the parties for the purpose of constituting a marriage.

No. 40.

Nov. 26, 1891. my own part I cannot say that I believe everything that the pursuer or defender
Imrie v. Imrie. says, but there are facts and circumstances which are of more weight than their evidence, and it is a consideration of these that has led the Lord Ordinary to the conclusion at which he has arrived.

With regard to the intention with which these documents were exchanged, and the relations of the parties prior to the 8th of May, as bearing on the question of intention, it does not seem to me to be improbable, whether the parties began to have connection with one another in December 1888 or May 1889, that they should have desired to regulate the manner in which they were living. They undoubtedly desired to avoid an open marriage, but still they may have desired to carry on their connection in a more moral way than previously. There is nothing improbable in this being the motive of the parties in desiring marriage.

It is important to look at the way in which parties acted towards one another after they had exchanged these documents, and what weighs most with me is the correspondence. When it is found that after 8th May 1889 the defender always wrote to the pursuer,—except in the case of one letter which I shall immediately notice,—as his wife, and signed himself as her husband, and continued doing so for a long period, and that the pursuer acted in a similar way, I think the inference to be drawn is that, when they exchanged the documents, they acted with the intention which the documents themselves expressed. No doubt Mr Younger has tried to rebut this inference by pointing out that in January 1889 the pursuer had given the defender a Christmas or New Year card addressed to her husband, and we are asked to say that this circumstance gives the key to the use of the terms husband and wife in the later correspondence between the parties. I am not prepared to accept that suggestion as rebutting the inference to be drawn from the manner in which the parties corresponded with one another after the exchange of the documents. Then again Mr Younger tries to weaken the inference to be derived from the correspondence, by pointing out that the parties in one instance dropped the style of correspondence which they had assumed, and reverted to the use of their own names, though still writing in very affectionate terms. That is some slight indication that the parties did not look upon themselves as married people, but it is not enough, in my opinion, to destroy the inference to be derived from the whole correspondence, and the legal conclusion to be drawn from it is, I think, that the parties looked upon each other as husband and wife.

Another fact bearing in the same direction is that the pursuer had a marriage ring given her by the defender. No doubt the defender himself had not enough money to buy the ring, and borrowed money from the pursuer for that purpose, but that seems to me to make the fact bear rather more strongly in favour of the view that the parties looked upon each other as husband and wife, because, what the pursuer wanted was not that the defender should buy her a ring, but that she should have a marriage ring, and she was willing to provide the necessary funds.

Then again the mere fact that the pursuer on some occasions said that the defender was her husband may not have great weight unless it is consistent with the other facts in the case, but it must be kept in mind that she made these statements in the defender's presence, and that he did not repudiate them.

All these things being taken into consideration, I think it is proved as matter of fact that after the 8th of May the parties acted towards one another upon the footing that the documents had been interchanged by them for the purpose of constituting a marriage. I do not, therefore, see why they should not receive their natural effect. If the conduct of the parties had been inconsistent with the idea that they had exchanged these documents for the purpose of constituting a marriage, then, on the authority of Lockyer v. Sinclair and the other cases quoted to us, I would have held that they could not receive effect. No. 40.

Nov. 26, 1891.
Imrie v. Imrie.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

A. LAURIE KENNAWAY, W.S.—A. STEWART GRAY, W.S.—Agents.

REVEREND GEORGE S. SMITH AND OTHERS (Kirk-Session of Prestonpans), No. 41.

Petitioners.—Sol.-Gen. Murray—N. J. D. Kennedy.

SCHOOL BOARD OF PRESTONPANS (Respondents).—Dickson—

C. K. Mackenzie.

Nov. 28, 1891.
Kirk-Session
of Preston-
pans v. School
Board of Pres-
tonpans.

Trust—Charity—Administration—Nobile officium—Church.—Certain funds—the proceeds of a sale of work, contributed by the ladies of a parish church for the purpose of providing an infant school in room of one then discontinued owing to the Disruption—were afterwards held in trust by the kirk-session, and not being sufficient for the intended purpose, part of the revenue was applied in clothing and paying the school fees of the young children of poor deserving persons. The fund having increased, and having been claimed by the school board, who proposed to devote it to educational purposes, a petition was presented to the Court by the kirk-session for authority to apply it towards the erection of a hall to be used as a Sunday school and for congregational purposes in connection with the parish church. The Court, after a remit, rejected a scheme for paying the annual revenue to the school board, to be applied in increasing the efficiency of the teaching staff, on the ground that such an application of the fund would virtually be in relief of the education rates, and approved of the scheme of the petitioners as being more nearly in accordance with the original purpose for which the fund was established.

IN September 1845, Lady Harriet Grant Suttie, of Prestongrange, 1st Division, aided by other ladies, also members of the congregation of the Parish Church of Prestonpans, held a sale of work to raise funds to provide an infant school in room of one then recently discontinued owing to the secession of a part of the congregation in 1843, which had prior to that date been maintained by the kirk-session in premises held on lease. The net proceeds of the sale amounted only to £96, 15s. 2d. As this sum was too small to build or maintain the school desired, it was handed over to the Rev. John Struthers, LL.D., then minister of the parish, in order that it might be held and accumulated, and it remained in his trust, on deposit-receipt in his name, as minister of the parish, until September 1865. In February 1865, the fund had increased to £162, 13s. 8d., by accumulation of interest. Sir George Grant Suttie, the husband of Lady Harriet, then addressed the following letter to Dr Struthers:—"Dear Sir,— ... The object of the contributors being to support an infant school, and there being now three female teachers for young children in the parish, it appears to me that the object of the contributors will now be best attained by applying the proceeds of the fund annually to pay the school fees, or otherwise assist the young children of poor but deserving persons, and I will be well pleased to hear that you and your kirk-session will undertake this duty." The Kirk-session ultimately accepted the trust and made such payments as they considered judicious out of revenue towards the fees or clothing of the young children of poor deserving per-

No. 41.

Nov. 28, 1891.
Kirk-Session
of Preston-
pans v. School
Board of Pres-
tonpans.

sons. In 1891 the revenue had come to exceed what was required for that purpose, and by judicious investment the fund had grown to about £475. The School Board of Prestonpans having demanded that the Kirk-session should pay over the fund to them, the Kirk-session presented an application to the Court in which they asked the Court "to authorise the petitioners to apply the said fund towards the erection of Sunday school premises in connection with the church of the parish of Prestonpans; or to settle a scheme for the application of the said fund, and appoint the petitioners to hold and administer the same, under said scheme."

They stated;—" (7) The said fund has never had any connection with the parish school, or the income of any teachers thereof, or the promotion in such school of any branch of education. It was originally raised by members of the congregation of the parish church for purposes distinct from any connection with the parish school, viz., the benefit of young children, particularly of the poorer class, and has always been so applied. The particular mode originally contemplated, of benefiting that class by the erection of an infant school, was never carried out, and was abandoned in 1865, on account of that need being sufficiently provided for otherwise. Since 1873 an infant school has been established and maintained in the parish under the provisions of the Education Act of 1872. Further, education is now free in all the branches usually taught to young children. (8) The petitioners consider that in these altered circumstances said fund may most usefully and in accordance with the general object intended by the original contributors be applied towards building Sunday school premises in connection with the parish church. The number of children in attendance at the Sunday school is large, and the want of accommodation is seriously felt by the petitioners. The petitioners could readily secure a suitable site for the erection of Sunday school premises, and are prepared, if the fund should not be sufficient to meet the whole cost, to raise the balance themselves."

The School Board lodged answers in which they asked that the fund should be transferred to them as the educational authority of the parish: that it should be expended in paying off a debt upon the school premises, and in securing a more efficient staff in the infant department of the school.

On 20th June 1891 the Court made a remit to Mr George Gillespie, advocate, "to prepare a scheme for the administration and disposal of the fund in the hands of the petitioners, as nearly as may be in accordance with the original purpose for which the fund was established."

Mr Gillespie, after hearing all parties interested, prepared the following scheme, which he reported to the Court,—"(1) The fund referred to . . . shall continue to be held by the minister of the said parish in all time coming as trustee, under the provisions and with the powers of the Trust Acts, 1861 to 1891, the annual interest of the fund to be applied by him, after payment of any necessary expenses, as hereinafter provided. (2) The minister shall pay annually, at the close of the school financial year, the whole interest as aforesaid to the clerk of the School Board of Prestonpans, to be applied by the said board in increasing the efficiency of the teaching staff, either in respect of number, or of the training and attainments of one or more of the teachers, above what shall be at the time required of the said board by the provisions of the Education Code for Scotland. The minister shall only make payment as aforesaid on the production of a certificate from the Scotch Education Department, or from Her Majesty's inspector of schools for the district, that the condition above specified has been complied with. (3) Failing the production of such a certificate in any year, the minister shall apply the interest falling due that year in supplying clothing to poor children attending the infant department or the lower standards in any public or State-aided school in Prestonpans." *

No. 41.

Nov. 28, 1891.
Kirk-Session
of Preston-
pans v. School
Board of Pres-
tonpans.

* Mr Gillespie stated in his report :—" Various suggestions were made to me for the application of the money. The minister and Lady Susan Grant Suttie, who in a sense represents Lady Harriet Suttie, the principal founder of the charity, pressed strongly that the scheme suggested in the petition, viz, the erection of Sunday school premises in connection with the parish church, should be sanctioned. They explained that their plan was to build a church hall, to be used for Sunday school purposes, for other congregational purposes, and for a library, if funds could be raised to establish and carry it on. The building for these purposes would cost at least £1000, but the petitioners offered to undertake to raise the balance. At present the Sunday school is held in the church, which is not convenient for the purpose. They pleaded that this was a church fund, and that in devoting it to the purposes of a Sunday school they would not be deviating from the original purpose for which the fund was established, since education in an infant school, at the time when the fund was established, would not go much beyond instruction in the Bible and catechism. I report these contentions for the consideration of your Lordships; but I have to report that in my opinion this proposal is not sufficiently close to the original purpose to warrant your Lordships in sanctioning it, at least in the face of the other proposals which are made. The fund, as I take it, was established for general educational purposes, and for behoof of the whole parish, and its administration, so far as it has gone, has been on these lines. There is no trace of a limitation to Sunday school purposes, and I think that the suggestion that infant education forty years ago was limited to religious instruction is fanciful. It is said that the fact of the fund being left with the minister is proof that it was not intended for secular education. I do not assent to this; the minister had at that time a great deal to do with educational matters, and his own actions refute this assertion. The grants of clothing that have been made from time to time in accordance with Sir George Grant Suttie's directions have been made to enable children to attend the ordinary schools in the parish. To build or assist in building a hall for congregational purposes would be a departure from the original purposes, as I think, in two respects. It would not serve educational purposes, and instead of benefiting the parish generally, it would be confined mainly, if not altogether, to members of one congregation.

"The second suggestion made by the petitioners to me, which does not appear in the petition, is that the minister should be directed to apply the interest of the fund in supplying the younger children of widows or poor families with clothing, to enable them to attend school with regularity in winter weather. This is an excellent suggestion, and it is recommended by the consideration that in the parish of Prestonpans, where there are many fishermen and many colliers, cases frequently occur where widows are left in very poor circumstances with families to feed and clothe. But there is provision already in the parish for this purpose. The governors of Schaw's Bequest have power to apply part of their revenue for this purpose, and have done so, but have never yet spent on this purpose the full sum they are entitled to spend on it. . . .

"The School Board, i.e. the majority of the School Board, suggest that the money should be spent in paying off pro tanto debt incurred by them in improving and extending their school premises. These extensions and improvements were incurred particularly with a view to obtaining better accommodation for the infant department, which is taught as a separate department. They plead that the money, if spent in this way, would be applied to the exact purpose contemplated by those who contributed it, for it would go to supply an infant school. The Board borrowed a sum of £800 to pay for the extensions I have spoken of, and they complain of the burden of the rates, the school rate being at present 7d. per pound, which must immediately be increased to 9d. in consequence of this outlay.

"I rather think, however, that it may be taken that the object which the

No. 41.

Nov. 28, 1891.
Kirk-Session
of Preston-
pans v. School
Board of Pres-
tonpans.

Prior to the consideration of the report by the Court, Lady Susan Grant Suttie lodged a minute, in which she stated, inter alia, that, as the representative of Lady Harriet, she desired that the fund should be devoted to the object suggested in the petition,—the erection of a hall in connection with the parish church,—to which could be added a library, both religious and secular, for the benefit of the children.

contributors had in view, and the object which your Lordships will be disposed to sanction, must be one that will provide for the younger children in the parish some advantage which is not otherwise within their reach. The Board are bound to provide adequate school accommodation, and they have done no more. This fund would, therefore, in a sense be thrown away if it was applied to relieve the ratepayers of the obligation which the law puts on them.

"The last suggestion which is made, and it too comes from the majority of the School Board, is that the fund should be applied to secure a more efficient staff in the infant department than is at present maintained there. At present they employ a headmistress at £65, and three pupil teachers at £20, £17, 10s., and £12, 10s. a-year respectively, for an average attendance of 166 children. They say that for a salary of £30 to £35 they could secure, in place of the pupil teacher at £20, an ex-pupil teacher,—i.e., a teacher who has had full training as a pupil teacher,—and that this would much strengthen the infant department. They are under no obligation, according to the educational code, to do more than they are doing. I think that this suggestion is one of which the Court may approve, as being good in itself and closely akin to the original purposes for which the fund was collected. I have drawn up a short scheme to give effect to it, using general terms, so as to give the School Board some latitude of action in the event of any change of circumstances.

"It should be in the knowledge of your Lordships . . . that the parish of Prestonpans is exceptionally well provided with educational funds, devoted to higher branches of education, from Schaw's and Stiell's foundations. Part of these foundations is restricted to Prestonpans, and Prestonpans children are eligible to compete for the whole of them. Under the provisions of the 85th section of the Local Government Act of 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. c. 50), the sums available for general educational purposes in the parish will be increased, since till recently the endowments have been to some extent used in payment of fees. No arrangement has as yet, however, been sanctioned by the Education Department for the permanent application of the funds set free, in consequence of the abolition of fees.

"One point remains for consideration. The School Board claim that the fund should be transferred to them as the educational authority of the parish. This contention comes to this, that the minister has no title to hold and administer the fund, and never had such a title, but merely held the fund as a treasurer or banker bound to pay it over to the proper owner, beneficiary, or trustee when he should appear. I cannot take that view. I think, looking to what is known of the history of the fund and the actings of the parties, that the minister holds this fund as a trustee for educational purposes. The Court can, to a certain extent, substitute kindred purposes for original trust purposes, and it can supply new machinery for trusts where the old has become unworkable or unsuitable to the times. But I humbly think the Court has no power to transfer the title to trust property from one individual to another, or from one public body to another, to substitute, e.g., school boards for kirk-sessions or town-councils in the administration of educational funds. That is a matter for legislation.

"Even if the Court had the power, I venture to think that it would not be desirable to transfer the fund if your Lordships should approve of the scheme have suggested. It is well to have some guarantee for the performance of the duty which the scheme lays on the board, and some summary method of keeping the board alive to its duty.

"I think the minister, and not the session, should be recognised as the trustee of the fund. That seems to me to be the true position of matters at present."

No. 41.

Argued for the petitioners;—The scheme to be approved by the Court must as nearly as possible, considering the requirements of the time, consist with the original intention with which the fund had been established.¹ Indeed, the interlocutor making the remit quite supported this view. But the scheme proposed by the reporter in the present case perverted the original objects of the founders. It deprived the minister and kirk-session of the control of the fund, and gave the spending of it to the School Board, who were not the proper recipients of a charitable bequest. The extra salary which it was proposed to give to the teaching staff ought to be met out of the rates. The scheme proposed by the petitioners of erecting Sunday school premises was much nearer the original intention of the contributors to the fund.

Nov. 28, 1891.
Kirk-Session
of Preston-
pans v. School
Board of Pres-
tonpans.

Argued for the respondents;—The School Board had power under the 47th section of the Education Act, 1872, to administer a bequest of this kind. There was no limitation of the fund to religious purposes originally, only to educational purposes, and all persons in the parish were interested. The proposal of the Kirk-session involved the application of the money to a church purpose of a denominational character. It might be that the petitioners were entitled to have the administration of the fund, but the purposes to which it should be applied ought to be general educational purposes.² The scheme suggested by the reporter ought to be approved.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The remit made to Mr Gillespie by the interlocutor of 20th June last was “to prepare a scheme for the administration and disposal of the fund as nearly as may be in accordance with the original purpose for which the fund was established.” It appears to me that that interlocutor lays down very clearly the law which we have now to administer, and that our duty is to decide in favour of that scheme which is most nearly in accordance with the original purpose for which the fund was established.

What that original purpose was there is fortunately no room for doubt.

The history of the case is briefly but adequately given in the second head of the petitioners’ statement. Thence I gather the following facts. Prior to the Disruption an infant school was maintained by the kirk-session of the parish. One of the effects of the Disruption was to bring that arrangement to an end; and accordingly in 1845, there being a surcease of this school, a sale of work was held with the view of raising funds “to provide an infant school in room of one then recently discontinued, and which had prior to that date been maintained by the kirk-session.” The movement was carried out by the members of the congregation of the parish church of Prestonpans; and, when the bazaar had been held, the money thereby raised was handed over to the minister of the parish. The essential and vital feature of the fund is that it takes origin in the desire of the members of the parish church to provide an infant school for the Established Church. That was “the original purpose for which the fund was established.” It was afterwards found that the fund which had been collected was insufficient to provide a school. It was accordingly handed to the minister of the parish, with whom it was left to accumulate until 1865, when a provisional arrangement was proposed by the promoters of the school scheme, and came into operation, because of the temporary failure of the original plan owing to the insufficiency of the money. The provisional arrangement is instructive, ¹ Burnet’s Trustees, Nov. 17, 1876, 4 R. 127; Tudor on Charities, 136 and 146; Burnett v. St Andrew’s Church, Brechin, June 12, 1888, 15 R. 723.

² McDougall, June 29, 1878, 5 R. 1014.

No. 41. as shewing what the object of the promoters was. We find it described in a letter from Sir George Grant Suttie to Dr Struthers in that year, in which he says,—“The object of the contribution being to support an infant school, and there being now three female teachers for young children in the parish, it appears to me that the object of the contributors will now be best attained by applying the proceeds of the fund annually to pay the school fees, or otherwise assist the young children of poor but deserving persons,” and it is important to notice that he adds in conclusion that he will be well pleased to hear “that you and your kirk-session will undertake this duty.”

Nov. 28, 1891.
Kirk-Session
of Preston-
pans v. School
Board of Pres-
tonpans.

Another stage has now been reached which has led to the present application being made. The fund has accumulated, and accordingly the original purpose is now, so far as money is concerned, free to take shape. But, on the other hand, there has arisen a board school, and free education has now been established in the parish. Accordingly we have to deal with an altered condition of things, and to consider which scheme most nearly reproduces the original purpose, with the necessary modifications which those changes necessitate.

The proposals of the School Board seem to me to lose sight of nearly every one of the essential features of the purposes for which the fund was established. Indeed, I might say of every one, were it not that Mr Dickson says that his clients are willing to give special attention to the wants of the infant department, by securing for it a more efficient teaching staff. But that is only one out of several features of the original purpose, and I cannot think that it is coming at all near to the original purpose to do what the ratepayers themselves can do, viz., to increase the efficiency of the teaching staff. That is a matter which lies within the ambit of the duties of the School Board. To say that “they are under no obligation, according to the educational code, to do more than they are doing,” is a very partial statement of their position. The code merely states the minimum which the Scotch Education Department require before a school is allowed to share in the grant of imperial money; but it, of course, does not limit the powers of the Board in dealing with local rates, if they and their constituents should desire such increased efficiency.

I have said that I do not think that the original purpose of the fund is kept sufficiently in view in the scheme of the School Board. No doubt, Mr Gillespie in his report proposes that the minister of the parish shall formally hold the fund, and that he shall accordingly have a title and interest to see that the School Board is doing its duty with the money which he pays over to them. But that appears to me to be a shadowy substitute for the administration and control of the fund by the minister and kirk-session, which we see was designed for them by the founders of this fund. And the substance of the School Board's proposal is that this fund shall be applied in supplement of, or rather, I might say, pro tanto in substitute for, the rates. I think this quite inadmissible.

Another scheme suggested, but only suggested, is that the income might be applied in supplying clothing to poor children attending the infant department. I think that might have been a very desirable object had it not been for the fact that the reporter and the School Board are clear that it is already sufficiently met by Schaw's Endowment, part of the revenue of which may be applied to that purpose. Accordingly, I think we may leave it out of view.

It appears to me that the proposal of the Kirk-session most adequately meets the original purpose of the fund; and although latterly a somewhat critical attention seems to have been directed towards the objects upon which the fund is to be bestowed, no scheme has been suggested in competition except these which I have already been compelled to reject. The proposal of the Kirk-session appears to me to be generally in conformity with the original purpose of the fund. They propose, as did the founders, to build a school; it is to be an infant school, as was the founders' intention; it is to be in connection with the parish church, and managed by the kirk-session, which was an essential element of the founders' wishes; and they desire that there shall be no further limitation upon the admission of all children in the parish. The only variance in the scheme from the original purpose is, that it will be only education of a certain kind which will be given, and that upon Sunday; but, on the other hand, this variance is due simply to the supervening changes which have taken away the need for what is omitted. Nor is it to be left out of view that when the fund was originally started in 1845, Bible education must have bulked very largely in the mind of the founders, and, accordingly, comparing the present scheme with that of 1845, I cannot say that it differs from it except in degree. I have thus indicated that I do not regard the proposal of the Kirk-session as completely meeting the original purpose of the founders; but my judgment is in favour of that proposal, because, to revert to the words of your Lordships' interlocutor, it is, of those submitted to us, the one most "nearly in accordance with the original purpose for which the fund was established."

If your Lordships take the same view, I think our course will be to remit the matter again to Mr Gillespie to prepare a scheme upon the lines which I have indicated.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"

Find that of the schemes suggested for the application of the fund in question, the proposal that it should be applied towards the building of a church hall to be used for Sunday school purposes as well as for congregational purposes and a library, is most nearly in accordance with the original purposes for which the fund was established; and therefore authorise the petitioners to apply the said fund accordingly; and remit to Mr Gillespie to adjust the details of a scheme in accordance therewith, regard being had to the undertaking of the petitioners to raise the balance of the money required for the building of the hall, and of the other terms of said proposal, and decern."

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—MELVILLE & LINDSAY, W.S.—Agents.

DUFF & COMPANY, Pursuers (Respondents).—Comrie Thomson—M'Lennan.

No. 42.

THE IRON AND STEEL FENCING AND BUILDINGS COMPANY, Defenders
(Reclaimers).—Ure—J. Clark.

Dec. 1, 1891.
Duff & Co. v.
Iron and Steel
Fencing and
Buildings Co.

Reparation—Breach of contract—Damages—Loss of Profits.—A manufacturing company in this country entered into a contract for the sale of iron huts of a peculiar construction, for which they held patents, to a firm of merchants in South Africa, with a view to the huts being resold there by the merchants. The earlier consignment of huts sent in pursuance of this contract was sold by the merchants at a profit, but subsequent consignments were rejected by them as being disconform to contract.

In an action by the merchants against the manufacturers for damages, it was

No. 42.

Dec. 1, 1891.
Duff & Co. v.
Iron and Steel
Fencing and
Buildings Co.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

proved that the pursuers were justified in their rejection of the huts. The Court, in assessing the damages due by the defenders for their breach of contract, held that the pursuers were entitled to payment of a reasonable allowance for loss of profits, the ordinary rule whereby damage is assessed at the difference between the contract price and the market price when the breach of contract is ascertained being, in the circumstances, inapplicable.

IN the year 1889 the Iron and Steel Fencing and Buildings Company, Limited, Glasgow, who held certain patents for the construction of iron and steel buildings, which could be erected without the use of bolts or rivets, entered into a contract for sale to Duff & Company, merchants, Cape Town, of a portable iron hut of a particular make, to be called the "Pioneer" hut.

Under the contract Duff & Company were to buy the huts from the Buildings Company, and make what profit they could by reselling them in South Africa, and it was further agreed that Duff & Company should have a monopoly of the sale of the "Pioneer" hut in South Africa, as long as they ordered ten huts per fortnight.

In pursuance of the contract fifty-eight huts were shipped by the Buildings Company to Duff & Company in the months of August and September 1889, in three separate consignments, and these were sold or disposed of by Duff & Company in South Africa. Five further consignments, containing 112 huts in all, were sent in the months of October and November. Of these four huts were resold, and the remaining 108 were, after some correspondence between the parties, rejected by Duff & Company on 27th February 1890, as being disconform to contract.

In June 1890 this action was raised by Duff & Company, against the Iron and Steel Fencing and Buildings Company. The pursuers concluded for payment (1) of £1783, 16s. 2d., being the price paid by them to the defenders for the rejected huts, together with interest thereon, and certain expenditure which they alleged had been made by them in connection with the huts; and (2) of £1000 in name of damages.

They pleaded;—(2) The defenders having, in breach of the express representations and warranties condescended on, and also in breach of their implied warranty as manufacturers of and dealers in the articles ordered from them by the pursuers, supplied to the pursuers as purchasing agents, and for the express purpose of resale to others, articles disconform to contract and unmerchantable in quality and condition, the pursuers are entitled to reject the said articles, and to be repaid the price thereof and other disbursements, as condescended on. (3) The pursuer having suffered loss and damage in consequence of the defenders' breach of the special contract entered into with them as condescended on and entitled to reparation therefor in terms of the second conclusion of the summons.

A proof was allowed. The result of the evidence was to satisfy the Court that the rejected huts were defectively constructed, and were injured by insufficient packing, so as to be disconform to contract, and that the pursuers were entitled to reject them.

With regard to the amount for which the pursuers were entitled to decree under the first conclusion of the summons, it appeared that the amount actually paid by them to the defenders as the price of the rejected huts was £1368, 18s. 6d., and that the interest on that sum amounted to £38, 5s. 11d., being a total of £1407, 4s. 5d. With reference to the remaining heads of claim under the first conclusion of the summons, it appeared that the pursuers had incurred (1) expense amounting to £111, 9s. 1d. in connection with the rejected huts for delivery at storage, and other outlays of the kind; and (2) that a sum of £215, 2s. 8 had been spent by them in advertising the "Pioneer" hut, and pushing its sale, and in other expenditure of a like nature. No. 42.

With regard to the claim of damages for loss of profits, it appeared that the cost of each hut to the pursuers at Cape Town or Port Elizabeth was £21, 11s. 7d., and that of the huts contained in the first three consignments forty had been sold to a Mr Ross, for resale in Johannesburg, at a profit of £7, 2s. 6d. per hut, and six to other persons at a profit of £11, 10s. per hut. As to the prospect of these profits continuing, there was evidence to the effect that trade in South Africa was depressed at the time the rejected huts would have been put on the market, and several witnesses deponed that the huts had proved uncomfortably hot for the climate of South Africa. Mr Duff also admitted that money for articles sold "up country" was often difficult of collection, and that in fixing the price of the huts he had calculated on bad debts.

Dec. 1, 1891.
Duff & Co. v.
Iron and Steel
Fencing and
Buildings Co.

On 10th January 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the pursuers' second and third pleas in law: Repels the defences, and decerns against the defenders, under the first conclusion of the summons, for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £1518, 13s. 6d. sterling, with interest on the sum of £1480, 7s. 2d. thereof, as concluded for; and under the second conclusion thereof, for payment of the sum of £500, with interest on the said sum of £500, at the rate of five per cent per annum, from the date hereof till payment," &c.*

* "OPINION.—(After coming to the conclusion on the evidence that the defenders had committed a breach of contract entitling the pursuers to reject the huts and intimating that decree would be given for £1407, 4s. 5d., being the price of the huts paid for and rejected, together with £38, 5s. 11d. of interest on that price, his Lordship continued)—The remainder of the sum first concluded for consists of the sum of £326, 11s. 9d., as detailed in Nos. 11 and 12 of process. A considerable number of the items there set forth consist of advertising the 'Pioneer' hut, of journeys made for the purpose of getting orders, and expenditure of a like nature, which was undertaken in view of the business which Mr Duff hoped to establish, and the whole of which cannot be charged as expenditure made in connection with the rejected huts alone. It is impossible to split up such expenditure, and say how much is applicable to the rejected huts, and how much must be held to be recouped by the profits made upon the huts actually sold. I have therefore struck out all such items from Nos. 11 and 12 of process, and that reduces the sum of £326, 11s. 9d. to £111, 9s. 1d., which I hold to be the sum actually expended in connection with the rejected huts, and which, when added to the sum of £1407, 4s. 5d., already brought out, gives a sum of £1518, 13s. 6d., for which I shall give decree, under the first conclusion of the summons.

"In regard to the conclusion for damages, I am of opinion that the pursuers are entitled to an allowance for such expenses as advertising and travelling, which, although, for the reasons stated, I have not allowed under the first conclusion, were incurred in view of the contract being fulfilled, and have in part been rendered unremunerative by the breach of the contract. Further, the pursuers are entitled to something in respect of the time expended by themselves and their workmen upon the rejected huts.

"The pursuers, however, further claim damages for loss of the profit which they would have made if the contract had been fulfilled, and this raises a question of some difficulty.

"The ordinary rule in the case of a breach of contract to deliver goods which may be obtained in the market is, that the damage consists of the difference between the contract price and the price at which the buyer has or might have supplied himself in the market—the time at which the market price is to be ascertained varying according to circumstances. In the present case it is impossible to have recourse to any such test, because there was no market in which

No. 42.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The pursuers were not entitled to reject the huts. (2) The Lord Ordinary was wrong in allow-

Dec. 1, 1891.

Duff & Co. v.
Iron and Steel
Fencing and
Buildings Co.

the huts could be purchased, as the defenders alone made them, and the peculiar method of construction was protected by patents.

“In such a case, the general rule in England (which has also, I think, been recognised in this country) is, that the damages should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either to arise naturally (i.e., according to the usual course of things) from the breach of contract, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time when they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it—(Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exchequer, 341). That rule seems to me to allow of a reasonable sum being given for loss of profit in the present case. The defenders knew that the huts could not be obtained elsewhere; that the pursuers purchased them with a view of reselling them at a profit in Africa; and, therefore, both parties must have contemplated that a loss of these profits would result from a breach of the contract. This view is, I think, consistent with authority both in England and Scotland. In the English case of Grébert-Borgnis v. Nugent, L. R., 15 Q. B. D., p. 85, the plaintiff contracted with the defendants to supply them with skins of a certain shape and description, which he could not obtain in the open market. The defendants knew that the plaintiff had made, or was making, a contract to supply skins to a French customer, substantially the same as those which he ordered from them. On a breach of the contract, the defendants were held bound to pay to the plaintiff not only the profit which he would have made upon the French contract, but also the damages which had been awarded against him in the French Courts for breach of his contract in that country. In the case of Borries v. Hutcheson, 18 C. B. (N.S.), p. 445, loss of profits was in somewhat similar circumstances awarded.

“Turning to the Scotch authorities, the case of Watt v. Mitchell, 1 D., p. 1157, also seems to me to support the view which I have indicated. In that case the contract was to ship hemp in Russia for Scotland on a certain day and at a certain price. The contract was broken, and about a year and a-half thereafter the purchaser raised an action for implement of the contract and for damages, and the question ultimately came to be as to the principle upon which damages fell to be assessed. The price of hemp in the home market rose continuously for some years after the date of the contract. The defenders tendered the difference between the contract price and that at the time when delivery should have been given, while the pursuer contended that he was entitled to the difference between the contract price and the highest price which hemp attained between the date of the breach of contract and the verdict finding that the contract had been broken, which was not obtained until three years afterwards. The Court rejected both of these extremes, and fixed the damage at the difference between the contract price and the price eight months after the time when delivery ought to have been made. Now, what the Court truly did in that case was to allow a reasonable sum for the profit which the purchaser would have made if he had received the hemp and sold it in the ordinary course of trade. Lord Medwyn, who gave the leading opinion of the Court, considered the question whether there is any principle ‘in our law for claiming as damage the profit which might have been made by a sale of the article in a rising market’; and, after referring to Lord Stair’s dictum, and to the Roman law, he says,—‘Now, this does seem to indicate that in estimating damage we are entitled to look at the use the one party intended to make of it’ (the article sold), ‘and which the other might presume was intended. It is upon this principle that the seller is only bound to repair the loss which relates to the thing itself, and which results directly from it—not consequential damage. . . . And if the article were purchased by a dealer in it, with a view to be resold for profit, and this was in the contemplation of both parties, I am unable to see how that can be laid out of view in estimating the loss sustained by non-delivery.’

“The judgment in Watt v. Mitchell was referred to in the House of Lords in Dunlop v. Higgins (6 Bell’s App., p. 193), as settling the law of Scotland on

ing damages for loss of profits. What he had done was equivalent to giving the pursuers the profits without the risk of speculation. The rule for the assessment of damages for loss of profits resulting from breach of contract was that only such damage should be allowed as might reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time the contract was made, as the probable result of the breach of it.¹ The cases subsequent to Hadley v. Baxendale established that a buyer was not entitled to an allowance for loss of profits, unless he either tabled a subcontract for resale of the goods at a profit, and proved that this subcontract had been known to the sellers,² or to an allowance for loss of market, unless the goods had been specially ordered for sale at a particular season or market.³ The Court was not entitled to assume that the goods would have been resold at a profit. They were practically new to the market, and the evidence shewed that the huts had been found unsuited to the climate of South Africa, and that trade in that country was much depressed when the rejected huts would have been put on the market. The present case was on this ground distinguishable from the case of Watt v. Mitchell & Company,⁴ where the subject of contract was a well-known commodity, namely, hemp. Assuming that the pursuers were entitled to an allowance for loss of profits, they could not receive interest as well. Further, the Lord Ordinary was wrong in allowing £150 for expense incurred in pushing the sale of the huts. The pursuers had already received under the first conclusion all that they were entitled to for expenses incurred in connection with the rejected huts.

No. 42.

Dec. 1, 1891.
Duff & Co. v.
Iron and Steel
Fencing and
Buildings Co.

the point, and I am not aware that the authority of the judgment has ever been impugned.

"I am therefore of opinion that the pursuers are entitled to a reasonable sum for the loss of profits which they would have made, and, indeed, I see no other way in which the loss which they have sustained through the breach of contract can be estimated.

"The amount which should be awarded for loss of profits is a jury question, which must be determined upon consideration of the whole circumstances of the case. Now, I find that of the huts in the earlier consignments which were disposed of, forty were sold to Mr Ross, at a profit of £7, 2s. 6d., and six were sold in Cape Town, at a profit of £11, 10s. These, however, were first put upon the market, and the purchase of them must be looked upon as to some extent an experiment; and if the huts had turned out not to be so suitable for the purpose for which they were required as expected, the price of these first sold would not have been maintained. And one of the pursuers' own witnesses says that the huts were found to be intolerably hot. Further, Mr Duff says that money for articles sold 'up country' is often difficult of collection, and that in fixing the price of the huts he calculated upon bad debts. But bad debts would reduce the average profit. It is also admitted that about the time when the rejected huts would have been put upon the market, trade and enterprise in South Africa had become somewhat depressed. Taking all these matters into consideration, I have come to the conclusion that a fair sum for loss of profits is £350 0 0

"And I allow in respect of the other items of damage to which

I have referred 150 0 0

"Making the total sum for which I shall give decree under the second conclusion of the summons £500 0 0"

¹ Hadley v. Baxendale, 1854, 9 Exch. 341.

² Thol v. Henderson, 1881, L. R., 8 Q. B. D. 457; Grébert-Borgnis v. Nugent, 1885, L. R., 15 Q. B. D. 85; Hammond v. Bussey, 1887, L. R., 20 Q. B. D. 79.

³ The "Parana," 1877, L. R., 2 Prob. Div. 118; The "Argentino," 1888, L. R., 13 Prob. Div. 61.

⁴ Watt v. Mitchell & Co., July 4, 1839, 1 D. 1157.

No. 42.

Dec. 1, 1891.
Duff & Co. v.
Iron and Steel
Fencing and
Buildings Co.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The pursuers were not entitled to reject the huts. (2) The Lord Ordinary was wrong in allow-the huts could be purchased, as the defenders alone made them, and the peculiar method of construction was protected by patents.

"In such a case, the general rule in England (which has also, I think, been recognised in this country) is, that the damages should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either to arise naturally (i.e., according to the usual course of things) from the breach of contract, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time when they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it—(Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exchequer, 341). That rule seems to me to allow of a reasonable sum being given for loss of profit in the present case. The defenders knew that the huts could not be obtained elsewhere; that the pursuers purchased them with a view of reselling them at a profit in Africa; and, therefore, both parties must have contemplated that a loss of these profits would result from a breach of the contract. This view is, I think, consistent with authority both in England and Scotland. In the English case of Grébert-Borgnis v. Nugent, L. R., 15 Q. B. D., p. 85, the plaintiff contracted with the defendants to supply them with skins of a certain shape and description, which he could not obtain in the open market. The defendants knew that the plaintiff had made, or was making, a contract to supply skins to a French customer, substantially the same as those which he ordered from them. On a breach of the contract, the defendants were held bound to pay to the plaintiff not only the profit which he would have made upon the French contract, but also the damages which had been awarded against him in the French Courts for breach of his contract in that country. In the case of Borries v. Hutcheson, 18 C. B. (N.S.), p. 445, loss of profits was in somewhat similar circumstances awarded.

"Turning to the Scotch authorities, the case of Watt v. Mitchell, 1 D., p. 1157, also seems to me to support the view which I have indicated. In that case the contract was to ship hemp in Russia for Scotland on a certain day and at a certain price. The contract was broken, and about a year and a-half thereafter the purchaser raised an action for implement of the contract and for damages, and the question ultimately came to be as to the principle upon which damages fell to be assessed. The price of hemp in the home market rose continuously for some years after the date of the contract. The defenders tendered the difference between the contract price and that at the time when delivery should have been given, while the pursuer contended that he was entitled to the difference between the contract price and the highest price which hemp attained between the date of the breach of contract and the verdict finding that the contract had been broken, which was not obtained until three years afterwards. The Court rejected both of these extremes, and fixed the damage at the difference between the contract price and the price eight months after the time when delivery ought to have been made. Now, what the Court truly did in that case was to allow a reasonable sum for the profit which the purchaser would have made if he had received the hemp and sold it in the ordinary course of trade. Lord Medwyn, who gave the leading opinion of the Court, considered the question whether there is any principle 'in our law for claiming as damage the profit which might have been made by a sale of the article in a rising market'; and, after referring to Lord Stair's dictum, and to the Roman law, he says,—'Now, this does seem to indicate that in estimating damage we are entitled to look at the use the one party intended to make of it' (the article sold), 'and which the other might presume was intended. It is upon this principle that the seller is only bound to repair the loss which relates to the thing itself, and which results directly from it—not consequential damage. . . . And if the article were purchased by a dealer in it, with a view to be resold for profit, and this was in the contemplation of both parties, I am unable to see how that can be laid out of view in estimating the loss sustained by non-delivery.'

"The judgment in Watt v. Mitchell was referred to in the House of Lords in Dunlop v. Higgins (6 Bell's App., p. 193), as settling the law of Scotland on

ing damages for loss of profits. What he had done was equivalent to giving the pursuers the profits without the risk of speculation. The rule for the assessment of damages for loss of profits resulting from breach of contract was that only such damage should be allowed as might reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time the contract was made, as the probable result of the breach of it.¹ The cases subsequent to Hadley v. Baxendale established that a buyer was not entitled to an allowance for loss of profits, unless he either tabled a subcontract for resale of the goods at a profit, and proved that this subcontract had been known to the sellers,² or to an allowance for loss of market, unless the goods had been specially ordered for sale at a particular season or market.³ The Court was not entitled to assume that the goods would have been resold at a profit. They were practically new to the market, and the evidence shewed that the huts had been found unsuited to the climate of South Africa, and that trade in that country was much depressed when the rejected huts would have been put on the market. The present case was on this ground distinguishable from the case of Watt v. Mitchell & Company,⁴ where the subject of contract was a well-known commodity, namely, hemp. Assuming that the pursuers were entitled to an allowance for loss of profits, they could not receive interest as well. Further, the Lord Ordinary was wrong in allowing £150 for expense incurred in pushing the sale of the huts. The pursuers had already received under the first conclusion all that they were entitled to for expenses incurred in connection with the rejected huts.

No. 42.

Dec. 1, 1891.

Duff & Co. v.
Iron and Steel
Fencing and
Buildings Co.

the point, and I am not aware that the authority of the judgment has ever been impugned.

"I am therefore of opinion that the pursuers are entitled to a reasonable sum for the loss of profits which they would have made, and, indeed, I see no other way in which the loss which they have sustained through the breach of contract can be estimated.

"The amount which should be awarded for loss of profits is a jury question, which must be determined upon consideration of the whole circumstances of the case. Now, I find that of the huts in the earlier consignments which were disposed of, forty were sold to Mr Ross, at a profit of £7, 2s. 6d., and six were sold in Cape Town, at a profit of £11, 10s. These, however, were first put upon the market, and the purchase of them must be looked upon as to some extent an experiment; and if the huts had turned out not to be so suitable for the purpose for which they were required as expected, the price of these first sold would not have been maintained. And one of the pursuers' own witnesses says that the huts were found to be intolerably hot. Further, Mr Duff says that money for articles sold 'up country' is often difficult of collection, and that in fixing the price of the huts he calculated upon bad debts. But bad debts would reduce the average profit. It is also admitted that about the time when the rejected huts would have been put upon the market, trade and enterprise in South Africa had become somewhat depressed. Taking all these matters into consideration, I have come to the conclusion that a fair sum for loss of profits is £350 0 0

"And I allow in respect of the other items of damage to which

I have referred 150 0 0

"Making the total sum for which I shall give decree under the second conclusion of the summons £500 0 0"

¹ Hadley v. Baxendale, 1854, 9 Exch. 341.

² Thol v. Henderson, 1881, L. R., 8 Q. B. D. 457; Grébert-Borgnis v. Nugent, 1855, L. R., 15 Q. B. D. 85; Hammond v. Bussey, 1887, L. R., 20 Q. B. D. 79.

³ The "Parana," 1877, L. R., 2 Prob. Div. 118; The "Argentino," 1888, L. R., 13 Prob. Div. 61.

⁴ Watt v. Mitchell & Co., July 4, 1839, 1 D. 1157.

No. 42.

Dec. 1, 1891.
Duff & Co. v.
Iron and Steel
Fencing and
Buildings Co.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) The pursuers were justified in rejecting the huts. (2) The authorities merely established that, where goods were contracted to be sold for purposes of resale, and the seller failed to deliver them, or delivered them in an unmerchantable condition, the buyer was entitled to a reasonable allowance for loss of profits.¹ The allowance made by the Lord Ordinary was a most reasonable one. Further, the £150 allowed by the Lord Ordinary under the head of damages, for expenses in connection with the rejected huts, was allowed for different expenses from those for which he had made an allowance under the first conclusion.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—This is a reclaiming note against a judgment of Lord Low in an action of damages for the breach of a contract for the supply of portable iron huts for sale in South Africa. The judgment is to the effect that the huts which were rejected (108 in number) were, by reason of defective construction and insufficient packing, so difficult of erection as to be unfit for the purpose for which they were purchased, and also that they are disconform to the sample huts, and to the representations and warranty of the defenders. (His Lordship then examined the evidence and expressed his concurrence with the Lord Ordinary on the question of breach of contract, and the pursuers' right to reject the huts.)

There remains for consideration the question of the estimation of the damage consequent on the defenders' breach of contract, and its amount. In such cases the rule which is most usually applied is, that the damage is the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time when the breach of contract is ascertained—that is generally on the arrival and examination of the goods. This rule certainly presupposes that a purchaser for resale is not to lose his profit on the adventure, because if he acts upon the rule—that is, if he supplies himself with goods at the market price of the day, he is able to make the same profit on the substituted goods that he would have made on the goods to be supplied under the contract, only his profit is paid to him in two portions so much by the subvendee, and the balance by the seller who is liable in damages. The principle seems to be this, that the first purchaser has a duty to do what is within his power to lessen the loss to the seller by replacing the goods at the current price of the day, and that if he fails in doing so he will only recover from the seller the same sum which the seller would have had to pay in case the purchaser had supplied himself elsewhere.

But is it to be said that if such goods cannot be had at any price in the place of delivery, then the seller, who is in fault, is to pay nothing, and the whole loss is to fall on the purchaser who has fulfilled his part of the contract by paying the price? The affirmative was in substance maintained by the defender's counsel, because they contended that there was no precedent for assessing the damages otherwise than by a reference to market price as the standard of value. But plainly where there is no such standard the damage must be ascertained in some other way, so that the seller shall be put to indemnify the purchaser against such inconvenience as the parties might necessarily foresee or contemplate.

¹ Mayne on Damages, 17, 171; Hammond v. Bussey, 1887, L. R., 20 Q. B. 179, per Lord Esher, pp. 88-89; O'Hanlan v. Great Western Railway Co., 1866, 6 Best and Smith, 484, per Just. Blackburn, p. 591; Bates v. Cameron, Dec. 1855, 18 D. 186; Watt v. Mitchell & Co., July 4, 1839, 1 D. 1157, per Lord Medwyn, 1166.

the result of a failure of duty on the part of the seller. In the present case the huts were in the makers' knowledge sent to South Africa for resale. It could not be supposed that the pursuers would want 108 pioneer huts for their personal use in the colony, and besides it appears from the documents that the defenders had constituted the pursuers their sole "agents" for sale within the colony. If huts could have been obtained in the colony at wholesale prices, it would have been the pursuers' duty to supply themselves so as to lessen the loss to the defenders, but as this could not be done, I am afraid the consequence is that the whole loss must fall on the defenders. That loss is of course the commercial profit which the pursuers have been prevented from making on that part of their capital which is locked up in the defenders' hands. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that when a claim of damages is based on estimated profit we ought to be very cautious in accepting the estimate presented to us. I should not be disposed in any case to allow more than ordinary commercial profit, even if it were clearly proved that in the circumstances of the place of shipment larger profits might have been made, because ordinary commercial profit represents the loss which the seller contemplates, or ought to contemplate, as the result of his negligence, and according to the opinions expressed in Hadley v. Baxendale and cognate cases this is the measure of the seller's liability.

The Lord Ordinary has awarded £500 in two sums, viz., £350 for loss of profit, and £150 for travelling expenses and outlays specially proved. The sum of £350 is equal to a profit of about £3, 7s. on each of 108 huts rejected. The profit on the huts which were sold is proved to have been from £7 to £11, 10s., and the Lord Ordinary's estimate is therefore a low one.

This leads me to say in conclusion that my opinion is—and in this I think your Lordships agree—that the pursuers are not entitled to separate awards of interest on the price and damages; and for this reason, that the estimation of profit presupposes that a price is due and is paid. But we are satisfied that but for the allowance of interest the Lord Ordinary would have given a larger sum in name of damages, and therefore I do not propose to your Lordships that we should make any alteration on the terms of the interlocutor.

LORD ADAM, LORD KINNEAR, and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—MACONOCHE & HARE, W.S.—Agents.

MRS HELEN TAYLOR RUSSELL OR BOWMAN, Petitioner.—Sol.-Gen. Murray No. 42.
—Kennedy—Cooper.

DUNCAN MACKINNON AND ANOTHER (Russell's Trustees), Respondents.—Dec. 1, 1891.
D.-F. Balfour—Wilson. Bowman v. Russell's Trustees.

REV. JOHN WILKINSON, Respondent.—Asher—Dundas.

Judicial Factor—Trust—Removal of trustees.—In a petition by the next of kin of a domiciled Scotsman for removal of his testamentary trustees and the appointment of a judicial factor, the only allegation against the testamentary trustees was that they intended to remove the trust-estate from Scotland to the prejudice of the petitioners, who stated that they were about to bring a reduction of the settlement on the ground of incapacity and undue influence. The trustees having stated that they had no intention of removing the estate from Scotland, the Court refused the petition.

No. 43.

Dec. 1, 1891.
Bowman v.
Russell's
Trustees.

1st DIVISION.

THOMAS MELVILLE RUSSELL, sometime merchant in Calcutta, died at Bridge of Allan, on 3d February 1891, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 24th October 1890, by which, after declaring himself a native of Scotland and domiciled there, he conveyed his whole estates to trustees, for the purposes of paying small alimentary annuities to the widows of two of his brothers, and of conveying the whole residue of his estate to an institution, in London, called the Mildmay Mission to the Jews.

The trustees named were all resident in London, with the exception of one, who was resident in Scotland. Only one of these trustees accepted office, namely, Duncan Mackinnon, an East India merchant, generally resident in London, but also possessing a house in Scotland, and he, on 11th July 1891, assumed Neil Macmichael, a Glasgow East India merchant, who duly accepted office.

On 2d November 1891, Mrs Helen Taylor Russell or Bowman, one of the two next of kin of the deceased, presented a petition for the sequestration of the trust-estate, the removal of the trustees, and the appointment of a judicial factor.

The petitioner stated that she was about to bring a reduction of the trust-disposition and settlement on the ground that the deceased was not of sound disposing mind at its date, and had executed it in consequence of the undue influence which those connected with the Mildmay Mission had acquired over him,—“The said Duncan Mackinnon is resident in London and is not subject to the ordinary jurisdiction of the Scottish Courts; and it is believed and averred that he and Neil Macmichael contemplated immediately removing the trust-estate entirely out of Scotland and winding it up in England, with the view of trying to defeat any results favourable to the petitioners which may be obtained in the said action of reduction in the Scottish Courts. The contemplated removal of the trust-estate will further put it under the jurisdiction of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice in England, and the petitioners fear that in that event their rights in the said trust-estate could only be vindicated if at all, after long and costly litigation in Courts not those of the testator's domicile. Further, it is believed and averred by the petitioners that the said Duncan Mackinnon and Neil Macmichael, in the interests of the said Mildmay Mission to the Jews, and indeed as directed by the said trust-disposition and settlement under which they act, will realise as rapidly as possible the trust-estate, and pay it over to the Mildmay Mission. As the said mission has no domicile in Scotland, and the Scottish Courts have no ordinary jurisdiction over it, it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, for the petitioners, in the event of their being successful in the said action of reduction, to recover the estate thus paid over to the said mission.”

The trustees lodged answers, in which they denied that they had a intention of removing the trust-estate out of Scotland.¹

The Rev. John Wilkinson, the director and treasurer of the Mildmay Mission, also lodged answers, in which he denied the averments of undue influence and undue influence.

LORD PRESIDENT.—At the close of this debate, I must confess I am still at a loss to know the grounds upon which this application is made. This gentleman left a settlement by which he appointed a number of trustees (all of them it may be observed in passing, with one exception, resident in England). He died on the 3d February 1891. This petition is dated 2d November 1891, we are now at the 1st of December. I have listened attentively to all that Mr Cooper has said, but I am unable to discover any semblance of a reason or ground for removing these two acting trustees. One of them is a partner of a Glasgow firm, and though his general residence is in London he has a residence in Scotland, and the other is a Glasgow merchant resident at Helensburgh. They have told us that they had and have no intention of removing the personal estate in Scotland, and have also said that, if a reduction is brought, they are prepared to hold the estate for behoof of all parties. There is in the meantime no sign of the action of reduction. Some weeks ago we were told it was in course of being raised, and we are told exactly the same to-day. Mr Cooper hinted at some danger at the instance of some persons in England invoking the aid of the Court of Chancery. I cannot see that there is any reason at all for our interference on that ground, unless we are to sequester trust-estates wherever the trustor has seen fit to appoint persons resident in England as his trustees. I am therefore for refusing the petition.

¹ Authority.—Gilchrist's Trustees v. Dick, Oct. 20, 1883, 11 R. 22.

No. 43.

Dec. 1, 1891.
Bowman v.
Russell's
Trustees.

LORD ADAM.—I entirely concur. I do not see the slightest ground for listening to this application. It appears to be based upon a dread of the Court of Chancery, but that of course is not a ground upon which we can proceed.

LORD McLAREN.—The ground, or at least the motive, of this application is an apprehension that proceedings may be taken in England which might have the effect of defeating the claim of the next of kin, or their remedy in the Courts of this country. There are no doubt some cases in which this Court has appointed a judicial factor for the purpose of preventing the estate from being removed to foreign parts. It appears to me, however, that it is a sufficient answer here that the trustees have come forward and disclaimed all intention of acting prejudicially to the petitioner's claim, and in any case until proceedings have been taken in the foreign Court, and we know something of them, we could not entertain an application founded on such grounds. The proceedings, for anything we know, may turn out to be perfectly legal and unobjectionable.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT refused the petition.

FRINGLE, DALLAS, & Co., W.S.—DUNCAN & BLACK, W.S.—J. & J. H. BALFOUR, W.S.—
Agents.

TOWN-COUNCIL OF STROMNESS, Petitioners.—Lorimer.

No. 44.

Burgh—Election of magistrates—Burgh of barony incorporated by Royal Charter—General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 101)—Failure to elect—Nobile officium.—A burgh of barony was in use to elect its magistrates and council, in terms of its crown charter, in September every third year, the electors being the male owners and tenants of subjects paying £10 annually. The General Police Act, 1862, was adopted in the burgh in 1863, but the elections continued to be conducted in the burgh under the charter, the last having been held in September 1888.

Dec. 1, 1891.
Town-Council
of Stromness.

In November 1891, after the date of election for that year under both the charter and the Police Act had passed, the Court was asked to ordain the town-clerk of the burgh to make up the roll of electors in terms of the General Police Act, 1862, and subsequent statutes, and to appoint a returning officer to hold the election under the provisions of the Ballot Acts. The Court declined to do more under the petition than appoint a returning officer.

No. 41. as shewing what the object of the promoters was. We find it described in a letter from Sir George Grant Suttie to Dr Struthers in that year, in which he says,—“The object of the contribution being to support an infant school, and there being now three female teachers for young children in the parish, it appears to me that the object of the contributors will now be best attained by applying the proceeds of the fund annually to pay the school fees, or otherwise assist the young children of poor but deserving persons,” and it is important to notice that he adds in conclusion that he will be well pleased to hear “that you and your kirk-session will undertake this duty.”

Nov. 28, 1891.
Kirk-Session
of Preston-
pans v. School
Board of Pres-
tonpans.

Another stage has now been reached which has led to the present application being made. The fund has accumulated, and accordingly the original purpose is now, so far as money is concerned, free to take shape. But, on the other hand, there has arisen a board school, and free education has now been established in the parish. Accordingly we have to deal with an altered condition of things, and to consider which scheme most nearly reproduces the original purpose, with the necessary modifications which those changes necessitate.

The proposals of the School Board seem to me to lose sight of nearly every one of the essential features of the purposes for which the fund was established. Indeed, I might say of every one, were it not that Mr Dickson says that his clients are willing to give special attention to the wants of the infant department, by securing for it a more efficient teaching staff. But that is only one out of several features of the original purpose, and I cannot think that it is coming at all near to the original purpose to do what the ratepayers themselves can do, viz., to increase the efficiency of the teaching staff. That is a matter which lies within the ambit of the duties of the School Board. To say that “they are under no obligation, according to the educational code, to do more than they are doing,” is a very partial statement of their position. The code merely states the minimum which the Scotch Education Department require before a school is allowed to share in the grant of imperial money; but it, of course, does not limit the powers of the Board in dealing with local rates, if they and their constituents should desire such increased efficiency.

I have said that I do not think that the original purpose of the fund is kept sufficiently in view in the scheme of the School Board. No doubt, Mr Gillespie in his report proposes that the minister of the parish shall formally hold the fund, and that he shall accordingly have a title and interest to see that the School Board is doing its duty with the money which he pays over to them. But that appears to me to be a shadowy substitute for the administration and control of the fund by the minister and kirk-session, which we see was designed for them by the founders of this fund. And the substance of the School Board's proposal is that this fund shall be applied in supplement of, or rather, I might say, pro tanto in substitute for, the rates. I think this quite inadmissible.

Another scheme suggested, but only suggested, is that the income might be applied in supplying clothing to poor children attending the infant department. I think that might have been a very desirable object had it not been for the fact that the reporter and the School Board are clear that it is already sufficiently met by Schaw's Endowment, part of the revenue of which may be applied to that purpose. Accordingly, I think we may leave it out of view.

It appears to me that the proposal of the Kirk-session most adequately meets the original purpose of the fund; and although latterly a somewhat critical attention seems to have been directed towards the objects upon which the fund is to be bestowed, no scheme has been suggested in competition except those which No. 41.

 I have already been compelled to reject. The proposal of the Kirk-session Nov. 28, 1891.
 appears to me to be generally in conformity with the original purpose of the Kirk-Session of Preston-fund. They propose, as did the founders, to build a school; it is to be an infant pans v. School school, as was the founders' intention; it is to be in connection with the parish Board of Pres-church, and managed by the kirk-session, which was an essential element of the tonpans.
 founders' wishes; and they desire that there shall be no further limitation upon the admission of all children in the parish. The only variance in the scheme from the original purpose is, that it will be only education of a certain kind which will be given, and that upon Sunday; but, on the other hand, this variance is due simply to the supervening changes which have taken away the need for what is omitted. Nor is it to be left out of view that when the fund was originally started in 1845, Bible education must have bulked very largely in the mind of the founders, and, accordingly, comparing the present scheme with that of 1845, I cannot say that it differs from it except in degree. I have thus indicated that I do not regard the proposal of the Kirk-session as completely meeting the original purpose of the founders; but my judgment is in favour of that proposal, because, to revert to the words of your Lordships' interlocutor, it is, of those submitted to us, the one most "nearly in accordance with the original purpose for which the fund was established."

If your Lordships take the same view, I think our course will be to remit the matter again to Mr Gillespie to prepare a scheme upon the lines which I have indicated.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"
 Find that of the schemes suggested for the application of the fund in question, the proposal that it should be applied towards the building of a church hall to be used for Sunday school purposes as well as for congregational purposes and a library, is most nearly in accordance with the original purposes for which the fund was established; and therefore authorise the petitioners to apply the said fund accordingly; and remit to Mr Gillespie to adjust the details of a scheme in accordance therewith, regard being had to the undertaking of the petitioners to raise the balance of the money required for the building of the hall, and of the other terms of said proposal, and decern."

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—MELVILLE & LINDESAY, W.S.—Agents.

DUFF & COMPANY, Pursuers (Respondents).—Comrie Thomson—
McLennan.

No. 42.

THE IRON AND STEEL FENCING AND BUILDINGS COMPANY, Defenders
 (Reclaimers).—Ure—J. Clark.

Dec. 1, 1891.
Duff & Co. v.
Iron and Steel
Fencing and
Buildings Co.

Reparation—Breach of contract—Damages—Loss of Profits.—A manufacturing company in this country entered into a contract for the sale of iron huts of a peculiar construction, for which they held patents, to a firm of merchants in South Africa, with a view to the huts being resold there by the merchants.
 The earlier consignment of huts sent in pursuance of this contract was sold by the merchants at a profit, but subsequent consignments were rejected by them as being disconform to contract.

In an action by the merchants against the manufacturers for damages, it was

No. 45.

Dec. 1, 1891.
Letricheux
& David v.
Dunlop & Co.

The "Aber-
tawe."

the custom of the port were not available, no responsibility rested on the charterers, in the absence, at least, of wilful fault on their part. The fault alleged against the defenders here was remote, and was not such as to increase the measure of their obligation, which was only to discharge within a reasonable time. It was to be observed that in the cases of Moes, Moltere, & Tromp, and others cited by the reclaimers, the Court were determining the construction of an exception in bills of lading; here the question rather was as to the measure of the obligation in the charter-party.¹ "Detention by railways" was the proximate cause of the delay here, and the Sheriff's judgment was therefore right.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a claim of demurrage on a charter-party of the steamship "Abertawe." By the terms of the charter-party the discharge was to have taken place at General Terminus or Queen's Dock, Glasgow; in fact it took place at Port-Glasgow. This variance, though the subject of a plea on record, was not founded on before us, and the argument proceeded on the footing that at Port-Glasgow (as at Glasgow) the cargo of iron ore was to be (in the words of the charter-party) "delivered into trucks." No number of laying-days is fixed, but the cargo was "to be discharged as fast as steamer can deliver after being in berth."

The defence is founded on the following clause in the charter-party:—"The act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraints of princes and rulers, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, machinery, and boilers, commotion by pitmen, strikes, detention by railways, of whatever nature and kind soever during the said voyage, always mutually excepted." The words "commotion by pitmen, strikes, detention by railways," have been inserted in manuscript as an interlineation on the printed form of the charter.

The appellants have, in the first place, argued that this clause cannot in any view supply a justification of delay in discharging, inasmuch as it is limited to occurrences during the voyage. The observations of the Sheriff-substitute seem to me sufficiently to meet this objection, viz., that such a limitation would practically deny effect to the words in question.

The more earnest argument of the appellants relates to another question. The defenders, founding upon the clause which I have read, have claimed and have obtained from the Sheriffs judgment in their favour on the record, on the ground that the averments of the appellants themselves disclose that the cause of the delay for which demurrage is sued for was "detention by railways." Those averments are the following, which constitute the 4th article of the consendence and the three last sentences of the 5th:—"At Port-Glasgow vessels with iron ore are discharged by the harbour authorities into trucks supplied by the Caledonian Railway Company. The railway company had trucks available for the work of the discharge. But the defenders, in breach of the regulations of the railway company, kept too many trucks unloaded in their works, and because of this the railway company refused to supply trucks for delivery of cargo to them. This was the cause of the delay of the 'Abertawe.'" The question is,—is that a case of "detention by railways" in the sense of the clause?

¹ Steinman & Co. v. Angier Line, supra.

the result of a failure of duty on the part of the seller. In the present case the huts were in the makers' knowledge sent to South Africa for resale. It could not be supposed that the pursuers would want 108 pioneer huts for their personal use in the colony, and besides it appears from the documents that the defenders had constituted the pursuers their sole "agents" for sale within the colony. If huts could have been obtained in the colony at wholesale prices, it would have been the pursuers' duty to supply themselves so as to lessen the loss to the defenders, but as this could not be done, I am afraid the consequence is that the whole loss must fall on the defenders. That loss is of course the commercial profit which the pursuers have been prevented from making on that part of their capital which is locked up in the defenders' hands. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that when a claim of damages is based on estimated profit we ought to be very cautious in accepting the estimate presented to us. I should not be disposed in any case to allow more than ordinary commercial profit, even if it were clearly proved that in the circumstances of the place of shipment larger profits might have been made, because ordinary commercial profit represents the loss which the seller contemplates, or ought to contemplate, as the result of his negligence, and according to the opinions expressed in Hadley v. Baxendale and cognate cases this is the measure of the seller's liability.

The Lord Ordinary has awarded £500 in two sums, viz., £350 for loss of profit, and £150 for travelling expenses and outlays specially proved. The sum of £350 is equal to a profit of about £3, 7s. on each of 108 huts rejected. The profit on the huts which were sold is proved to have been from £7 to £11, 10s., and the Lord Ordinary's estimate is therefore a low one.

This leads me to say in conclusion that my opinion is—and in this I think your Lordships agree—that the pursuers are not entitled to separate awards of interest on the price and damages; and for this reason, that the estimation of profit presupposes that a price is due and is paid. But we are satisfied that but for the allowance of interest the Lord Ordinary would have given a larger sum in name of damages, and therefore I do not propose to your Lordships that we should make any alteration on the terms of the interlocutor.

LORD ADAM, LORD KINNEAR, and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—MACONOCHE & HARE, W.S.—Agents.

MRS HELEN TAYLOR RUSSELL OR BOWMAN, Petitioner.—Sol.-Gen. Murray
—Kennedy—Cooper.

DUNCAN MACKINNON AND ANOTHER (Russell's Trustees), Respondents.—
D.-F. Balfour—Wilson.

REV. JOHN WILKINSON, Respondent.—Asher—Dundas.

Judicial Factor—Trust—Removal of trustees.—In a petition by the next of kin of a domiciled Scotsman for removal of his testamentary trustees and the appointment of a judicial factor, the only allegation against the testamentary trustees was that they intended to remove the trust-estate from Scotland to the prejudice of the petitioners, who stated that they were about to bring a reduction of the settlement on the ground of incapacity and undue influence. The trustees having stated that they had no intention of removing the estate from Scotland, the Court refused the petition.

No. 42.

Dec. 1, 1891.
Duff & Co. v.
Iron and Steel
Fencing and
Buildings Co.

No. 43.

Dec. 1, 1891.
Bowman v.
Russell's
Trustees.

No. 45.

Dec. 1, 1891.
Letricheux
& David v.
Dunlop & Co.

The "Aber-
tawe."

In my opinion, the words "detention by railways," amplified as they are by the general words "of whatever nature and kind soever," cover the case stated by the pursuers on record, and entitle the defenders to the judgment which they have obtained from the Sheriffs.

As the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, which is adhered to by the Sheriff, sustains not only the plea as to relevancy but also the 7th plea, which is applicable to facts and not to averments, I should propose formally to recall those interlocutors in order to rest our judgment on the first plea.

LORD ADAM.—I concur with your Lordship. The answer which the charterers make here to the claim for payment of demurrage is that the delay was due to a cause for which they are not responsible, viz., the failure on the part of the railway company to send a supply of trucks. The reply is that that failure was caused by the charterers' fault.

There is no doubt upon the averments of the pursuer as to what was the cause of the delay. The question is, upon the construction of the charter-party, whether it is covered by the clause of exceptions, which includes "detention by railways." The first point which was taken was that the exceptions could be held to apply only while the ship was at sea, and that the "voyage" terminated when she was moored, and could not be held to include the time during which she was discharging her cargo. I cannot agree in that interpretation, because, if it were correct, I cannot see what meaning would be attachable to the words "commotion by pitmen, strikes, &c.," when the vessel is at sea and making her passage. The result therefore of limiting the meaning of the word "voyage" would be to deny effect to these words. Accordingly, I think the word "voyage" must be taken to embrace the period of preparation at the port of departure and the period spent at the port of destination until the cargo has been delivered.

The further question was whether the delay in unloading was due to "detention by railways." There is no doubt that in point of fact it was so caused,—it is so averred, as I have said, by the pursuers,—and that therefore the words of the exception apply. But we are asked to go further, and to enter upon the inquiry whether the "detention by railways" was not caused by the fault of the charterers. I think this would be quite out of the question. Suppose, by way of illustration, that the detention had been caused by a strike, which is another of the excepted causes. It could not be said that the Court would go behind the fact of the strike for the purpose of ascertaining whether it might have been avoided,—whether, for instance, more wages ought to have been given to the workmen in order to avoid it. I think the only matter for us is whether there was, in point of fact, "detention by railways," and if so, whether that was the proximate cause of the delay.

LORD M'LAREN.—My opinion is that, if a bona fide order was given by the charterers, and if the trucks were not forwarded by the railway company, that will amount to "detention by railways" in the sense of the charter-party. It is another question whether the railway company were justified in not providing trucks, because, even if it were proved that they were so justified, I think the refusal to send the trucks could be ascribed to nothing but the action of the railway company in the exercise of its rights, the very thing which the insertion of this clause in the charter-party was intended to guard against. For these reasons I concur with your Lordships.

No. 45.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. There can be no doubt that the duty of providing and making proper use of sufficient means for the discharge of cargo lies in general upon the charterer. The law is so laid down by Lord Selborne in the case of Postlethwaite, and I take it to be equally clear that, as there is no time stipulated within which the discharge is to be completed, the charterer was bound to discharge within a reasonable time "under the circumstances." The usual mode of discharge at Port-Glasgow, according to the custom of the port, seems to be by trucks, and in the absence of the clause excepting "detention by railways," it might have been a question of more or less difficulty whether the refusal of the railway company to provide trucks was, in the circumstances, an impediment which it was in the power of the charterer to have overcome by the use of reasonable diligence. But the stipulation in question relieves the charterer of all obligation to exercise diligence to obviate detention by railways, because that is a cause of delay for which he stipulates that he is not to be held responsible. To have held the pursuers' averments relevant would have been to refuse effect to the terms of the exception.

Dec. 1, 1891.
Letricheux
& David v.
Dunlop & Co.
The "Aber-
tawe."

I agree with your Lordship in the chair that the charterer might not have been relieved if the detention had occurred through any direct fault of his. It is not alleged that he is chargeable with any fault or negligence in the execution of his contract with the shipowner, but it is said that he failed in the performance of another contract with the railway company, with which the shipowner had no concern. The pursuers' case therefore requires that we should try the question which is said to have arisen between the charterer and the railway company on its merits, in order to find the proper basis for determining the question between the present parties. We cannot allow an inquiry of this kind. The proximate cause of the delay was detention by the railway company's failing to supply trucks. It is to the proximate cause that we must look, and we cannot inquire whether the reason for the railway company's failure was a difference with the defenders, because it is stipulated that the defenders shall not be responsible for the conduct of the railway company.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute, dated 19th November 1890, and of the Sheriff, dated 15th June 1891: Sustain the first plea in law for the defenders: Assoilzie them from the conclusions of the summons: Find the pursuer liable in expenses both in this and in the inferior Court," &c.

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—THOMSON, DICKSON, & SHAW, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN BAIRD SMITH (Thomas Allan's Trustee), Pursuer (Reclaiming).—Ure—Salvesen.

No. 46.

THOMAS ALLAN & SONS, Defenders (Respondents).—D.-F. Balfour—W. C. Smith.

Dec. 1, 1891.
Allan's Trustee v. Allan & Sons.

Contract—Lease—Obligation on tenant to keep subjects in repair—Reparation.
—A lease of works and machinery provided that the tenants should uphold the works in good condition to the satisfaction of A. S., an engineer, and that in the event of A. S. being of opinion that the works were not being kept in good condition, and in the event of the tenants failing to execute the necessary repairs, the proprietor should be entitled to do so, and to recover from the tenants the cost thereof, as certified by A. S.

On the tenants leaving the works, prior to the expiration of the lease, the pro-

No. 44.

Dec. 1, 1891.
Town-Council
of Stromness.

1st Division.

THE town of Stromness, in the county of Orkney, was a burgh of barony incorporated by royal charter, with all the powers pertaining thereto, and in particular with power to the burgesses to elect their own magistrates and councillors, viz., two bailies and nine councillors, the male inhabitants infert in or possessing as tenants any heritage yielding £10 annually being the electors. By the charter an election of the whole council was held on the first Wednesday of September every third year. The last election, previous to the presentation of this petition, was held on the first Wednesday of September 1888.

The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, was adopted by the burgh in 1863, but notwithstanding that fact, and the extension of the franchise under the Act of 1868 to male occupiers of premises of the value of £4 annually, and under the Act of 1882 to females, no change was made in the municipal qualification. Elections, as above stated, continued to be held every third year, and voting by ballot was not introduced.

In these circumstances a petition was presented by the acting Commissioners of Police of the burgh, who were also designed as householders, in which they stated,—“ When preparing for the election, which, according to former practice, would have taken place in September last, doubts arose in the minds of the petitioners on the subject, and, upon advice, they resolved not to hold the election in September on the old qualification, but that effect should be given to the changes above indicated, and the election held in conformity with the Ballot Act, 1872, and the other relative statutes. The authority of the Court for this purpose is accordingly desired by the petitioners. With this view it will be necessary to make up from the Valuation-roll a correct list of voters, including such females as are pointed out by the Act of 1882. It will also be necessary to fix a day for the election, and to have some fit person appointed a returning officer in order to conduct the election under the Ballot Act seeing that the senior bailie (Mr James Spence), on whom the duty is thrown by the Ballot Act, has left Stromness and become resident in Aberdeen, and has demitted office, and that the petitioner, Mr John Ait Shearer, the other bailie, is a candidate for re-election.”

The prayer of the petition was that the Court should “ authorise and ordain the petitioner, John Stanger Copland, town-clerk, Stromness, and treasurer to the Police Commissioners thereof, to make up and certify list or roll of electors of the said burgh of Stromness, duly qualified in terms of law, including male occupiers of lands or premises of the year value of £4 and upwards, as appearing in the Valuation-roll, and female occupiers of lands or premises as aforesaid, who are not married, or, being married, do not live in family with their husbands, or otherwise including only persons qualified in terms of the said charter of Stromness; and to authorise and appoint” the Sheriff-substitute “ to act as returning officer at the election of magistrates and councillors, on Tuesday, the 1st day of November next, or on such other day as your Lordships may appoint, due intimation thereof being given as your Lordships may direct with all the statutory and other powers competent and necessary for the discharge of the said office in manner provided by the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, the Ballot Act, 1872, and the other Acts regulating Municipal Elections in Scotland.”

When the petition was heard in the Single Bills on 10th November the dates of election named in the charter and in the Police Act were both past.

At the hearing in the Single Bills on 10th November the Court declined to entertain the questions, whether the roll should be made under the charter or under the Police Acts, and whether the Ballot Act applied, expressing the opinion that if the parties wished them decided they must bring a declarator. At the same time they expressed their willingness to appoint a returning officer, and the hearing was continued.

No. 44.

Dec. 1, 1891.
Town-Council
of Stromness.

The petitioners thereafter lodged a minute stating that they were advised "that the election of magistrates for the burgh of barony of Stromness falls to be made in terms of the charter of the burgh of 1817, except as regards the manner of taking the poll, to which the provisions of the Ballot Act apply," and craved leave to amend the prayer of the petition accordingly.

THE COURT thereafter pronounced this interlocutor:—"Allow the prayer of the petition to be amended, and the same having been done, authorise and appoint Samuel Beveridge Armour, Esquire, Sheriff-substitute of Orkney, at Kirkwall, whom failing, William Cowper, Esquire, town-clerk of Kirkwall, to act as returning officer at the election of magistrates and councillors of the burgh of Stromness, to be held on Wednesday the 23d day of December 1891, on six days' intimation thereof being given by handbills posted in the said burgh, with all the statutory and other powers competent and necessary for the discharge of said office: Find the petitioners entitled to the expenses of the petition, and the procedure following thereon, out of the first assessment for police purposes which may be levied by the magistrates and council, Commissioners of Police of the said burgh, to be elected as aforesaid."

WILLIAM GRAHAM, Solicitor, Agent.

LETRICHEUX & DAVID, Pursuers (Appellants).—Dickson—Ure. No. 45.
JAMES DUNLOP & COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—Sol.-Gen. Murray
—Dundas.

Dec. 1, 1891.
Letricheux
& David v.
Dunlop & Co.

Ship—Demurrage—Charter-party—Exceptions—"Detention by railways."
—A charter-party provided that the vessel should proceed to a port named and deliver her cargo in the usual and customary manner on being paid freight at a certain rate "per ton delivered into trucks," and contained the following clause of exceptions:—"The act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraints of princes and rulers, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, machinery and boilers, commotion by pitmen, strikes, detention by railways, of whatever nature and kind soever during the said voyage, always mutually excepted."

In an action upon the charter-party at the instance of shipowners for payment of demurrage it was averred that there had been delay in the discharge of the cargo owing to the refusal of a railway company to supply trucks to receive it, on account of the charterers having, in breach of the company's regulations, kept too many trucks unloaded in their works. Held that the delay was covered by the exception "detention by railways," and action dismissed as irrelevant.

By charter-party, dated 4th February 1890, between Letricheux & David, shipowners, Swansea, and Lietke & Company, on behalf of James Dunlop & Company, ironmasters, Glasgow, it was stipulated that the s.s. "Abertawe" of Swansea, of 881 tons register, should proceed to Portugal, Bilbao, and there load a cargo of iron ore, and proceed therewith to "a crane berth at General Terminus or Queen's Dock, Glasgow, as ordered on arrival, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and deliver the same, in the usual and customary manner, on being paid freight, . . . per ton of 20 cwts. delivered into trucks in full of Clyde dues on cargo . . . (The

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

No. 46.

Dec. 1, 1891.
Allan's Trustees v. Allan &
Sons.

remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary, "with instructions to recall the sist, and proceed with the cause."

The pursuer having intimated to the Lord Ordinary that he did not intend to execute the repairs in question, the Lord Ordinary, on 8th September 1891, pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary recalls the sist formerly granted; and having again considered the cause, in respect that the pursuer states that he does not intend to execute the repairs mentioned in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 15th June 1891, assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons as laid, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses, subject to modification."*

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary was in error in thinking that the pursuer had only one remedy, to repair at his own cost and sue for the sum so expended. He had another, to sue for damages for breach of contract. The recall of the former interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary imported that the contention his Lordship had now again sustained was unsound. The pursuer, because he thought it useless to waste money in putting dismantled buildings into repair, ought not to lose every remedy.¹

The defenders argued;—The pursuer having elected the remedy provided under the lease, he was not now entitled to claim damages at common law.

 LORD YOUNG.—There is no doubt of the defenders' obligation under the lease to keep the premises in repair, and to leave them in good repair to the satisfaction of Mr Alexander Steven. After they left the premises, and on a reference to Mr Steven under the authority of this Court, it was found by Mr Steven that the defenders had not left the premises in good repair. That was a breach of contract. The question then came to be what was the remedy of the pursuer, the landlord. The lease specifies one remedy. It provides that if the arbiter is of opinion that the ~~works, machinery, and~~ plant are not in good repair, and the tenants fail to put them into such, the landlord is to be entitled to execute the repairs necessary to put them into proper condition at the expense of the tenants, "who shall be liable in payment of the expense thereof, as the same shall be certified by the said Alexander Steven." But that is not specified as the only remedy. If the landlord, after it was found that repairs must be executed and the tenants had failed to do so, did not choose to put the premises in repair, it seems to me not to be arguable that there was no remedy. There must be also, I think, the remedy of suing for damages for the consequences of the breach of contract. That is exactly what has been done here. The Lord Ordinary previously expressed the opinion that the pursuer's only remedy was to repair and to sue for the cost of repairing, and he sisted process that the pursuer might, if so advised, proceed to repair and to obtain from the arbiter a certificate of the expense thereof, although the pursuer intimated that he did not intend to repair. On a reclaiming note the pursuer again stated that to us, and we also were told that the pursuer declined to repair. But we recalled the

* "NOTE.—I understand that the case was remitted to me by the Inner-House to be disposed of, on the footing that the pursuers do not intend to execute the repairs mentioned in my interlocutor of 15th June 1891. No further argument was addressed to me for the pursuer; and as I see no reason to alter the opinion which I formerly expressed in the note to my interlocutor of 15th June, I think the defenders must be assoilzied."

¹ Bidoulac v. Sinclair's Trustees, Nov. 29, 1889, 17 R. 144.

sist, and remitted to his Lordship to proceed with the action. The Lord Ordinary has again acted on his view that the pursuer has no remedy, except to repair and sue the defenders for the cost. If we had thought that when the case was previously before us, we would not have recalled the sist and remitted the case for further procedure. It is now again before us, and in the same condition as before. I think we should keep the case before us, and should ascertain by evidence the amount necessary to make good the damage to the pursuer from the causes which Mr Steven found to exist.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree.

LORD TRAYNER.—I also agree. I have no doubt, on the construction of the lease, that the pursuer had the remedy, either of repairing and suing for the cost of the repairs, or of an ordinary common law action of damages. Therefore I think it is clear that the Lord Ordinary's judgment cannot stand. But, in allowing a proof, it is important to keep in view a matter alluded to by Lord Young. The question for proof is the amount in money of the damage sustained by the pursuer in respect of the failure of the defenders to leave the premises in proper repair, as that failure is ascertained and fixed by the report of Mr Steven.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against, except in so far as it recalls the sist therein mentioned: Allow pursuer a proof of his averments in so far as not admitted, and to the defenders a conjunct probation: Appoint the proof to proceed before Lord Trayner, on a day to be afterwards fixed," &c.

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—BEVERIDGE, SUTHERLAND, & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

WILLIAM WILSON AND ANOTHER, Petitioners.—Goudy.

No. 47.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Notice of meeting to elect trustee—Computation of time—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (18 and 19 Vict. c. 79), sec. 67.—Wilson.
Held that in order to comply with the provisions of the 67th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856,* there must be an interval of six days after the close of the day of the Gazette notice of the award of a sequestration, and the date to be fixed for the election of a trustee.

THE estates of William Wilson were sequestrated by the Sheriff-sub-1st Division of Ayrshire on 5th October 1891, and in the deliverance awarding sequestration, a meeting of creditors was appointed to be held on 12th October 1891. A notice of the award of the sequestration and of the place and date fixed for the meeting was inserted in the Edinburgh Gazette of Tuesday 6th October 1891, being the first publication of the Gazette after the deliverance was pronounced.

At the meeting on the 12th October one of the creditors protested against the legality of the proceedings, and objected to the appointment of a trustee, as timeous notice had not been given in terms of the 67th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, six clear days not having elapsed

* The Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 67, enacted,—“The Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, by the deliverance which awards sequestration, shall appoint a meeting of the creditors to be held at a specified hour on a specified day, being not earlier than six nor later than twelve days from the date of the Gazette notice of sequestration having been awarded, . . . to elect a trustee,” &c.

No. 46.
Dec. 1, 1891.
Allan's Trustees v. Allan & Sons.

No. 47.

Dec. 1, 1891.
Wilson.

between the date of the notice and the day fixed for the meeting. The meeting proceeded notwithstanding to elect a trustee, but the Sheriff-substitute declined to confirm the election on the ground that the statutory notice had not been given.

Wilson and one of his creditors now presented a petition to the Court in which they asked the Court to remit to the Sheriff to confirm the election, on the footing that the notice was sufficient.

No answers were lodged, and no appearance was made for the other creditors.

Argued for the petitioners;—The terms of the 67th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, were sufficiently complied with if the meeting was held on the sixth day after the date of the notice. The maxim dies incipit pro completo habetur applied, and brought the procedure here into consonance with the provision in the 5th section of the Act that “periods of time in this Act shall be reckoned exclusive of the day from which such period is directed to run.” There were no doubt cases in which the Court seemed to have given effect to the view that six clear days must elapse,¹ but there were also cases the other way.² In cases of deathbed reduction it had been settled that the day of making the deed must be excluded from the computation; so too in cases of bankruptcy, in a reduction under the Act 1696, cap. 5; but in both, the sixty days were held to have expired the moment the sixtieth day began.³ So too in cases of poindings within sixty days before the day of bankruptcy.⁴

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Court hold that the terms of section 67 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act of 1856 are such as to require that an interval of six days must elapse after the close of the day of the Gazette notice, and before the commencement of the day of meeting.

The meeting to which the petition relates was therefore not legal, and the Court will appoint a fresh meeting to take place.

THE COURT appointed a new meeting of creditors to be held on 11th December 1891 for the election of a trustee and commissioners, and remitted to the Sheriff of Ayr to proceed further in terms of the Bankruptcy Act.

CARMICHAEL & MILLER, W.S., Agents.

No. 48.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Baillie's Trustees v. Baillie.

SIR WILLIAM BAILLIE'S TRUSTEES, First Parties.—W. Campbell.

DAME MARY BAILLIE, Second Party.—W. Campbell.

SIR GEORGE BAILLIE, Third Party.—Macfarlane.

Succession—Fee and liferent—Minerals—Mineral field opened up by testator but not worked.—A husband directed his trustees to pay to his wife in the event of her surviving him, “during her lifetime, the free annual proceeds of my estate and of minerals therein,” and after her death to dispose the estate to B.

Held that the liferenter was entitled to the proceeds not only of mineral workings which the testator was carrying on at the date of his death, but also of workings which he had abandoned as unprofitable.

¹ E.g., Struthers, March 7, 1861, 23 D. 702, 33 Scot. Jur. 346.

² Von Rotberg, Dec. 22, 1876, 4 R. 263.

³ Bell's Comma. (7th edn.) i. 84, and ii. 179.

⁴ Scott v. Rutherford, Dec. 7, 1839, 2 D. 206, 12 Scot. Jur. 234; Greig Anderson, Feb. 23, 1883, 20 S. L. R., 421; Stiven v. Reynolds & Co., Jan. 2 1891, 18 R. 422; Kinnear on Bankruptcy, p. 8.

SIR WILLIAM BAILLIE, Bart., of Polkemmet died on 21st July 1890. He was survived by his wife, but by no children. He left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 10th April 1889, whereby he conveyed to Mark John Stewart and another, as trustees, his whole heritable and moveable estate, directing them, inter alia, as follows:—" (Second) My trustees shall, from and after my death, hold my estate of Polkemmet, comprehending the whole lands, teinds, and other heritages in the county of Linlithgow belonging to me, for the liferent use of Dame Mary Baillie, my wife, in the event of her surviving me; and they shall pay to her during her lifetime the free annual proceeds of said estate, and of minerals therein, and allow her to occupy the mansion-house, offices, and policies." The trust-disposition and settlement further provided in the fifth place:—" (Fifth) on the death of the survivor of me and my said wife, my trustees shall dispoise and convey my whole foresaid heritable estate to George Baillie, now in Australia, my nephew, eldest son of the late Thomas Baillie, my brother, whom failing, to the heirs of his body, whom failing, to" a certain series of heirs.

No. 48.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Baillie's Trustees v. Baillie.2ND DIVISION.

After the testator's death a question arose with regard to the letting of minerals in the estate, and a special case was adjusted, the parties to which were (first) the trustees, (second) Lady Baillie, and (third) George Baillie (now Sir George Baillie, Bart.).

During Sir William Baillie's life he had let the minerals in certain portions of his estate to tenants under leases, which were current at the date of his settlement and at the date of the case. No question arose as to these.

Sir William had also let the minerals in a farm named Burnbrae to a tenant, but the tenant had become bankrupt in 1881 and had abandoned the lease. The pit used by him, however, upon the farm remained open, and could easily be made available for working. Sir William had also in 1886 accepted a proposal to take a lease of the minerals in Burnbrae, and also in other parts of the estate known as Swineabbey, West Foulshiels, and East Whitburn, but the tenant gave up the lease, after proving the mineral field, without working it.

In 1891 Robert Addie & Son, coalmasters, made an offer to the trustees to take a trial lease of the minerals in Burnbrae, Swineabbey, East Whitburn, and West Foulshiels. They stipulated that if minerals were found which they might wish to work they should have a lease from the trustees for thirty-one years from Martinmas 1882.

The questions for decision were,—“1. Have the first parties power to let the minerals in the portions of the estate of Polkemmet referred to for a period not exceeding thirty-one years (1) without the consent of the third party, or (2) with his consent? 2. In the event of either alternative of the first question being answered in the affirmative, is the second party entitled to receive during her lifetime the free lordships or rents of the minerals in the said portions of the estate of Polkemmet?”

Argued for the second party;—The testator had been trying to let the minerals so as to procure an annual return. There had been a temporary failure to obtain mineral rents from these portions of the estate, but that was because the tenant had given them up. But the fields were opened up and ready to be worked again, especially Burnbrae, where the pit remained open. The testator's intention had been clearly indicated by his acts, and that was the proper test.¹ The minerals could therefore be ¹ Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell, March 15, 1882, 9 R. 725, affd. July 6, 1883, 10 R. (H. L.) 65.

No. 48.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Baillie's Trustees v. Baillie.

let without the third party's consent. The words following "free annual proceeds of said estate," viz., "and of minerals therein," shewed the testator's intention, and distinguished the case from that of Campbell.

Argued for the third party;—The question was settled by the judgment in Campbell's case. The widow's liferent was to be measured by the actual state of the testator's own enjoyment at his death, unless there was express or implied direction to the contrary. There was none such here. It was true that the testator had made trial of the minerals. But the trial had been given up. It was not to be assumed that the testator would have given the whole liferent if he had contemplated that the trustees would think of reopening disused pits.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case we have to decide the effect of the provision which the testator made for his widow in the second purpose of his settlement. That purpose is as follows—(His Lordship quoted the second purpose).

The statement of fact in the special case is, that at various times during the lifetime of the testator the minerals had been opened up and leases entered into by tenants. It also appears that the working of these was not profitable for the tenant, and that the tenant ceased to work the minerals, and that pits upon one of the farms still remain open and could easily be made available for working. That applies to the Burnbrae and Swineabbey minerals. The question put to us is, whether the trustees have power, without the consent of the party who is ultimately to succeed to the estate, or with his consent, to let those mineral fields which have been already opened up. The first question is, of course, whether they have the right or not. The case is peculiar in this respect, that the settlement contains the express declaration that the testator's widow is to have the free annual proceeds of the estate, "and the minerals therein," and it is asked of us whether the trustees are entitled to give the widow the benefit of working these already opened mineral fields by letting them and adding the rents to her liferent.

It seems to have been clearly laid down in the case of Campbell, 9 R. 725,—I read from the opinion of the Lord President, at page 728,—that "where a mineral field has been opened up and made part of the fruits of the soil, or has provided an income during the lifetime of the testator, the liferenter of the estate is entitled to continue to have these fruits as part of the free income of the estate. But where it has not been opened up in the lifetime of the testator, but has become a source of revenue since his death, the liferenter is not entitled to enjoy it."

Giving the best consideration I can to the matter, I am of opinion that the widow of this testator is entitled to the annual fruits of these fields which were opened up during the testator's lifetime. He drew the fruits during his life so long as the tenant was able to pay them. Local or temporary circumstances may have prevented the tenant from carrying on the work at a profit, and it may have been stopped for a time. But the minerals were opened up in the testator's lifetime, and taking with us the doctrine of Campbell's case, and considering that the testator has expressly given the liferent of the free annual proceeds of "said estate, and of minerals therein," it is difficult to see what minerals he can have intended, unless it was the mineral fields already opened up or the whole minerals. Now, it is not necessary to decide whether the trustees could open up a new mineral field in any other part of the estate. That is not the question put to us, but the question is, whether they have power to let the minerals already opened up and formerly worked. My opinion is that they are so entitled. No. 48.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Baillie's Trustees v. Baillie.

The only other question is, whether the third party's consent is necessary. I am of opinion that it is not, the question being of the nature which I have indicated and the law laid down in Campbell's case being as I have stated.

Therefore I propose that we answer the first question in the affirmative, that we find that the power of the first parties may be exercised without the consent of the third party, and that we answer the second question in the affirmative.

LORD TRAYNER.—By the trust-deed of the late Sir William Baillie his trustees are directed to hold the estate of Polkemmet for the liferent use of the second party, and to “pay to her during her lifetime the free annual proceeds of said estate, and of minerals therein.” A direction to the trustees to pay to the second party the free annual proceeds of the estate for her liferent use would have entitled her to the rents or royalties derived from minerals which had been opened up and worked during the truster's lifetime, and I take it that something more was intended to be given to the second party by the addition of the words “and of the minerals therein.” Whether that would entitle the second party to insist that mineral fields should now be opened up which the testator had not worked or leased, or shewn any intention to work or lease, during his lifetime, in order that she might receive the rents and royalties thereof, I do not say, but I think there is here an expression of the truster's intention (which was wanting in the case of Campbell), that the second party should take under the provisions of the trust-deed rents or royalties of minerals beyond what would have been carried by an ordinary liferent provision. In the circumstances stated in the case I think it is reasonable to connect that intention with the minerals which had been let by the truster, or which he had agreed to let, during his lifetime, and which there was ground for believing would be worked by other tenants than those who had taken or agreed to take them from the testator, but had not worked them out, or worked them at all. For these reasons I concur in thinking that the questions put to us should be answered in the manner proposed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—“Find that the first question is to be answered in the affirmative, and that the power of the first parties may be exercised without the consent of the third party: Find that the second question is to be answered in the affirmative,” &c.

TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S., Agents.

STUART & STUART, Petitioners (Reclaimers).—Baxter.
DONALD MACLEOD, Respondent.—M'Kechnie—Wilton.

No. 49.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Contingent debt—Crofter—Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Acts, 1886 and 1887 (49 and 50 Vict. c. 29, and 50 and 51 Vict. c. 24).—In answer to an action by a landlord for payment of the arrears of rent Dec. 8, 1891.
Stuart & Macleod.

No. 49.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Stuart &
Stuart v.
Macleod.

of a house alleged by the pursuer to be an inn, the defender asked for a sist pending the disposal of an application he had made to the Crofter Commissioners on the footing that the house formed part of a "holding" within the meaning of the Crofters Act, 1886. The Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) refused to sist the action, and the defender afterwards withdrew this defence "without prejudice to his application to the Crofters Commission," and consented to decree being granted against him. On expiry of a charge on the extract decree without payment, the landlord's assignee presented a petition for sequestration of the tenant's estate under the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. The debtor objected on the ground that the debt was contingent until the Commission issued its determination. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Kincairney, Ordinary) that as the debt was constituted by a decree for payment of arrears of rent of an inn, it could not be held to be for the rent of a "holding" within the meaning of the Crofters Act; that the debt was not therefore contingent, and that sequestration must be awarded.

Observed per Lord McLaren,—"Unless the proprietor and the tenant are agreed that the tenant is a crofter in the sense of the Crofters Act, and is entitled to its benefits, it is only through the ordinary Courts of the country that the dispute can be finally determined."

Bankruptcy—Award of sequestration—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), sec. 30.—Opinions per curiam in conformity with opinion of Lord President Inglis in Joel v. Gill, 21 D. 929, that where all the conditions required by the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, have been complied with the Court has no discretion, but is bound to award sequestration.

Held by Lord Wellwood (Ordinary), upon a construction of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Acts, 1886 and 1887, that a decree for payment of arrears of rent may be pronounced against a crofter notwithstanding the dependence of an application to the Commissioners to have a fair rent fixed.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

THIS petition was presented by Messrs Stuart & Stuart, W.S., for sequestration of the estates of Donald Macleod, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, in the following circumstances.

On 30th June 1890 Norman Macpherson, Esq., and the Misses Macpherson, his sisters, proprietors pro indiviso of the island and estate of Eigg, brought an action against Donald Macleod for payment of £52, 10s., being the amount of seven half-yearly rents of £7, 10s. each from Whitsunday 1887 to Whitsunday 1890 inclusive, alleged to be due in respect of the defender's occupancy of the Scur Inn situated upon the island.

In that action the pursuers averred;—"Upwards of fifty years ago the house now known as the Scur Inn was the house for the tenant of the farm of Galmisdale. That farm having fallen out of lease some forty or fifty years ago, it was divided among crofters, and the farmhouse was let to defender's father, the late Allan Macleod, as an inn, in place of the small cottage near the seashore then occupied by him as such. There was also at same time let to Allan Macleod a croft in Galmisdale, which is now in possession of the defender. The two subjects were let distinctly, and separate rents paid therefor. Subsequently, the pursuers prohibited the said Allan Macleod from selling spirituous liquors in the inn, and in respect thereof let him occupy the house rent free. When in 1878 it was found that the inn had fallen into disrepair, and become insufficient for the requirements of the island, the pursuers, at a very considerable outlay, improved the house and put it into thorough repair, and agreed to give the said Allan Macleod and defender a lease thereof for three years at £15 per annum. . . . No formal lease was prepared, but the arrangement came to under a letter and minute between the parties was acted on, the proprietors repairing and adding to the house, and Allan Macleod and the defender regularly paying the agreed on rent of £15 per annum, and that over and above and distinct from the rent of the croft in Galmisdale, £14 per annum." Allan Macleod died in 1883, and the defender thereafter remained in occupation of the subjects on the old terms. He regularly paid the rent of the croft in Galmisdale, but had refused to pay the half-yearly rents sued for. No. 49.

—
Dec. 8, 1891.
Stuart &
Stuart v.
Macleod.

The defender in that action averred;—(Ans. 2) "Admitted that upwards of fifty years ago the house called by the pursuers the Scur Inn was the dwelling-house for the tenant of the farm of Galmisdale, that the said farm was then divided into crofts, and that the defender's father became a tenant of one of these. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that the defender's father having leased the largest croft, there was let along with it to him the said dwelling-house, which was thereafter occupied by him and subsequently by the defender. The pursuers made certain improvements on the dwelling-house about the year 1878 on the footing of a verbal agreement with the defender, whereby he undertook to pay 5 per cent on the cost after the repairs were executed. The pursuers represented that they had expended £300, and charged the defender £15 per annum of additional rent for said croft and dwelling-house. The defender and his father always complained against that increase as excessive." He further admitted that he had refused to pay the half-yearly rents sued for, and explained that he had applied to the Crofters Commissioners, on 2d July 1890, to fix the fair rent for the croft, including the dwelling-house, and arrears payable by him, and that the application had not yet been disposed of. The Commissioners had issued an order, on 15th September 1890, prohibiting "in hoc statu all proceedings for the sale of the applicant's effects upon his holding, by virtue of any decree for rent or arrears of rent, and without prejudice to and under reservation of the whole rights and pleas of parties."

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) Lis alibi pendens. (3) In any view the action ought to be sisted pending the disposal of the defender's application by the Crofters Commissioners.

The Lord Ordinary (Wellwood), on 6th November 1890, repelled the second and third pleas in law for the defender, and allowed a proof.*

* "OPINION.—The second and third pleas in law are founded upon the dependence before the Crofters Commissioners of an application by the defender to have a fair rent fixed.

"The summons in this case was raised on 30th June 1890, and it is admitted that an application was made by the present defender on the 2d of July, and therefore the application was made timeously. Under the Crofters Holdings Acts, 1886, 1887, the Commissioners have certain powers of restraining, to a certain extent, the execution of decrees of Courts of law. Under the Act of 1886, section 6, subsection 4, it is provided that,—'When an application is lodged with the Crofters Commission to fix a fair rent, it shall be in the power of the Crofters Commission, either under the same or under another application of the crofter, to sist all proceedings for the removal of the crofter in respect of non-payment of rent till the said application is finally determined, upon such terms as to payment of rent or otherwise as they shall see fit.'

"Now, that power is confined to preventing the removal of a crofter in respect of any decree obtained against him, until the application before the Commissioners is disposed of. That was thought, after the decision in the case of Prater v. Macdonald, 14 R. 181, to give rather a limited power to the Commission; and accordingly, by the Crofters Holdings Act of 1887, section 2, certain wider powers were conferred, but those powers were confined to authorising the Commissioners to prohibit the sale of the crofter's effects upon the holding by virtue of any decree for payment of rent. Now, that section seems to imply that, notwithstanding the dependence of an application to the Commissioners, a decree for arrear of rent may be competently pronounced by the Court.

No. 49.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Stuart &
Stuart v.
Macleod.

The defender thereafter lodged the following minute:—"Forsyth, for the defender, stated that he, without prejudice to the defender's application to the Crofters Commission, withdrew the defence stated for the defender, and consented to decree in favour of the pursuer, in terms of the conclusions of the summons." On 20th December following the Lord Ordinary decerned against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the summons, with expenses.

The expenses were taxed at £37, 5s. 10d., and the pursuers thereafter extracted the decree in their favour, and on 29th May 1891 they charged the defender to make payment of £77, 18s. 7d., being rent, interest, and expenses under deduction of a payment to account made under order of the Commissioners. The charge having expired without payment, the pursuers thereafter assigned the decree to their agents, Messrs Stuart & Stuart, W.S.

Messrs Stuart presented the present petition for Macleod's sequestration under the Bankruptcy Act.

Macleod then lodged a minute craving the Court to dismiss the petition, and pleading;—(1) The petition is incompetent pending the respondent's application to the said Commissioners, and is barred by the terms of the order of said Commissioners. (2) The petition is incompetent in respect of its non-compliance with the statutory requirements in so far as, . . . (b) the debt founded on is contingent. He stated that he had acquiesced in Lord Wellwood's interlocutory judgment with the view of avoiding the expense of two inquiries, and that thereafter in respect of his minute, in which without prejudice to his application to the Commissioners he withdrew his defence, decree had been pronounced against him.

The Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Kincairney), on 22d August 1891, refused the petition.*

It also gives the Commissioners power to prohibit the sale of the crofter's effects on the holding. Therefore the result of the provisions in the two Acts is that where an application is timeously made by a crofter for the purpose of having a fair rent fixed, the Crofters Commissioners can issue an order which will have the effect of preventing the crofter being removed from his croft, and also of preventing the sale of the crofter's effects upon the holding in respect of any decree that has been obtained against him. There is nothing either to interfere with or stop the action of the ordinary Courts of law in regard to a claim of debt that a landlord may have against a tenant. I therefore think that the second and third pleas in law in this case are not well founded.

"Mr Forsyth appealed to the discretion of the Court, and maintained that as the matter was under the consideration of the Crofters Commissioners, it would be putting parties to needless expense to pronounce a decision in this action. Well, it may be that through the decision of the Crofters Commissioners the landlord may not be able to recover all that he sues for, but if he wishes to obtain a decree valeat quantum, he is entitled to have it. . . . Therefore I shall repel the second and third pleas in law for the defender, . . . and before further answer, allow the pursuers a proof habili modo of their arrears, and to the defender a conjunct probation."

* "OPINION.—I think the petition must be refused. The respondent has applied to the Crofter Commissioners to have his rent fixed on the assumption that his possession is a holding in the sense of the Act. It may turn out not to be so, but the Commissioners have provisionally treated it as a holding and have pronounced orders on that footing. I think I must take it in the meantime that it is, or at least may be a holding. If so, it is within the reach of possibility that the arrears for which the petitioners hold a decree, or part of them, may be remitted, and therefore the petitioners' decree is not unconditional; it is in the position of a decree subject to review, and is therefore contingent and insufficient."

The petitioners reclaimed. It was stated at the hearing that one of the Commissioners had just issued an order dismissing Macleod's application on the ground that he was not tenant of a "holding" in the sense of the Act, but that the order might be appealed against to the three Commissioners within fourteen days in terms of the provisions of the Crofters Commission (Delegation of Powers) Act, 1888, and relative regulations. No. 49.
Dec. 8, 1891.
Stuart &
Stuart v.
Macleod.

Argued for the petitioners;—A decree for payment of the arrears of rent by a crofter was not suspended by the presentation of an application to the Commissioners to fix a fair rent,¹ and the diligence of sequestration could competently follow thereon. No doubt the crofter was protected against eviction, or might get an order prohibiting the sale of his effects, where he had in the first place made an application for the fixing of a fair rent for his holding.* But unless the Crofters Acts specifically abrogated the right to do diligence that right must still subsist. Besides, the debt on which the diligence proceeded here was arrears of the rent of an inn, which was not a "holding" in the sense of the Crofters Act. The defence originally stated to that effect in the action for payment of arrears which had depended before Lord Wellwood had been withdrawn, and the decree was granted in respect of that withdrawal. The Lord Ordinary had no discretion in regard to awarding sequestration or not. The provisions of the 30th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, being fulfilled, the Court was bound to award it.

Argued for the respondent;—Sequestration was an indirect mode of obtaining the removal of a crofter, and as such the use of that diligence would be regarded jealously by the Court.† The debt which was the basis of the diligence in the present case was contingent, because it depended upon the result of the application to the Commissioners what amount of arrears, if any, were to be paid. The Court of Session had no jurisdiction to determine in the circumstances of the present case whether the respondent was a crofter or not, and the Duke of Sutherland's case² was not an authority to that effect. The minute lodged by the respondent in the action before Lord Wellwood, in respect of which the decree which founded the sequestration proceedings was granted, was specially conditioned to be "without prejudice to the defender's application to the Crofters Commission." Further, in the case of Fraser,³ the effect of a decree for payment of arrears in the Court of Session was reserved, and the to found a sequestration.—(Bankruptcy Act, 1856, section 14; Forbes v. Whyte, November 29, 1890, 16 R. 182.)

"The petitioners suggested that the petition might be sisted until the condition was purified, but I know of no precedent for such a course, and see no advantage in it.

"Farther, if I have power to refuse a petition for sequestration on the ground of expediency, I think this petition should be refused on that ground—for this reason—that if sequestration were awarded, and if this debt after a lapse of more than forty days were reduced below £50 the respondent might be unable to get the sequestration recalled. He would suffer a wrong without having any apparent remedy. Having in view the observations of the Lord President in Campbell v. Macfarlane, 1862, 24 D. 1097, I think that, sitting in the Bill Chamber, I cannot hold that I have not that power.

"I think the petition should be refused on these two grounds. I do not find it necessary to deal with the respondent's other objections."

¹ Fraser v. Macdonald, Dec. 7, 1886, 14 R. 181.

² Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 24), sec. 2.

³ Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 24), sec. 3.

⁴ Duke of Sutherland v. Reed, Dec. 18, 1890, 18 R. 252; Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, sec. 25.

⁵ Fraser v. Macdonald, supra.

No. 49.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Stuart &
Stuart v.
Macleod.

amount to be paid, if any, was held to depend upon the result of the application to the Commission. The fact that there was a judgment by one of the Commissioners, to the effect that the respondent was not entitled to the benefits of the Act, did not affect the question of the contingency of the debt so long as an appeal to the three Commissioners was open, as it now was in terms of the provisions of the Crofters Commission (Delegation of Powers) Act, 1888. The debt was therefore clearly contingent, and could not support a petition for sequestration.¹ The granting of sequestration was a matter of discretion where reasonable cause was shewn against it.² There was no race of diligence here, for the landlord was the only creditor, and there was further no danger of dilapidation. The landlord would suffer no hardship by the delay, while the respondent would suffer the greatest hardship if sequestration were granted.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—This is a petition at the instance of Messrs Stuart & Stuart, Writers to the Signet, for sequestration of the estates of Donald Macleod. The Lord Ordinary has refused the application, and the question is whether he has been right in so doing.

It is not disputed that the respondent, Macleod, is subject to the jurisdiction of the Scottish Courts, nor is there any question that he is notour bankrupt under the Debtors Act, 1880, nor again is it disputed that the petitioners have produced oath and vouchers of debt to an amount sufficient to warrant the granting of sequestration. Thus all the requisites for obtaining sequestration are present. But it is maintained by the respondent that the petitioning creditors are not qualified, because the debt on which they found is a contingent debt. If that is so, no doubt under section 14 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sequestration cannot be awarded.

The first question then is whether the debt on which the petitioning creditors found is a contingent debt. That debt is constituted by a decree pronounced on 20th December 1890 by Lord Wellwood for the sum of £52, 10s. of principal with interest, and £37, 5s. 10d. of expenses. The sum of £52, 10s. is said to be a contingent debt, in respect that it represents the arrears of rent of subjects, which are a holding in the sense of the Crofters Act, 1886, and because the respondent having applied to the Crofter Commissioners to have a fair rent fixed, it cannot be known until the result of that application how much of these arrears are really payable to the petitioners. That contention is supported by reference to section 6 of the Crofters Act, which provides, subsection (1), that “the landlord or the crofter may apply to the Crofters Commission to fix the fair rent to be paid by such crofter to the landlord for the holding. . . .” and subsection (5), that “in the proceedings on such application the Crofters Commission shall take account of the amount of arrears of rent due or to become due before the application is finally determined, . . . and may take evidence of all the circumstances which have led to such arrears, and shall decide whether, in view of such circumstances, the whole or what part of such arrears ought to be paid, . . . and whether in one payment or by instalments, and at what dates the same should be paid, and the amount and dates so fixed shall be deemed to be the total amount of such arrears due by the crofter, and the terms at which the same become payable.”

¹ Forbes v. Whyte, Nov. 29, 1890, 18 R. 182.

² Campbell & Beck v. Macfarlane, June 11, 1862, 24 D. 1097, 34 Scot. Jur. 545; Gardner v. Woodside, June 24, 1862, 24 D. 1133, 34 Scot. Jur. 564.

Now, assuming that the respondent is a crofter, and that the rent of which he is in arrear is the rent of a holding in the sense of the Crofters Act, it is difficult not to concur in the Lord Ordinary's finding that the debt in question is a contingent debt, because it cannot be known, until the respondent's application to the Crofters Commissioners has been disposed of, what amount he will have to pay to the petitioners. But, as I have said, that again must of course depend upon whether the subjects, the rent of which is in arrear, are a holding in the sense of the Act, and whether the respondent is a crofter. This leads us to section 34, the definition clause of the Act. A crofter is defined to mean "any person who at the passing of this Act is tenant of a holding from year to year, who resides on his holding, the annual rent of which does not exceed £30 in money, and which is situated in a crofting parish, and the successors of such person in the holding, being his heirs or legatees." A "holding" is defined as "any piece of land held by a crofter, consisting of arable or pasture land, or of land partly pasture, and which has been occupied and used as arable or pasture land (whether such pasture land is held by the crofter alone or in common with others) immediately preceding the passing of this Act, including the site of his dwelling-house, and any offices or other conveniences connected therewith, but does not include garden ground only, appurtenant to a house."

Now, it is clear from these definitions that "holding" does not mean a house let by itself, but a piece of arable or pasture land, or of both, and that the term "crofter" is not applicable to the tenant of a house by itself.

That being so, we must go to the decree constituting the debt to see whether or not it is a decree for arrears of rent due on a holding in the sense of the Act. The decree was given in terms of the conclusions of the libel, but we must examine the record to see what the sum sued for was. The averments there made shew quite distinctly what the issue between the parties was. The pursuers (whose assignees the present petitioners are) maintained that the Scur Inn was let to the defender at a rent of £15 per annum, and that the inn was a perfectly distinct subject from a croft also possessed by the defender; and the defender that the inn was the house of the croft, and that this £15 a-year was the additional rent charged for the house and croft. It is perfectly clear from other parts of the record that the sum of £52, 10s. sued for is the amount of seven half-yearly payments of the rent of the inn and nothing else. After some proceedings the defender by minute withdrew his defences, and the Lord Ordinary, in respect of that minute, pronounced decree in terms of the conclusions of the libel—that is to say, for the amount of the arrears of the rent of the inn. Now, that being so, and there being no arable or pasture land let along with the inn, it is quite clear that this is not a holding in the sense of the Crofters Act, and that the respondent is not a crofter in the sense of the Act. It appears to me, therefore, that the Commissioners have no jurisdiction to deal with the arrears of rent for the inn, and on that ground I am of opinion that these arrears are not a contingent debt, and that the decision of the Lord Ordinary is wrong.

There is another ground on which the Lord Ordinary has decided the case favourably to the respondent, though he gives forth rather an uncertain sound with regard to it. With all deference to the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, I cannot agree that a Lord Ordinary has any discretion to refuse sequestration if all the conditions required by the statute have been complied with by the petitioner. I think that rule is laid down by the late Lord President in very distinct terms in the case of Joel v. Gill, 21 D. 929. His Lordship says (p.

No. 49.
Dec. 8, 1891.
Stuart &
Stuart v.
Macleod.

No. 49.

Dec. 8, 1891.
 Stuart &
 Stuart v.
 Macleod.

937):—"In considering the reclaiming note against this interlocutor, it is not necessary to dispose of all the pleas of the petitioner Joel; but it may be right at once to say, that the Court entirely agree with the concluding remark of the Lord Ordinary in his note, 'that if the case falls within the statute, the Court is bound to award sequestration, and to maintain it when awarded.' In awarding and recalling sequestration we are not exercising any discretion; we have the statute, and the statute only, for our guide in the administration of this branch of the law, and are bound to disregard all considerations of mere equity or expediency. Sequestration being a diligence, and the most comprehensive and stringent of all diligences, it would be most unfortunate if its application and effect depended on anything less unbending than a statutory rule." His Lordship evidently thought it of great importance that this view should be impressed upon the profession, because in a subsequent stage of the same case (22 D. 6) he repeats the sentence which I have quoted from his previous judgment. I must say, for myself, speaking from a somewhat long experience, I have always understood that the Act was so administered. I know of no case in which, dealing with an application for sequestration, the Court has used its discretion, and I do not think section 30 of the Bankruptcy Act is capable of any other construction than that put upon it by the late Lord President. The only construction, I think, which can be put upon that section is that, if the necessary evidence is laid before the Lord Ordinary, the Court must award sequestration, unless the debtor instantly pays the debt or produces written evidence of payment. The Court has no discretion, but is bound, the conditions required by the statute being satisfied, to fulfil the merely ministerial duty of awarding sequestration. I therefore dissent from the view hesitatingly expressed by the Lord Ordinary, and am of opinion that the case should be remitted to him to award sequestration.

LORD M'LAREN.—This is an interesting case, because it for the first time brings an order of the Crofter Commissioners exercising the powers of dealing with private property, vested in them by Act of Parliament, into collision with the ordinary jurisdiction of the Courts of law. The effect of the Crofter Acts is that in certain congested districts of the Highlands the landed proprietors, through their representatives in Parliament, have, as a temporary measure, consented to devolve the administration of part of their property on a Parliamentary Commission, who are to arrange the terms of the holdings of a defined class of tenants on an equitable footing. It is very important to the fair working of the Crofter Acts that their provisions should not be extended to persons for whom they were not intended, and who may be altogether outside the class who are recognised by the statutes as proper subjects of legislative protection. Without proposing to give a legal definition of that class (because the statute gives the definition), I may say that they are tenants who are in the condition of earning a bare subsistence from their holdings, and who are not regarded as independent persons able to treat with their landlords on perfectly equal terms, and to contract for themselves. The tenant of an inn, who is carrying on a mercantile business, cannot be considered as in any proper sense a subject whose motive is such as I have described, and there is nothing in the Crofter Acts which would justify the inclusion of an innkeeper within their scope.

In the present case, the respondent made an application to the Crofter Commissioners to fix a fair rent for the subjects let to him, which included an inn in the Island of Eigg. An application was also made for an order in terms of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1887, restraining all proceedings against him pending the issue of the application. I think that the Commissioners who considered the matter had not perhaps fully realised their duties under the Supplementary Act of 1887 when they issued an order restraining the use of diligence, because, before issuing that order, I think it was incumbent on them to consider whether the petitioner was a crofter in the sense of the Crofters Act. In the absence of such an order by the Commissioners, I do not suppose that any opposition would have been offered to the petition for sequestration, because it had already been determined by a decision of the Second Division of the Court (Fraser v. Macdonald, 14 R. 181) that the dependence of a proceeding before the Crofter Commission was not a ground for suspending the effect of a decree, or the use of execution by a creditor. It was apparently the existence of this order which led the Lord Ordinary to take the view that the debt was a contingent one,—a debt which might or might not continue to have existence according to the action which might ultimately be taken by the Commissioners. I agree with Lord Adam that while the Commissioners must necessarily consider the question whether an applicant is a crofter for the purposes of the special jurisdiction or authority conferred on them by the constituting Act, yet if a dispute arises between landlord and tenant on this point, the Commissioners have no jurisdiction as between landlord and tenant to construe the statute, and to determine whether the tenant is or is not a crofter in the sense of the Act. Their duty is, having found a crofter, to consider the question of fair rent as between him and his landlord, and unless the proprietor and the tenant are agreed that the tenant is a crofter in the sense of the statute and is entitled to its benefits, it is only through the ordinary Courts of the country that the dispute can be finally determined.

I am clearly of opinion in this case that the respondent's house is not a crofter holding, and that the Crofter Commissioners have no authority to regulate the conditions of its tenure. If this is also the opinion of your Lordships, it follows that the Lord Ordinary is in error in treating the sum sued for as a contingent debt, upon which sequestration cannot be awarded.

In regard to the concluding paragraph of the Lord Ordinary's note, I may perhaps be allowed to say that I am not sure that Lord Adam has quite appreciated the position taken by the Lord Ordinary. As I read his Lordship's observations, I am not sure that he says anything more than that if he had a discretion, he would not have allowed sequestration to issue. But I do not understand that the Lord Ordinary claims such a discretion, and it is plain that the Court of Bankruptcy does not possess it. If the Court had a discretion in the present case, I should perhaps have considered that it would be best for all parties that sequestration should be awarded, and that the respondent should get his discharge. In view of the difficulty of coming to an agreement in such a question, it is probably fortunate that such a discretion does not exist, but that the diligence must issue so soon as the statutory conditions have been fulfilled.

In all the circumstances I agree that sequestration must be awarded.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with Lord Adam. If the debt upon which a petition for sequestration is based is a decree for rent payable by a crofter, and if it appears to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff who is asked to award sequestration that the crofter has made an application to the Commissioners which may result in the discharge of a part of the rent, that application would, in my opinion,

No. 49.

Dec. 8, 1891.

Stuart &
Stuart v.
MacLeod.

No. 40.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Stuart &
Stuart v.
Macleod.

render the debt contingent. A debt may be contingent in respect not only of a suspensive, but also of a resolute condition, and if, at the time the petition for sequestration is presented, it appears that the efficacy of the debt may depend upon the result of the statutory application, that would make it contingent. I think the contingency would arise upon the application being made to the Commissioners, and not upon the issue of an interim order for the purpose of restraining a sale of the crofter's effects, because the issue of an order to that effect by the Crofters Commission involves no decision of any question as to the applicant's right to appeal to them. We must assume that in issuing an order restraining the sale of the crofter's effects, the Commissioners were acting properly in the exercise of the discretion which the Act of Parliament confers upon them. But the question whether the debt is contingent or absolute does not depend upon their power to grant an interim stay of diligence, but upon their power to discharge arrears of rent. If the latter power has been legally invoked by a person entitled to appeal to the Commissioners under the Act, the debt is contingent; because it cannot be known whether the result of the application may not be to extinguish it, in whole or in part. But I do not think that the issue of the order makes any difference to the question.

But it is not enough that a bankrupt shall merely allege that he is a crofter. It must appear that he is in fact a crofter, and entitled as such to the benefits of the Act. I can quite imagine that a question of some difficulty might arise if the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff were required to sustain or reject a plea that the debt upon which the sequestration proceeded was contingent, if it were necessary to inquire for that purpose into a disputed statement of facts, and to determine whether in fact the bankrupt was a crofter or not. The Lord Ordinary, in the Bill-Chamber, must proceed upon facts which can be instantly verified. But there is no difficulty of that kind here. I think the question for the consideration of the Lord Ordinary was not whether in point of fact the subject was a crofter holding or not, but whether the decree upon which he was asked to proceed was or was not a decree for the rent of a crofter's holding.

I agree with Lord Adam that when the decree is read with reference to the record it is evident that it is a decree for payment of the rent of an inn, and not of a crofter holding. The defence was that the tenant was a crofter and that defence was withdrawn. If the question had been brought before the Commissioners, in the first instance, they must have considered and decided it in the explication of their statutory jurisdiction. But it was certainly a question which the Court had jurisdiction to decide. It was distinctly raised upon the record, and the defender could not withdraw it from the jurisdiction of the Court by withdrawing his defences for the purpose of appealing to a discretion which he had no title to invoke unless his defence was well founded. The decree which proceeded upon that withdrawal was final and conclusive between the parties, and there was thus sufficient evidence before the Lord Ordinary that the rent for which decree had been given was not the rent of a crofter holding.

It is satisfactory to be informed that the respondent's application has now been rejected by the Commission, because it is thus apparent that the defence which was withdrawn in this Court was not well founded upon its merits. But we must proceed upon the decree, and not upon the subsequent deliverance of the Commissioners.

If the statutory requisites were satisfied, I agree with Lord Adam that the Lord Ordinary had no discretion as to granting or refusing the application for sequestration. His Lordship appears to have had some doubt upon that point, and therefore I think it is important that it should be known that the question was finally determined by the judgment of the late Lord President in Joel v. Macleod. No. 49.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Stuart &
Stuart v.
Macleod.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur in the judgment proposed by Lord Adam, and on the grounds stated by his Lordship. I consider that the interlocutor of Lord Wellwood, pronounced on the record before him, concluded adversely to Mr Macleod the question whether the arrears of rent were due for such a holding as to make those arrears liable to be cancelled under the Crofters Act. Holding that decree, the petitioners were entitled to sequestration as creditors in a debt due and not contingent, and I think they ought to have obtained it.

THE COURT accordingly recalled the interlocutor of 22d August 1891, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to sequestrate the respondent's estates.

STUART & STUART, W.S.—EMSLIE & GUTHRIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

JAMES WALLACE (Inspector of St Nicholas, Aberdeen), Pursuer (Respondent).—Comrie Thomson—Watt.

No. 50.

GEORGE ROSS (Inspector of Laurencekirk), Defender (Appellant).—Jameson—Crole.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Wallace v.
Ross.

Proof—Family tradition—Poor—Settlement.—In an action by a relieving parish against a parish alleged to be that of the pauper's birth, the sole proof that the pauper had been born in the defending parish consisted of the testimony of the pauper, who was sixty-nine years of age, and of his sister, who deposed that their mother, now deceased, had frequently told them that the pauper was born at Scotston, in the defending parish, and that they always understood that he was born there. Held (diss. Lord Young) that it was not proved that the pauper was born in the defending parish.

JAMES WALLACE, inspector of poor of the parish of St Nicholas, Aberdeen, 2d Division, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Stonehaven against George Ross, Sheriff of Aberdeen, Banff, and Kincardine, inspector of poor of Laurencekirk, for payment of £24, 7s. 2d. expended by the pursuer's parish on a pauper named John Duncan.

The ground of action was that Duncan had been born in the parish of Laurencekirk.

The defender denied that Duncan had been born in Laurencekirk. He maintained that he had been born in a house on a part of the farm of Haddo which lay in the parish of Garvock, which adjoins Laurencekirk.

A proof was led. It was proved that the pauper, who was about sixty-nine years of age, was the son of David Duncan, a farm-servant, who had been employed on various farms in Kincardineshire in the years prior and subsequent to the pauper's birth. The whole evidence brought to establish that the pauper was born at Scotston in Laurencekirk was that of the pauper himself and of his sister, who was about a year and a-half older. They both stated that their mother, who had been many years dead, had frequently told them that the pauper was born at Scotston in Laurencekirk, and that they always understood that he was born there. Another witness for the pursuer, a man named Balfour, who was about ninety years of age, and knew the pauper's parents, stated that the pauper was born "at Haddo or Scotston," and that he remembered his parents flitting from Haddo to Sillycoats in St Cyrus parish shortly after the pauper was born.

The Sheriff-substitute (Brown), holding that it was proved that the

No. 49.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Stuart &
Stuart v.
Macleod.

render the debt contingent. A debt may be contingent in respect not only of a suspensive, but also of a resolutive condition, and if, at the time the petition for sequestration is presented, it appears that the efficacy of the debt may depend upon the result of the statutory application, that would make it contingent. I think the contingency would arise upon the application being made to the Commissioners, and not upon the issue of an interim order for the purpose of restraining a sale of the crofter's effects, because the issue of an order to that effect by the Crofters Commission involves no decision of any question as to the applicant's right to appeal to them. We must assume that in issuing an order restraining the sale of the crofter's effects, the Commissioners were acting properly in the exercise of the discretion which the Act of Parliament confers upon them. But the question whether the debt is contingent or absolute does not depend upon their power to grant an interim stay of diligence, but upon their power to discharge arrears of rent. If the latter power has been legally invoked by a person entitled to appeal to the Commissioners under the Act, the debt is contingent; because it cannot be known whether the result of the application may not be to extinguish it, in whole or in part. But I do not think that the issue of the order makes any difference to the question.

But it is not enough that a bankrupt shall merely allege that he is a crofter. It must appear that he is in fact a crofter, and entitled as such to the benefits of the Act. I can quite imagine that a question of some difficulty might arise if the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff were required to sustain or reject a plea that the debt upon which the sequestration proceeded was contingent, if it were necessary to inquire for that purpose into a disputed statement of facts, and to determine whether in fact the bankrupt was a crofter or not. The Lord Ordinary, in the Bill-Chamber, must proceed upon facts which can be instantly verified. But there is no difficulty of that kind here. I think the question for the consideration of the Lord Ordinary was not whether in point of fact the subject was a crofter holding or not, but whether the decree upon which he was asked to proceed was or was not a decree for the rent of a crofter's holding.

I agree with Lord Adam that when the decree is read with reference to the record it is evident that it is a decree for payment of the rent of an inn, and not of a crofter holding. The defence was that the tenant was a crofter and that defence was withdrawn. If the question had been brought before the Commissioners, in the first instance, they must have considered and decided it: in the explication of their statutory jurisdiction. But it was certainly a question which the Court had jurisdiction to decide. It was distinctly raised upon the record, and the defender could not withdraw it from the jurisdiction of the Court by withdrawing his defences for the purpose of appealing to a discretion which he had no title to invoke unless his defence was well founded. The decree which proceeded upon that withdrawal was final and conclusive between the parties, and there was thus sufficient evidence before the Lord Ordinary that the rent for which decree had been given was not the rent of a crofter holding.

It is satisfactory to be informed that the respondent's application has now been rejected by the Commission, because it is thus apparent that the defence which was withdrawn in this Court was not well founded upon its merits. But we must proceed upon the decree, and not upon the subsequent deliverance of the Commissioners.

If the statutory requisites were satisfied, I agree with Lord Adam that the Lord Ordinary had no discretion as to granting or refusing the application for sequestration. His Lordship appears to have had some doubt upon that point, and therefore I think it is important that it should be known that the question was finally determined by the judgment of the late Lord President in Joel v. Macleod.

 Dec. 8, 1891.
 Stuart & Stuart v. Macleod.
 G.W.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur in the judgment proposed by Lord Adam, and on the grounds stated by his Lordship. I consider that the interlocutor of Lord Wellwood, pronounced on the record before him, concluded adversely to Mr Macleod the question whether the arrears of rent were due for such a holding as to make those arrears liable to be cancelled under the Crofters Act. Holding that decree, the petitioners were entitled to sequestration as creditors in a debt due and not contingent, and I think they ought to have obtained it.

THE COURT accordingly recalled the interlocutor of 22d August 1891, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to sequester the respondent's estates.

STUART & STUART, W.S.—EMSLIE & GUTHRIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

JAMES WALLACE (Inspector of St Nicholas, Aberdeen), Pursuer (Respondent).—Comrie Thomson—Watt.

No. 50.

GEORGE ROSS (Inspector of Laurencekirk), Defender (Appellant).—Jameson—Crole.

Dec. 8, 1891.
 Wallace v. Ross.

Proof—Family tradition—Poor—Settlement.—In an action by a relieving parish against a parish alleged to be that of the pauper's birth, the sole proof that the pauper had been born in the defending parish consisted of the testimony of the pauper, who was sixty-nine years of age, and of his sister, who deposed that their mother, now deceased, had frequently told them that the pauper was born at Scotston, in the defending parish, and that they always understood that he was born there. Held (diss. Lord Young) that it was not proved that the pauper was born in the defending parish.

JAMES WALLACE, inspector of poor of the parish of St Nicholas, Aberdeen, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Stonehaven against George Ross, inspector of poor of Laurencekirk, for payment of £24, 7s. 2d. expended by the pursuer's parish on a pauper named John Duncan.
 2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Aberdeen, Banff, and Kincardine.

The ground of action was that Duncan had been born in the parish of Laurencekirk.

The defender denied that Duncan had been born in Laurencekirk. He maintained that he had been born in a house on a part of the farm of Haddo which lay in the parish of Garvock, which adjoins Laurencekirk.

A proof was led. It was proved that the pauper, who was about sixty-nine years of age, was the son of David Duncan, a farm-servant, who had been employed on various farms in Kincardineshire in the years prior and subsequent to the pauper's birth. The whole evidence brought to establish that the pauper was born at Scotston in Laurencekirk was that of the pauper himself and of his sister, who was about a year and a-half older. They both stated that their mother, who had been many years dead, had frequently told them that the pauper was born at Scotston in Laurencekirk, and that they always understood that he was born there. Another witness for the pursuer, a man named Balfour, who was about ninety years of age, and knew the pauper's parents, stated that the pauper was born "at Haddo or Scotston," and that he remembered his parents flitting from Haddo to Sillycoats in St Cyrus parish shortly after the pauper was born.

The Sheriff-substitute (Brown), holding that it was proved that the

No. 50.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Wallace v.
Ross.

pauper was born at the house on the farm of Haddo in Garvock parish, found that "the pursuer has failed to prove" that the pauper was born in Laurencekirk, and assoilzied the defender.

The Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) recalled this judgment, found that the pauper had a birth settlement in Laurencekirk, and granted decree in terms of the conclusions of the action.*

The defender appealed, and argued;—On the evidence it had not been proved that the pauper was born in Laurencekirk. On the question whether the statement of the pauper's mother, as repeated by the pauper and his sister, that the pauper had been born at Scotston, could be received as evidence of family tradition, it was maintained that that was only the evidence of one person, and did not prove the fact. Such a single statement, though repeated by two members of the family, did not constitute family tradition as the term was understood in the law of evidence.¹ The pursuer in attempting to fix liability on another parish must prove that the pauper had a settlement there by evidence just as distinct and unambiguous as the Court required for any other purpose.²

The pursuer's argument sufficiently appears from the opinions.
At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer in this case is the inspector of the parish of St Nicholas, Aberdeen, and his parish having given some relief to a pauper of the name of John Duncan, he now raises this action against the inspector of poor of the parish of Laurencekirk for the purpose of compelling the defender to repay the aliment given by the parish of St Nicholas, Aberdeen, to the pauper. The ground of action alleged is that Laurencekirk is the parish of the pauper's birth. The Sheriffs in the Court below have differed as to the result of the evidence—the Sheriff-substitute having held, and as he states as a matter of easy inference from what was before him, that the pursuer had failed to prove his case. The Sheriff has differed from that opinion, and has decided in favour of the pursuer. I do not think it necessary in this case to go into the evidence at all. The evidence on which the pursuer relies in order to prove his case is the evidence of the recollection of the sister of the pauper, and of the pauper himself, as to what his mother had told them was the place of the pauper's birth. Beyond that, so far as the pursuer is concerned, there is no evidence at all. Now, on the question of evidence, I have come to the conclusion that the evidence is not sufficient to establish the pursuer's case, and I agree with the Sheriff-substitute in thinking so. The case is put on the other side as a case of family tradition; but it does not seem to me that this is a case really of family tradition at all. The pauper's mother is said to have told her son and daughter that he was born

* "NOTE.— . . . I cannot imagine a man going through life and reaching the allotted three score years and ten completely mistaken on a point which with all men, poor as well as rich, is a matter of affectionate interest, the place where he first saw the light, without discovering the error. This it is that makes family tradition valuable as evidence, for it relates to matters on which people are careful to be accurate, and although it may be overturned by some opposing fact, it is not to be rejected for reasons which never pass beyond conjecture and surmise. I have therefore found the parish of Laurencekirk liable to relieve St Nicholas of this pauper."

¹ Macpherson v. Reid's Trustees (Shandwick case), Nov. 17, 1876, 4 R. 132. Lord President at p. 138; Rex v. Erith, 1807, 8 East. 539; Taylor on Evidence, sec. 645-6; Phillips on Evidence, i. 201; Greenleaf on Evidence, secs. 104, 131.

² Lemon v. Wallace, Nov. 26, 1887, 15 R. 92.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—" . . . Find that the No. 50.
pursuer has failed to prove that John Duncan, the pauper, was born in the parish of Laurencekirk : Sustain the appeal ; recall the Dec. 8, 1891.
interlocutor of the Sheriff appealed against, affirm the judgment Wallace v.
of the Sheriff-substitute, assolvie the defender from the conclu- Ross.
sions of the action," &c.

ANDREW URQUHART, S.S.C.—WILLIAM B. RAINNIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

FRANCIS MORE (Robertson Chaplin's Trustee), Pursuer (Respondent).— No. 51.
W. Campbell—C. K. Mackenzie.

MRS KATHERINE ROBERTSON KIRKLAND OR HOILE AND OTHERS, Dec. 8, 1891.
Defenders (Reclaimers).—J. A. Reid—Law. Chaplin's
Hoile. Trustee v.
Ross.

MRS KATHERINE ROBERTSON KIRKLAND OR HOILE, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—
J. A. Reid—Law.

FRANCIS MORE (Robertson Chaplin's Trustee), Defender (Respondent).—
W. Campbell—C. K. Mackenzie.

Succession — Liferent — Protected liferent — Irritant clause — Bankruptcy — Trustee — Power of sale.—By disposition and settlement an estate was conveyed to certain persons in liferent and certain other persons in fee under a declaration prohibiting the liferenters from "selling, mortgaging, or otherwise disposing of" their interest, and further declaring, that "such sales and mortgages" should be void, that "all deeds or instruments purporting to be a sale or mortgage of such interest or part thereof," should be null and void, and that "all parties signing such deeds or instruments" should forfeit their rights in favour of the person next in succession. The liferenter in possession under this disposition granted a trust-disposition for behoof of his creditors, conveying the liferent to the trustees with a power of sale ; subsequently his estates were sequestrated.

Held (1) that the trust-disposition was neither a ~~sale nor a mortgage~~, and consequently was not struck at by the clause of forfeiture ; and (2) that as that clause did not strike at the ~~diligence of creditors~~, the liferent was vested in the trustee by the sequestration ; and that the trustee was entitled to sell the liferent interest without incurring the forfeiture.

(SEE ante, Chaplin's Trustees v. Hoile, Oct. 30, 1890, 18 R. 27.)

George Robertson Chaplin, of Colliston, died in 1869, leaving a disposition and settlement, dated in 1867, by which he conveyed the lands of Cookston and Unthank, in Forfarshire, to David Souter Robertson, of Lawhead, in liferent, for his liferent use allenary, and after his death to George Robertson Chaplin, youngest son of the said David Souter Robertson, also in liferent, for his liferent use allenary, and to the heirs of the body of the said George Robertson Chaplin, in fee ; whom failing, to Thomas Robertson Chaplin, third son of the said David Souter Robertson, in liferent, and to the heirs of his, the said Thomas Robertson Chaplin's body, in fee ; whom failing, to Katherine Robertson Kirkland or Hoile, widow of John Hoile, merchant in Dundee, for her liferent use allenary, and the heirs of her body in fee ; whom failing, to the heirs of the body of the said David Souter Robertson in fee ; whom failing, to the heirs of the body of Mrs Margaret Souter or Kirkland, the testator's grandniece, in fee.

By the disposition and settlement Mr Robertson Chaplin also disposed the lands of Bowhouse in Stirlingshire to the said David Souter Robertson, in liferent, for his liferent right and use allenary, and after his

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

No. 50.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Wallace v.
Ross.

the view that we must give effect to the family tradition, and I am not sure that that is to be held as insufficient evidence because it resolves into the statement of a single witness. But, finding that the majority of your Lordships are of opinion that that is insufficient, and seeing further that the family tradition is largely discredited by the evidence of William Balfour, I am disposed upon the whole to concur with your Lordship.

LORD TRAYNER.—The question, and the only question raised in this case, is whether the pauper was born in the parish of Laurencekirk. The pursuer's case is based upon the averment that the pauper was born in that parish, and the onus of proving that averment of course is on the pursuer. In my opinion he has failed to discharge that onus.

The only evidence adduced by the pursuer is the statement of the pauper and of his sister that they were told by their mother that the pauper was born in Laurencekirk. This evidence is quite competent, because the pauper's mother is now dead. But it is the evidence of only one witness, although repeated by two. If the mother had been alive her unsupported testimony would have been insufficient to establish the pursuer's case. It does not become sufficient because, being dead, what she did say when alive, and what probably she would have said had she been examined in causa is deposed to by the two persons to whom, in life, she said it. The Sheriff thinks this evidence is sufficient to prove the fact alleged because it is "family tradition." I think the Sheriff is in error in so describing the evidence, and in attributing to it the weight and importance which the law attaches in certain cases to what is properly called family tradition. In questions of pedigree (including such a question as we are here dealing with, as to where a certain person was born) evidence of family tradition is of great importance, but I take it that it is so because, being handed down from generation to generation, and spoken of among the various family relations of each generation, the fact spoken to would probably be contradicted or impugned by some of them if the statement made was not true. A statement current among persons most likely to know of its truth, and never impugned, although often repeated, may very well be accepted as true in after time. And this is what I understand to be evidence by family tradition. But the single statement or repeated statement by a mother to her two children is not of this character. In this case the children had no knowledge whether their mother's statement was correct or erroneous, and as far as the proof shews, the statement by the mother as to the birthplace of the pauper was made to nobody except her two children. The ground, therefore, on which the Sheriff proceeds seems to me not to be applicable to the case. I leave out of account the evidence of the pursuer's own witness, Balfour, which, if it does not contradict the pursuer's averment, raises great doubt of the accuracy of the statement made by the pauper's mother, whose statement, after all, although made with perfect honesty, may be wrong. Nor do I put much stress, if any, upon the fact that the pauper does not seem to be a witness whose accuracy even in repeating what he says he heard can be entirely relied on,—not because of dishonesty or untruthfulness, but from want of accurate or distinct recollection. I will assume that the pauper and his sister repeat quite correctly what their mother said, but even on that assumption I think the evidence of the one witness, the mother, is insufficient for the pursuer's case. I therefore think, with the Sheriff-substitute, that the pursuer has failed to prove the averment, proof of which is essential to his succeeding in the present action.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . Find that the pursuer has failed to prove that John Duncan, the pauper, was born in the parish of Laurencekirk: Sustain the appeal; recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff appealed against, affirm the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action," &c.

No. 50.
Dec. 8, 1891.
Wallace v.
Ross.

ANDREW URQUHART, S.S.C.—WILLIAM B. RAINNIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

FRANCIS MORE (Robertson Chaplin's Trustee), Pursuer (Respondent).— No. 51.
W. Campbell—C. K. Mackenzie.

MRS KATHERINE ROBERTSON KIRKLAND OR HOILE AND OTHERS, Dec. 8, 1891.
Defenders (Reclaimers).—J. A. Reid—Law. Chaplin's
Trustee v.
Hoile.

MRS KATHERINE ROBERTSON KIRKLAND OR HOILE, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—
J. A. Reid—Law.

FRANCIS MORE (Robertson Chaplin's Trustee), Defender (Respondent).—
W. Campbell—C. K. Mackenzie.

Succession — Liferent — Protected liferent — Irritant clause — Bankruptcy — Trustee — Power of sale.—By disposition and settlement an estate was conveyed to certain persons in liferent and certain other persons in fee under a declaration prohibiting the liferenters from "selling, mortgaging, or otherwise disposing of" their interest, and further declaring, that "such sales and mortgages" should be void, that "all deeds or instruments purporting to be a sale or mortgage of such interest or part thereof," should be null and void, and that "all parties signing such deeds or instruments" should forfeit their rights in favour of the person next in succession. The liferenter in possession under this disposition granted a trust-disposition for behoof of his creditors, conveying the liferent to the trustees with a power of sale; subsequently his estates were sequestrated.

Held (1) that the trust-disposition was neither a sale nor a mortgage, and consequently was not struck at by the clause of forfeiture; and (2) that as that clause did not strike at the diligence of creditors, the liferent was vested in the trustee by the sequestration; and that the trustee was entitled to sell the liferent interest without incurring the forfeiture.

(SEE ante, Chaplin's Trustees v. Hoile, Oct. 30, 1890, 18 R. 27.)

George Robertson Chaplin, of Colliston, died in 1869, leaving a disposition and settlement, dated in 1867, by which he conveyed the lands of Cookston and Unthank, in Forfarshire, to David Souter Robertson, of Lawhead, in liferent, for his liferent use allenary, and after his death to George Robertson Chaplin, youngest son of the said David Souter Robertson, also in liferent, for his liferent use allenary, and to the heirs of the body of the said George Robertson Chaplin, in fee; whom failing, to Thomas Robertson Chaplin, third son of the said David Souter Robertson, in liferent, and to the heirs of his, the said Thomas Robertson Chaplin's body, in fee; whom failing, to Katherine Robertson Kirkland or Hoile, widow of John Hoile, merchant in Dundee, for her liferent use allenary, and the heirs of her body in fee; whom failing, to the heirs of the body of the said David Souter Robertson in fee; whom failing, to the heirs of the body of Mrs Margaret Souter or Kirkland, the testator's grandniece, in fee.

By the disposition and settlement Mr Robertson Chaplin also disposed the lands of Bowhouse in Stirlingshire to the said David Souter Robertson, in liferent, for his liferent right and use allenary, and after his

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

No. 51.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Chaplin's
Trustee v.
Hoile.

death to the said Thomas Robertson Chaplin in liferent, for his liferent right and use allenary, and to the heirs of his body in fee; whom failing, to the said George Robertson Chaplin in liferent, for his liferent right and use allenary, and the heirs of his body in fee; whom failing, to the heirs of the body of the said David Souter Robertson in fee; whom failing, to the heirs of the body of the said Mrs Margaret Souter or Kirkland in fee.

By the disposition and settlement Mr Robertson Chaplin further disposed the lands of Auchengray in Lanarkshire to the said David Souter Robertson in liferent, for his liferent right and use allenary, and after his death to the said George Robertson Chaplin, his son, in liferent, for his liferent right and use allenary, and to the heirs of the body of the said George Robertson Chaplin in fee; whom failing, to Stewart Souter Robertson, eldest son of the said David Souter Robertson, in liferent, for his liferent right and use allenary, and to the heirs of the body of the said Stewart Souter Robertson in fee; whom failing, to David Souter Robertson, son of David Souter Robertson the elder, in liferent, for his liferent right and use allenary, and to the heirs of his body in fee; whom failing, to the heirs of the body of the said David Souter Robertson the elder in fee; whom failing, to the heirs of the body of the said Mrs Margaret Souter Robertson or Kirkland in fee.

The said disposition was granted under certain conditions, which were declared to be inherent qualities of the conveyance, and, inter alia, under the conditions that "all parties who shall at my death, or at any time thereafter, have any beneficial interest, contingent or otherwise, under this settlement, are hereby prohibited from selling, mortgaging, or otherwise disposing of such interest, excepting always sales or mortgages by parties who are absolute fiars of any of the said estates, and it is hereby stipulated and provided that such sales or mortgages, if made, shall be void, and all deeds or instruments purporting to be a sale or mortgage of such interest, or any part thereof, shall be null and void, and all parties signing such deeds or instruments shall thereby forfeit and lose all right and benefit under this settlement, and shall give place to the next in succession who shall be entitled to come in the right and place of the party signing such deeds or instruments"; it being further declared that "the real burdens and conditions, provisions, and stipulations before written shall be read and construed along with and as inseparable from the several dispositive clauses before written, under which real burdens, conditions, provisions, and stipulations these presents are granted, and shall be accepted of by my said disponees respectively."

David Souter Robertson, of Lawhead, the liferenter first called under all the foregoing destinations, died in November 1888. On his death his youngest son George Robertson Chaplin succeeded to the liferent of the lands of Cookston, Unthank, and Auchengray, under the first and third branches of the foregoing disposition, and his third son Thomas Robertson Chaplin to the liferent of the lands of Bowhouse, under the second branch of the disposition.

On 22d February 1889 Thomas Robertson Chaplin granted a trust-disposition whereby he disposed, assigned, conveyed, and made over to and in favour of George Auldjo Jamieson and Francis More, all his means, estate, and effects, heritable and moveable, real and personal, and in particular his right of liferent of and in the said lands and estates of Bowhouse, and his prospective right of liferent to Cookston, Unthank, and Auchengray, with a declaration that the said George Auldjo Jamieson and Francis More, as trustees for his creditors, should enter into possession of the whole estates thereby conveyed, and hold and administer the same for behoof of his creditors in debts due by him at the date of the deed; and a further declaration that the said trustees might exercise, during the subsistence of the trust, at their discretion, every power of administration and management of proprietors, and should have power to dispoise, in security of money borrowed for the purposes of the trust, the estate thereby conveyed, and his whole right, title, and interest therein, whether of fee or liferent, and to include a power of sale in the bonds; and should have power also to sell and dispose of the lands, estate, and property falling under the trust, either by public roup or private sale, on such conditions and at such prices as they might think fit; and should have power also, in case it should appear to them in their sole discretion to be expedient and desirable, to apply for an Act of Parliament for authority to sell the liferent of the said lands and estates of Cookston, &c.

No. 51.
Dec. 8, 1891.
Chaplin's
Trustee v.
Hoile.

On 23d February 1889 George Robertson Chaplin granted a trust-disposition, mutatis mutandis, identical with the foregoing.

On 30th December 1890 and 30th January 1891 the estates of George Robertson Chaplin and Thomas Robertson Chaplin respectively were sequestrated under the Bankruptcy Acts, and Francis More was appointed trustee on the sequestrated estates.

On 7th May 1891 More, as trustee on the two sequestrated estates, brought an action for declarator that as trustee foresaid he had right to sell the liferent interests of George Robertson Chaplin and Thomas Robertson Chaplin in the lands of Cookston, Unthank, and Auchengray, and of Bowhouse respectively, and to dispoise and assign the said liferent rights and interests without incurring any irritancy or forfeiture under the disposition and settlement of Mr Robertson Chaplin of Colliston.

The persons called as defenders were, besides the two bankrupts, a number of persons contingently interested under Mr Robertson Chaplin's disposition and settlement, who were stated by the pursuer to be the whole persons so interested.

Mrs Hoile and her children lodged defences.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer is entitled to decree, because the liferent rights in question are vested in him, absolutely and irredeemably, to the same effect as if a decree of adjudication, subject to no legal reversion, had been pronounced in his favour, and had been duly recorded. (2) The liferents in question are rights which (1) the bankrupts might gratuitously convey; and (2) their creditors might attach.

Mrs Hoile and her children founded on the trust-dispositions of 22d and 23d February 1889, and pleaded;—(2) Inasmuch as no decision in this action will be res judicata in any action challenging the validity of the proposed sale, the action is premature and incompetent. (3) The liferent interests in question not being adjudgable, no title to the same has passed to the pursuers. (4) That the said interests shall not be sold is an inherent "quality" of the same, and the pursuers can have no higher right or title with reference to the same than the bankrupts. (5) In respect that by signing the trust-deeds for behoof of their creditors referred to, the liferenters have forfeited the said interests, the action should be dismissed.

On 29th May 1891 Mrs Hoile raised an action against the two Robertson Chaplins and Messrs Jamieson and More, as the trustees under their trust-dispositions and in their sequestrations, concluding for declarator that by signing and delivering their trust-dispositions the Robertson Chaplins had respectively incurred the irritancy and forfeiture provided under Mr Robertson Chaplin's disposition and settlement, and so forfeited their liferent interests in the lands of Cookston and Unthank, &c., and "that the pursuer, for the liferent interest in the said lands and

No. 51.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Chaplin's
Trustee v.
Hoile.

estates of Cookston and Unthank, given, granted, and disposed to her as the substitute next in succession after the defenders George Robertson Chaplin and Thomas Robertson Chaplin in existence, is entitled, under and in virtue of the aforesaid real burdens, conditions, provisions, and stipulations, to come in the right and place of the defenders George Robertson Chaplin and Thomas Robertson Chaplin: And that from and after the said 23d day of February 1889 the said lands and estates, with the rents, maills, and duties of the same, have fallen, devolved and accresced, and do now belong, to the pursuer in liferent and the heirs of her body in fee, subject to defeasance, in the event of either the defender George Robertson Chaplin or the defender Thomas Robertson Chaplin dying survived by heirs of his body."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) On a sound construction of the said disposition and settlement, the trust-disposition of George Robertson Chaplin condescended on was a deed or instrument whereby he sold, mortgaged, or otherwise disposed of his liferent interest in the lands mentioned, or a deed or instrument purporting to be a sale or mortgage of such interest, and he has therefore forfeited and lost the same. (2) On a sound construction of the said disposition and settlement, the trust-disposition of Thomas Robertson Chaplin condescended on was a deed or instrument whereby he sold, mortgaged, or otherwise disposed of his prospective liferent interest in the lands mentioned, or a deed or instrument purporting to be a sale or mortgage of such interest, and he has therefore forfeited and lost the same. (3) The pursuer, as next in succession after the defenders George Robertson Chaplin and Thomas Robertson Chaplin is entitled to come in their right and place, and to have decree as concluded for.

More, as trustee on the sequestrated estates, lodged defences, and pleaded;—(2) The defender is entitled to absolvitor, in respect the liferenters did not incur a forfeiture of their rights by granting the conveyances in question.

On 12th August 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Low), in the action at More's instance, granted decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

* "OPINION.—In my opinion the pursuer is entitled to the decree which he asks, the liferents which are the subjects of this action being liferents in possession of the bankrupts.

"The case seems to me to depend upon whether, by the clause of Mr Robertson Chaplin's disposition and settlement, quoted in article 4 of the condescendence, the diligence of creditors of liferenters in possession is excluded.

"The clause, in the first place, prohibits, inter alios, a liferenter 'from selling, mortgaging, or otherwise disposing of his interest.' In the second place, it is provided that 'such sales or mortgages, if made, shall be void, and all deeds or instruments purporting to be a sale or mortgage of such interest, or any part thereof, shall be null and void.' In the third place, it is provided that 'all parties signing such deeds or instruments' shall forfeit their rights, and give place to the person next in succession.

"It is to be observed that there is this difference between the clause of prohibition and the clauses declaring the deeds null and the right of the grantor forfeited, that the former clause strikes not only at sales and mortgages, but also at 'otherwise disposing of' the liferent, while the latter clauses refer to sales or mortgages only.

"It was contended for the defenders that the deed should be read as if the words 'or otherwise disposing of,' or equivalent words, had been continued throughout all the clauses. If the deed were so construed, it would strike at any sort of disposition, and probably even a gratuitous disposition would incur a forfeiture. In my opinion, however, it is not legitimate to read into the clause any words not inserted by the granter. It may be that the general words were

On the same date his Lordship, in the other action, assolized the No. 51.
defenders.*

Dec. 8, 1891.

omitted from the later clauses by mistake. But I cannot tell whether that was so or not, and I must assume that what the granter has said is that which he intended to say. Chaplin's
Trustee v.
Hoile.

"The clause therefore stands thus:—'Selling, mortgaging, and otherwise disposing of' the liferents are prohibited; but in the case of sales and mortgages only is the transaction to be null, and the right of the seller or mortgagor forfeited. In these circumstances, it seems to me that a gift of the liferent could not be challenged, and if that is the case I do not think that it is possible to say that the diligence of creditors is excluded.

"Even if the general words 'or otherwise disposing of' are to be held as implied in all the clauses, I am by no means satisfied that the diligence of creditors would be excluded, because I think that a clause of this sort is directed against voluntary alienations, and not against alienations brought about by operation of law without the consent and contrary to the wish of the liferenter.

"By virtue of the 102d section of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856, the pursuer is in the same position as if he had obtained a decree of adjudication of the liferents, subject to no legal reversion. If therefore the diligence of creditors is not excluded, it follows that the right to the liferents is now vested in the pursuer, and that he is entitled to sell the liferents without incurring any irritancy or forfeiture, because he would sell as in his own right under the implied decree of adjudication, and not as in right of the liferenters.

"It was further contended that nothing had vested in the pursuer, because prior to the sequestration a forfeiture had been incurred by the liferenters having granted trust-deeds by which they conveyed these liferents to trustees for behoof of creditors. This question is directly raised in an action brought by Mrs Hoile to have it found that by executing and delivering the trust-deeds Messrs George and Thomas Robertson Chaplin forfeited the liferents. The present case and that at the instance of Mrs Hoile were argued before me at the same time, and I refer to my opinion in the latter case for the grounds upon which, in my judgment, the trust-deeds did not operate a forfeiture."

* "OPINION.—The pursuer in this case seeks to have it declared that Messrs George and Thomas Robertson Chaplin forfeited the liferent rights which they had in certain estates under their father's settlement, by having granted in 1889 trust-deeds for behoof of their creditors, by which they conveyed to trustees the liferent rights in question. It is not disputed that if a forfeiture has been incurred the liferents devolve upon the pursuer.

"The pursuer founds upon the clause in the late Mr Robertson Chaplin's settlement quoted in article 1 of the condescendence.

"That clause prohibits inter alios a liferenter taking under the settlement 'from selling, mortgaging, or otherwise disposing of' his interest, and it is then declared that 'such sales or mortgages' shall be void, that 'all deeds or instruments purporting to be a sale or mortgage' shall be null and void, and that all parties signing 'such deeds or instruments' shall forfeit their right in favour of the person next in succession.

"The pursuer maintains that the trust-deeds to which I have referred are struck at by this clause, and that the execution and delivery of them involved a forfeiture of the rights of the granters in favour of the pursuer.

"I am of opinion that the contention of the pursuer is not well founded. It is true that the part of the clause prohibiting alienation refers not only to sales or mortgages, but to 'otherwise disposing of' the interest, and the latter words are perhaps wide enough to cover a trust-deed for creditors; but the part of the clause in which the transaction is declared void and a forfeiture to be incurred refers only to 'sales and mortgages.' I do not think that it would be legitimate to read into the clause any words which it does not contain, and therefore I am of opinion that no forfeiture is incurred unless the liferent is either sold or mortgaged.

"In the present case there was no sale. The trust-deeds are very much in

No. 51.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Chaplin's
Trustee v.
Hoile.

Mrs Hoile and her children reclaimed, and argued ;—By granting the trust-deeds the liferenters had incurred a forfeiture, for the conditions of the disposition and settlement had been recognised as essential conditions of the liferenters' right.¹ The trust-dispositions were either a sale in the sense that they were an alienation for a consideration—the consideration that the creditors should abstain from diligence—or, at all events, they were mortgages. "Mortgage" was not a word of art in Scots law, but its meaning was sufficiently clear, and it embraced trust-deeds like the present. At anyrate, the irritant clause was to be read in the light of the prohibitory clause, and hence the words "or otherwise disposing of" were to be read into the irritant clause. The malignant rules of construction applied in the case of deeds of entail had no place here, when the question was simply one of testamentary intention. The testator's intention was that if the liferenters should alienate their right, that right should determine. That was a legal intention, and must be given effect to.² 2. The action of declarator by the trustees was premature, for the trustee might never sell, and the Court would not decide such a question ab ante.³ But in any case decree ought not to be granted. The trustee took the estate tantum et tale as it stood in the bankrupts, and they could not themselves have sold.

Argued for the trustee ;—1. The irritant clause struck at sales and mortgages only ; and these trust-deeds were neither. Such a clause was to be strictly construed, the presumption being for liberty.⁴ Even if an irritancy had been incurred, the sequestration had the effect of purging it.⁵

the ordinary form. The estates of the granters, and, inter alia, the liferent rights, are conveyed to trustees, who are authorised to enter into possession and to administer for behoof of the creditors. A general power of sale is given to the trustees, and they are empowered, if they think it expedient, to apply for an Act of Parliament for authority to sell the liferented lands. Such a deed may result in a sale ; and a sale by the trustees under it would, in so far as the forfeiture clause is concerned, be equivalent to a sale by the grantor ; but the deed does not itself constitute or operate a sale.

"Is, then, a trust-deed for behoof of creditors a mortgage within the meaning of the clause ? 'Mortgage' is not, I imagine, a proper term of Scotch law at all, and I do not know what precisely is the meaning and effect of the word. Prima facie a trust-deed for behoof of creditors is not a mortgage, and certainly is not (to use the words of the clause in the settlement) a deed 'purporting to be a mortgage.' I believe, however, that the right of a mortgagee is somewhat similar to that of the creditor in a bond and disposition in security ; and I think that the term 'mortgage,' as used in the clause, may fairly be taken as referring to the conveyance of the liferent right, or whatever the interest of the party may be, to a creditor in security, and for payment of his debt. But that is not what is done in a trust-deed for behoof of creditors. There is no conveyance to any creditor, but an assignation of the right to trustees, in order that they may administer it for behoof of the general body of creditors. I think that it would be an unwarranted stretch of language to call such a transaction a mortgage.

"I am therefore of opinion that no forfeiture has been incurred, and that the defenders are entitled to absolvitor."

¹ Chaplin's Trustees v. Hoile, 18 R. 27.

² Ex parte Eyston, In re Throckmorton, 1877, L. R., 7 Chanc. Div. 145. Hurst v. Hurst, 1882, L. R., 21 Chanc. Div. 278 ; Lewin on Trusts, 8th edn. 101.

³ Lord Galloway v. Lord Garlies, June 26, 1838, 16 S. 1212, 10 Scot. Jur. 524. Harvey v. Harvey's Trustees, June 28, 1860, 22 D. 1310, 32 Scot. Jur. 613.

⁴ Fairlie v. Cunningham, March 28, 1860, 22 D. (H. L.) 8, 32 Scot. Jur. 473. Cathcart v. Cathcart, July 18, 1835, 5 W. and S. 315.

⁵ Sandford on Entails, 2d edn., 454 ; Abernethie v. Forbes, 1840, 1 Rob. App. Cases, 434, 13 Scot. Jur. 613.

The pursuer had no title to sue, seeing that her right under the destination was contingent on the two Chaplins dying without issue. 2. The trustee in a sequestration was in a better position than a trustee under a voluntary deed, for he took the estate as if on a decree of adjudication after expiry of the legal ;¹ and there was no clause, expressly or by implication, prohibiting voluntary alienation by the bankrupts, or converting the right of the liferenters into an alimentary right. Even if gratuitous alienation were struck at, a deed done in invitum by the diligence of creditors was not.²

At advising,—

No. 51.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Chaplin's
Trustee v.
Hoile.

LORD PRESIDENT.—These actions relate to the effect of the same deed, and in my opinion the Lord Ordinary has decided both actions rightly. The first question is, whether by granting a private trust in favour of creditors the right of the liferenter has been forfeited? It is necessary to the party asserting the affirmative that he should prove that there has been a forfeiture under the terms of the trust-disposition and settlement of Mr George Robertson Chaplin. Now, in that deed there is a prohibition of “selling, mortgaging, or otherwise disposing of”—applying the words to the present case—“the liferent interest.” In the irritancy clause there is at all events the appearance of a narrower scope, because the provision is that “such sales or mortgages, if made, shall be void.” Now, Mr Law has maintained that the latter words “such sales or mortgages” in the irritancy clause must be held to comprehend not only selling and mortgaging, but also, as described in the prohibitory clause, “or otherwise disposing of such interest.” In my opinion that would be contrary to sound construction. It appears to me that by the selection of these words the truster has evidenced that “otherwise disposing”—as indeed the words themselves import—means something different from either selling or mortgaging, and I do not think it possible to hold that, when he takes the first two instead of the whole three words as descriptive of the object of the irritancy, he means the same thing as what he had expressed in the whole three.

If then that be so, the question is, whether this trust-disposition can be called a mortgage in the sense of that trust-disposition and settlement of Mr George Robertson Chaplin? Now, I suppose, without pressing into the argument the cases which turn on a construction of deeds of strict entail, it is enough to affirm that, where a forfeiture is sought to be enforced you must clearly shew that according to the reasonable and ordinary construction of the terms used the heir in possession was consciously—I will not say consciously, but necessarily—acting in contravention of what has been prohibited. That leads us to consider what is the meaning of the word “mortgage.” It is, of course, not a term of art in our law, but at the same time it has a sufficiently definite meaning, and I think in its primary sense it means a particular charge upon property. To say that a trust-disposition for behoof of creditors generally is a mortgage would strike one as, if not a misapplication, at all events a very loose use of that term; and if that observation be correct, then I think it is impossible to hold that this deed is a mortgage in such a sense as to infer forfeiture under this settlement. On that ground I think the Lord Ordinary is right in the first action.

The second action relates to the claim of the trustee in the sequestration to

¹ Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), sec. 102.

² Lear v. Leggett, 2 Sim. 479, aff. 1 Russ. and My. 690; Avison v. Holmes, 1 J. and H. 530.

No. 51.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Chaplin's
Trustee v.
Hoile.

dispose of this estate or liferent. There the pleas to a certain extent go over the same ground, but what we have to consider, apart from the question I have already discussed, is whether the trustee in the sequestration is excluded by the terms of this trust-deed from realising the right of the bankrupt. Now, if the right of the bankrupt be such as the Lord Ordinary thinks it is in his decision in the first action, I cannot say I think there is much difficulty as to the right of the trustee. He is vested in the bankrupt's right of liferent, which is not protected against anything but sales and mortgages. The trustee comes in for the purpose of realisation, and in my opinion he is entitled to dispose of this.

Mr Law has addressed to us an argument to the effect that the action is incompetent; but the position of the trustee is that his statutory duty is that of realisation, and he is at once confronted with the question whether this is estate which he is entitled to dispose of. He brings into Court a person who has a sufficient interest at all events to raise the question, and in my opinion there is nothing premature in his thus proceeding.

Accordingly, I am in favour of adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in both cases.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The question raised in the first action is, whether this trust-deed in favour of creditors granted by George Robertson Chaplin is a deed or an act "selling or mortgaging or otherwise disposing of such interest." Now, the first question in regard to this point is, whether there is any effective clause striking against "otherwise disposing of such interest." I concur with your Lordship that there is no such clause, and I agree with your Lordship that, without having recourse to the malignant construction which has been put on clauses in deeds of entail, we are bound, as we always do, to construe clauses of forfeiture with strictness. I think that is an invariable rule in the law of Scotland. We are to give them a reasonable but at the same time a strict construction.

Now, we find here that the irritant clause strikes at "such sales or mortgages." These are the only things struck at, and it is only the rights of the parties signing such deeds that are affected. That being so, I am clear that the only question before us to consider is, whether this trust granted by George Robertson Chaplin is a sale or mortgage? That is to my mind the question in this case. Now, I agree with your Lordship that it is certainly not a sale. No doubt it contains powers of sale, but that is a very different thing from saying that it is a deed selling the right, because, of course, granting power to sell is granting a mandate to sell, and if that mandate be never executed there is never a sale of the subject. Therefore on that ground it is impossible to say that the trust in favour of creditors is a deed of sale.

In the next place, I agree with your Lordship that it is not a mortgage. What a mortgage may be I should be very unwilling to attempt to define. I do not think it is at all necessary to do that, for I agree with your Lordship that the question is, whether this is a mortgage by the law of Scotland, and I am quite clear it is not.

On these grounds I agree with your Lordship that the interlocutor is right. In my view the private trust-deed is not struck at by the prohibition which the settlement affords. And if that be so, it is unnecessary to decide any of the other somewhat difficult questions raised.

The second action is an action by the trustee in the sequestrated estate to have

No. 51.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Chaplin's
Trustee v.
Hoile.

it found that he is entitled to sell and dispose of the liferents. I think the Lord Ordinary's decision is right in that case too, and, as your Lordship has said, the construction we have put upon the prohibitive clause in the other case goes far to settle this case, because if we are to hold that the irritant and resolutive clauses only apply to the cases of sale and mortgage, then we are in this position—that we have nothing here but this liferent, except that the party in liferent use is prohibited from selling or mortgaging it. But I think the right which the trustee has acquired was acquired neither by sale nor by mortgage. If it were competent or possible to have excluded validly the contraction of debt, the trustee might possibly have been excluded in that way. But if the bankrupt could contract debt, then the trustee in the sequestration could acquire the right; I do not see how the right of the trustee can be struck at by this clause. It was argued—and I think rightly argued—that gratuitous alienation is not prohibited by this deed, and if that be so the case falls under the 102d section of the Act 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, for that section says that in all cases where the holder of a right of property can alienate land, then the trustee shall have the same rights as if he had obtained a decree of declarator of expiry of the legal. If that be so, then George Robertson Chaplin could have gratuitously alienated, and his trustee has undoubted right to the decree he asks for.

LORD M'LAREN.—So far as my observation extends, I should say that hitherto testators and settlers of estates have recognised the futility of attempting to put the enjoyment of their estates under limitation, and have confined their efforts to securing the descent of the fee unencumbered by the acts of those who have the enjoyment of it in succession. But the deed of Mr Robertson Chaplin proceeds on a different footing altogether, because he, or whoever prepared the deed, must have known that under the present statutory law a deed in such terms could have no effect in the direction of perpetuating the fee, but that whoever took the fee under the deed necessarily had the full dominion and disposal of the estate. But he has attempted to limit the powers of the persons who are to take life interests in his property, and that not by a way with which we are familiar in such deeds,—I mean by constituting an alimentary trust,—but by words of open and undisguised restraint on the powers of the liferenter over the estate which is given to him.

Now, the Lord Ordinary in construing these limiting clauses has proceeded, as I think correctly, on the principle of strict construction. I think that this is the true principle of construction to be applied to such clauses—to all clauses which are of the nature of restraints on the disposing power. I am not prepared to say that in the construction of entails the Courts have applied any different rule of construction from that which would be proper in construing any clause directed against alienation. That was certainly the view expressed by Lord Wensleydale in one of the later cases—I think the Kintore entail case—where he defined the rule of construction in this way—that if there were two possible constructions of a clause, both equally probable, that one which was favourable to freedom should be preferred rather than one which would have the effect of restraining the right of the grantee. But no Judge has gone so far as to say that if there are two possible constructions, and the construction which is consistent with a limitation of the grantee's powers be the better construction of the two, you are to reject that and adopt the less tenable construction, the one which is evidently not the true construction, because it is favourable to liberty. That is

No. 51

Dec. 8, 1897.
Chaplin's
Trustee
Hoile.

all that I understand is meant by the rule of strict construction. It means only this, that between two arguments which appear equally probable, you ought to prefer the view that is favourable to liberty.

Applying that principle to these clauses, I think there can be no reasonable doubt that we are not entitled to treat the trust in favour of creditors as a mortgage. In the first place, mortgage is not a term of art in our law, but giving the word its colloquial or more general meaning, we may say that it is a kind of security or deed by which a landowner obtains money on the security of his property. Now, in a certain sense a trust for creditors is a deed of security, but its essential quality is that it is a deed by which the granter appoints someone to administer his estate for the benefit of persons to whom he has already contracted debt. It is therefore not a deed of security in the ordinary sense—a voluntary deed of alienation in consideration of a present advance—but is really a deed in fulfilment of legal obligations for payment of debts already contracted. There is here no prohibition against contraction of personal debt, and there could not well be in a deed of this class. Accordingly, it appears to me to be a reasonable view of the clause that the testator only intended to prohibit the grantee from raising money on his life interest by way of mortgage, but not to prohibit the granting of such deeds as might be reasonably necessary for the extrication of the grantee's affairs. I therefore prefer that construction as being the one which is most favourable to the grantee's powers, the presumption being that such clauses are inserted for the benefit of the grantee.

The trust therefore, in my judgment, is well constituted, but that does not prevent subsequent creditors (whose interests are not recognised by the trust) from taking separate measures for the purpose of having the estate brought under judicial administration, and I agree with your Lordships that the clause under construction in no way strikes at the diligence of creditors, or at distribution under the process of sequestration.

The result is, that I agree with the Lord Ordinary in his conclusion regarding the second action in sustaining the right of the trustee in bankruptcy to attach this estate.

LORD KINNEAR.—I also concur with reference to both actions. The conclusive consideration appears to me to be that there is nothing struck at by the irritant or resolute parts of the clause in question except deeds or instruments purporting to be sales or mortgages, and therefore whatever else may have been prohibited, the only question we have to consider under the action of forfeiture is, whether a conveyance in a trust-deed for the benefit of the whole creditors of the granter of the conveyance is a sale or mortgage? I am very clearly of opinion with your Lordships that it is not a sale. It is a mandate to sell, and if the trustees had carried their mandate into effect it might well have been said that the clause of forfeiture had come into operation. But then they did not carry out the mandate, because they were advised that before doing so they should ascertain what the effect of that clause was, and having brought an action into Court for that purpose they discovered that they could not do what they might otherwise have done. The first conveyance therefore never was anything but a mandate to sell. The mandate was never carried out, and it has now fallen, and therefore I am unable to say that any forfeiture has arisen on that ground. If the power to sell was not carried out, then the only effect of that first conveyance was to put the trustees into the administration of the estate.

The only remaining question therefore is, whether a deed appointing trustees to administer the liferent interest of the granters for the benefit of all their creditors is a mortgage? Now, I agree with what your Lordships have said, that "mortgage" is not, as used in this clause, a term of art. The word is not altogether without technical signification in the law of Scotland, because it is a statutory term for a kind of security created or allowed by Act of Parliament to be created for railway and other undertakings; but it is clear enough it is not in that sense that the word is used in this clause, and therefore the only conclusion is that it is used in a popular sense as a word of ordinary language. Now, it appears to me that if it is used as a word of ordinary language it is very difficult to assign to it any definite legal effect, because the persons who use words that are not technical to describe securities over land can hardly be supposed to have adverted particularly to the legal operation of such securities, and therefore I should myself have very great difficulty in construing a clause of a deed—either of a testamentary or any other written instrument—where the term "mortgage" occurs, if it were absolutely necessary for the purpose of such construction to consider whether the security intended to be described was a security that would enable the land to be sold, or in what particular manner it was supposed that the land would be affected by it. But I agree with your Lordships that, whatever else it may be, at all events it must be a particular security over land in favour of some particular creditor, and therefore cannot be extended so as to embrace a general trust of this kind for the administration of an estate for the benefit of all creditors alike.

As to the second action, I agree with your Lordships. I think it is very clear that the clause in question does not prohibit the liferenter from contracting debt. It follows that it does not protect the liferent interest from the diligence of creditors; and it follows again that if his interest is not protected from his creditors' diligence it may be carried, on a sequestration, by the vesting clauses of the Bankruptcy Act.

THE COURT adhered.

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—JOHN RHIND, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 51.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Chaplin's
Trustee v.
Hoile.

No. 52.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Smith v.
School Board
of Inveraray.

HENRY DUNN SMITH, Pursuer (Respondent).—Comrie Thomson—W. C. Smith.

THE SCHOOL BOARD OF INVERARAY AND GLENARAY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Shaw—Dickson.

School—Education Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62)—Contract between "old" parochial teacher and school board as to emoluments—Government grant.
—After the passing of the Education Act, 1872, the School Board of Inveraray entered into an arrangement with the "old" parochial teacher, who continued in office under them, by which the emoluments of the latter were to include "all the Government grants without any deductions, except the salary or salaries of a pupil teacher or pupil teachers." From 1873 to 1886 inclusive the School Board paid to the teacher the whole Government grants received by them, deducting only pupil teachers' salaries. In 1887 and following years they refused to pay to him (1) a grant in the shape of an increased grant for attendance made to certain Highland counties, including Argyll, by a minute of the Scottish Education Department dated 30th April 1885, and (2) a grant for needlework, introduced in 1887 by the Education Code. In an action by the teacher to recover the amount of these grants, held (diss. Lord Young) (1) that

No. 52. it was not ultra vires of the School Board of 1873 to make such an agreement with the pursuer; and (2) that the grants in question fell within the agreement.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Smith v.
School Board
of Inveraray.

Observations on the case of Somers v. School Board of Terriothead, 7 R. 121.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Stormonth
Darling.

HENRY DUNN SMITH was appointed teacher of the burgh parochial school of Inveraray in 1854.

In 1873 the first School Board elected for the district of Inveraray and Glenaray, in terms of the Education Act, 1872, entered into negotiations with Mr Smith as to the amount of his future emoluments. After some communings an agreement was arrived at conform to the following minute of the board, dated 23d October 1873, and acceptance by Mr Smith:—“(1) The board are disposed to agree to give all the Government grants without any deductions except the salary or salaries of a pupil teacher or pupil teachers. . . . (4) This arrangement to take effect from and after the end of the current quarter, being 5th December next (1873).

“ I hereby agree to the foregoing arrangement.

“ HENRY DUNN SMITH.”

From 1873 down to 1886 inclusive the School Board paid to Mr Smith the whole Government grants received by them, subject only to the deductions specified in the minute of the School Board.

By minute of the Committee of the Privy Council on Education in Scotland, dated 30th April 1885, known as the “Highland Minute,” a parliamentary grant, in the shape of an increased grant for attendance, was made to the school boards in certain specified counties in Scotland, including the county of Argyll. This grant, known as the Highland grant, was made in respect of the exceptionally large expenditure incurred or to be incurred in providing efficient education in the counties in question, especially having regard to the number of school buildings required and the defective attendance.

In 1887 a special grant for needlework was introduced by the Revised Code of the Education Department.

In August 1887 the School Board refused to pay Mr Smith the Government grants received by them for the year ending 31st May 1887, so far as consisting of the Highland grant and the grant for needlework, amounting together to £18, 8s.

In the same way in succeeding years the School Board refused to pay Mr Smith these grants, amounting to £21, 4s. for the year ending 31st May 1888, to £20, 3s. for the year ending 31st May 1889, and to £20, 13s. for the year ending 31st May 1890.

In March 1891 Mr Smith raised an action against the School Board concluding for payment of these above sums, with interest.

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) On a sound construction of said agreement the pursuer, being entitled to the whole parliamentary grants while he retains his office of schoolmaster, subject only to the deductions specified, should have decree as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded;—(4) Esto that the said agreement is still binding, the defenders are entitled to absolver, in respect that the specific grants sued for do not fall within its terms. (5) It having been ultra vires of the School Board to agree to give over all the Government grants to the pursuer, the defenders are entitled to absolver.

On 2d June 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Decerns in terms of the conclusions of the summons Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses.”*

* “OPINION.—The pursuer, who is teacher of the Church Square Pub

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The Government grants in question were special. At the date of the agreement no such grants were or

Dec. 8, 1891.

School, Inveraray, here sues the School Board of Inveraray for certain portions of the Government grant earned by his school during the years 1887 to 1890 inclusive. He was appointed in 1854, and the question turns on the construction of a contract made between him and the defenders in 1873, under which they agreed to give him, as part of his emoluments, 'all the Government grants, without any deductions, except the salary or salaries of a pupil teacher or pupil teachers.'

Smith v.
School Board
of Inveraray.

"It is admitted by the defenders that, from 1873 down to 1886 inclusive, they paid to the pursuer the whole Government grants received by them, subject only to the deductions above mentioned. In 1887, however, they refused to pay him the additional grant for attendance introduced by the minute of the Scottish Education Department, dated 30th April 1885, and commonly known as the 'Highland Minute,' as also a grant for needlework, introduced by the Code of 1887.

"They justify this refusal on the ground (1) . . . that the special grants in question were not in the contemplation of parties at the time when the agreement was made, and do not fall within its terms; and (2) that if the agreement covered these grants, it was ultra vires of the School Board to surrender to the pursuer sums which were intended by Parliament for the relief of the ratepayers.

"The pursuer was a teacher in office at the passing of the Act of 1872, and entitled to the protection afforded by the Act to persons in that position. But it will be seen that the question between the parties is not whether he has been prejudiced in his emoluments by the action of the Board within the meaning of section 55, but is entirely a question as to the construction of the agreement, and the right of the School Board to make it.

"I am of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to the sums which he claims.

"The defence that the grants in question were special, and not in the contemplation of parties at the time of the agreement, is much more deserving of attention, though I do not think it is well founded. It is true that the minute of 30th April 1885 proceeded on the ground that some special aid was required for the Highland counties, owing to the scattered population requiring numerous small schools, and the consequent heavy burden laid on the rates. But this was no new discovery. The Act of 1872 had itself provided, by section 67, exceptionally favourable treatment as regards both building and other grants for the counties of Inverness, Argyll, Ross, Orkney, and Shetland (to which Parliament has since added Sutherland and Caithness), and the additional aid afforded under the minute of 1885 was chiefly by an increase in the rate of grant for average attendance. When it was agreed in 1873 that the pursuer should get 'all the Government grants,' it must have been foreseen not only that the ordinary grants might rise, but also that the favour already extended to schools in Argyllshire might be still further increased. An ingenious attempt was made by Mr Shaw for the defenders to assimilate the question to those cases of which Dunbar's Trustees v. British Fisheries Society (5 R. 350, affd. 5 R. (H. L.) 221) is the leading instance, in which obligations in relief of public burdens have been held not to cover new burdens imposed by supervenient legislation. But the principle of these cases is, not that an increase in the amount of the assessment resulting from subsequent legislation will take a burden out of the clause, but that to have this effect there must be a difference in the character or incidence of the burden. Accordingly, in Dunbar's case, although road assessments imposed by local Acts were held to be new burdens outside the clause of relief, the greatly enhanced poor-rate introduced by the Act of 1845 was held to fall within it. I do not think, therefore, that these cases afford any support to the defenders' argument.

"The remaining plea—that it was ultra vires of the School Board to surrender these grants—necessarily depends to a large extent on the defenders' success in

No. 52.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Smith v.
School Board
of Inveraray.

could be in contemplation of the parties. The Government grants then existing were alone referred to in the minute of the School Board. The Highland grant was not an extension of a former grant, but a special grant made to provide for exceptional circumstances in certain counties. Grants made for specific purposes, and subsequent to the agreement, did not fall within its terms.¹ The case of *Somers*² did not touch this branch of the argument, as in that case the school board refused to carry out an agreement, the meaning of which was not in dispute. Even if these special grants fell within the terms of the minute, it was ultra vires of the School Board to give to the teacher grants made for specific purposes subsequent to the date of the minute. A school board would practically deprive Parliament of the power of making grants for specific purposes if they could impound such grants before they were made.

Argued for the pursuer;—The words of the contract were quite distinct, the Board agreed “to give all the Government grants” to the pursuer. The Highland grant of 1885 was merely an extension of a former grant for average attendance. Both of the grants in question were made to encourage education, and under section 43 of the Education Act of 1872 were to be paid into the school fund. The decision in Somers was directly against the School Board in both the positions they had taken up. These grants were entirely distinct from the class of grants of different character and incidence imposed by supervenient legislation.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer is teacher of the Church Square Public School, Inveraray. He was parochial teacher at the passing of the Act of 1872, and after the Act was passed he and the new School Board negotiated and entered into an arrangement as to what were to be his emoluments of office for the future. Parochial teachers held their offices as public offices ad vitam aut culpam. The Act of 1872 did not disturb their position, and after it passed school boards negotiated, as this school board did, with the parochial schoolshewing that the grants were new and special. For, after the judgment in Somers v. School Board of Teviothead, 7 R. 121, it would be hopeless to maintain that in dealing with an ‘old’ schoolmaster it is ultra vires of a school board to make a permanent arrangement, and to include in the emoluments so secured to him the Government grant. Nay more, in that case (as noticed in the Lord Ordinary’s note) an unsuccessful attempt was made by the school board to distinguish a part of the grant, called the ‘distance grant,’ on the ground that it was subsequent and special. The distance grant is an addition made to meet the case of sparsely populated districts in any part of Scotland, and is of precisely the same character, and made with the same object, as the increased grants to the Highland counties. The Teviothead case is therefore a strong authority in favour of the pursuer. But if I am right in holding that the grants under the ‘Highland Minute’ were simply ordinary grants at higher rates, there was nothing special about them, except as to the area over which they extended.

“I would only add that all grants for elementary education are intended, in a sense, to relieve the rates. Nor does it follow that they are diverted from their proper purpose by being allocated to an ‘old’ teacher, for the school board have to satisfy his claims out of the school fund, and if they do not use the grant for that purpose, the burden would fall on the rates. Agreements like the one in question have an element of risk about them, but they are not on that account unlawful, and if the teacher in some cases is the gainer, the result might be different.”

¹ Dunbar’s Trustees v. British Fisheries Society, Dec. 19, 1877, 5 R. 350.

² Somers v. School Board of Teviothead, Oct. 31, 1879, 7 R. 121.

masters, who continued in office under them, as to what were to be the emoluments of these masters for the future.

According to law the schoolmaster was entitled to all the school fees, and the only change the Act made was that the school boards through their officer were bound to collect these fees instead of the parochial schoolmaster. The convenience of the school board in making their arrangements as to salaries made it advisable that a different and more definite scheme should be adopted for paying the teacher. For this purpose in the present case the School Board entered into an arrangement with the pursuer by which the emoluments of the latter were to include "all the Government grants without any deductions, except the salary or salaries of a pupil teacher or pupil teachers."

The first question for our consideration is,—Had the School Board any power to enter into such a contract? Whatever difficulty might have been experienced if the question had been raised immediately after the passing of the Act of 1872, there can be none now, for the matter has been directly decided in the case of Somers, where it was held that an arrangement by which the Government grant was disposed of for the benefit of the parochial schoolmaster is an arrangement which the School Board are entitled to make. This decision is clear and direct and binding on us, unless we have such strong doubt of its soundness as to make it our duty to send the case to be heard before a fuller bench. I have no such difficulty or doubt, and accept that case as an authority.

The second question for our consideration is,—The arrangement being competent, what is the effect of the clause making it,—Is the pursuer entitled under that clause in the present circumstances to the whole Government grants, including the new grant of 1885? It is plain that the School Board in making the contract with the pursuer could not have expressed it in more general terms. The contract might have stated that the teacher's emoluments were not to exceed the Government grants as at that date, or were to consist of the Government grants until a new arrangement were made. The contract is not so limited, it is expressed—we must hold purposely—in general terms. It is quite plain that under that agreement if the Government grants were reduced by Parliament or otherwise, the schoolmaster would have to suffer a reduction of salary. He took that risk. In the same manner it seems to me that the School Board took the risk of the Government grants becoming of greater value and of this schoolmaster being proportionately benefited.

In these circumstances (1) the question as to the right of the School Board to enter into this agreement being settled by the case of Somers, and (2) there being no doubt as to the true meaning of the agreement, I think that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be affirmed.

LORD YOUNG.—I think the present case is distinguishable in a very material feature from the case of Somers, but I have nevertheless to state it as my opinion that that case was not well decided. I altogether dissent from the view that we are bound to accept all prior decisions as binding upon us, whatever may be our opinion as to the erroneousness of the views expressed. It would require a statute to make a decision so binding that the Supreme Court—the very same Court in which the decision was pronounced—were not entitled to reconsider such decision. It is a matter of judgment and discretion in individual cases whether it is so clear to the minds of the Judges dealing with a case that a former decision

No. 52.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Smith v.
School Board
of Inveraray.

No. 52.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Smith v.
School Board
of Inveraray.

was so erroneous that they can at once act on that view, or require the case to be argued before the whole Court or an increased number of Judges. That is a matter in which it is impossible to lay down any absolute judgment at all; but the proposition that a judgment, because it is a decision, must in all cases be accepted and acted on as binding is one from which I entirely dissent. There are some general views which meet with approval. One is that with respect to matters of form, and some other matters where it really does not signify what the rule is, the only matter of importance being that there should be a rule, and that it should be adhered to,—with respect to such matters, the Court will uphold the rule laid down in prior cases. Again, where you have a series rerum judicatarum or the authority of text writers, there is good sense in the view that the Court will not depart from the law thus established. But I altogether dissent from the view that we are to accept every individual decision as absolutely binding, and that we are not to examine it and use our own judgment and discretion in following it or not in the case in which it is referred to as an authority.

But, as I have stated, I think this case is distinguishable in a material respect from the case of Somers. In that case, an old teacher having a right to the school fees transacted with the school board as to the conditions on which he would part with that right and surrender it to them. That was proper matter for contract. Whether they could contract by giving him the terms they did is another matter, but the subject itself was a proper matter for contract, viz., the terms upon which the schoolmaster would give up his right to fees which he had by his appointment, and which were secured to him by statute. Here, as it appears to me, there was no matter for contract at all. The schoolmaster was giving up nothing. There was nothing to contract about, and it would not have occurred to me, looking at the minute, that when it was written a contract was in the mind of anybody.

But the question of chief interest in the case is—a contract being assumed to have been entered into—can a school board contract away for any period of time the Government grants? Here the contract was made in 1873,—that is, eighteen years ago, and the proposition we have to consider is, that by that contract made eighteen years ago the Government grant now, and so long as the pursuer in this action shall retain his position as schoolmaster, is not under the management of the School Board, and that they are not entitled to administer it according to their judgment as to what is best for the conduct of the school with the management of which they are charged. That seems to me to be a very wonderful proposition, and I think proceeds on a total misconception of what the Government grant is. The Government grant is made out of moneys voted by Parliament for the year, and which Parliament is under no obligation to vote. It has been annually proposed for a great number of years now, but it may be stopped at any time. The vote need not be moved, or if it is, the House of Commons need not assent to it. The administration of the money which is thus voted is committed by statute to the Committee of the Privy Council, but if Parliament did not vote the money they would have nothing to administer. They are required by statute to determine how it is to be divided among the various school managers, including the school boards. Exercising their judgment, the committee make the grant from time to time to the school managers to be applied by them in the conduct of the schools under their charge according to their judgment and discretion. It is in the option of the school managers and of the school boards as such, to accept the grant or not as they please. The Government has no charge of the management of the schools, no authority, no business in their management. School boards are entirely independent of the Government with regard to the schools under their charge. Now, what is to become of the grants which are made to school boards on their complying with the requisite conditions? They are directed by statute to be paid into the school funds. In every parish or burgh a fund must be established by the school board, and a treasurer appointed to take charge of it; and the statute, at clause 43, says that the fund is to consist of money provided by Parliament, money raised by loan, and so on. And what is to be done with the money of the school board? It is to be applied and spent by the school board for behoof of the schools under their management according to their judgment and discretion. How can that be a subject of a contract which is to endure for twenty years? Now, I do not think it possible to maintain that such a contract is lawful. If it was, the result would be that here there had been no school fund since 1873.

No. 52.
Dec. 8, 1891.
Smith v.
School Board
of Inveraray.

A school board for the time, exercising their judgment in the matter, may conscientiously, in the discharge of their duty, feel disposed to give the Government grant to the schoolmaster. It is said that the School Board of 1873 felt so disposed. They would not intelligently feel so disposed except with reference to the circumstances of 1873, viz, the schoolmaster, the state of the school, the state of public opinion as to the requirements of education and the cost of it, and the amount of the grant at that time. A great deal has happened since then. They are not stagnant, I suppose, even in Inveraray, but are progressing with the times. Public opinion as to the education given in the school has very much changed; more teachers are employed; there is more Government grant. How does it follow that because the School Board of 1873, with reference to the circumstances of 1873, felt disposed to give up their grant to their schoolmaster, that should be at all proper or consistent with the duty of the School Board of 1891? I do not think that the judgment and discretion of the present School Board is to be displaced in this way by a contract made by the first School Board appointed under the statute. I am clearly of opinion that such a contract is illegal, and altogether beyond the power of the School Board.

To what length is this to be carried? The deficiency in the school fund is to be supplied by rates. Could a school board hand over all these rates to a schoolmaster during his term of office and enter into a contract to that effect binding their successors in office? I confess I feel myself quite unable to agree to any such proposition. What about bequests or gifts? Gifts or bequests for the promotion of education in the parish may be granted or left to the School Board. Suppose the contract of 1873 by the School Board bore that "the School Board are disposed to give Mr Smith all gifts, general bequests and legacies which may be left to them during his term of office." Would that be a good contract, and entirely debar the School Board for the time being, eighteen or twenty years afterwards, from exercising their judgment or discretion in the matter? I say that would be out of the question, but not more so than in regard to the Government grant, which is as distinctly given to be put into the school fund and administered according to the judgment and discretion of the School Board for the time as it is possible for money to be.

There is one other matter I desire to refer to. I think it a clear proposition, although contrary to the view of the Judges who decided the case of Somers,

No. 52.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Smith v.
School Board
of Inveraray.

that a school board cannot make a contract with an old schoolmaster in the way of restraining and fettering the judgment of subsequent school boards in the management of the funds under their charge which they could not have made with a new teacher.

I am, therefore, clearly of opinion that there was here no contract whatever between the School Board and schoolmaster in 1873, and further, notwithstanding the case of Somers, I think that if a contract was intended, it was altogether beyond the power of the School Board of 1873 to fetter and curtail the discretion and judgment of the School Board of 1891 in the discharge of their duty. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary ought to be reversed and the defenders assolizied.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—When this case was argued before us the defenders admitted the existence of the contract. I take the case as the parties have stated it. The only questions argued were first, whether the contract was binding on the present School Board, and secondly, what was the legal meaning of the contract. On the first question little was said by the defenders, and I am of opinion that the contract was binding, following the judgment in the case of Somers, which, I think, is direct authority on the point. On the second question I agree with the Lord Ordinary. On the whole matter, I am of opinion with your Lordship that his judgment should be upheld.

LORD TRAYNER.—At their meeting held on 23d October 1873 the School Board of Inveraray and Glenaray, as then constituted, resolved to allow the pursuer a certain salary, and added that they were “disposed to agree to give” (that is, to the pursuer) “all the Government grants without any deductions except the salary or salaries of a pupil teacher or pupil teachers.” The minute of that meeting, expressed in the language I have quoted, was apparently communicated to the pursuer, who wrote thereon, “I hereby agree to the foregoing arrangement.” From the date of that minute down to the month of August 1887—that is, a period of nearly fourteen years, the arrangement or agreement constituted by the resolution in the minute and its acceptance was acted on by the parties. The pursuer is now asking nothing more than that that agreement shall be fulfilled. It was not maintained at the bar, in the course of the discussion, that the minute and acceptance did not constitute an agreement or contract between the parties, and, indeed, when it was suggested to the defenders that such an argument might be maintained on the somewhat peculiar words of the minute, that the School Board was “disposed to agree,” &c., that suggestion was not adopted. Both parties represented that there was a contract between them, but the defenders maintained (1) that it was ultra vires of the then School Board to enter into the agreement in so far as it related to the Government grants, at least to the effect of binding their successors; and (2) that the agreement, even if still in force, did not entitle the pursuer to the particular Government grant now in question. On these points my judgment is against the defenders.

That such an agreement or contract was one which the School Board had power to make so as to be binding on them and their successors, has already been decided by the case of Somers. I feel the very great force of the observations made by Lord Young upon that decision, but I am prepared, in this case, to follow it. Even if so disposed, I should not think it desirable to question the authority of that decision now, because since its date agreements may have been entered into on the footing that the law as there determined is sound, and because future agreements between school boards and schoolmasters, who held office prior to 1872 are, in the nature of things, likely to be very few. It is only with reference to agreements made with such schoolmasters that the case of Somers is of any great importance.

As to whether the Government grant now more directly in question is one which the pursuer can claim under his agreement, I agree with the Lord Ordinary. I think this grant is not a new grant, either in character or purpose, but is merely the enlargement or increase of a grant existing at the time the agreement was made.

THE COURT adhered.

ADAM W. GIFFORD, W.S.—CARMICHAEL & MILLER, W.S.—Agents.

CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Complainers (Respondents).—

D.-F. Balfour—Sol.-Gen. Murray—Clyde.

JOHN P. M'BRIE, Respondent (Reclaiming).—Comrie Thomson—

C. J. Guthrie—A. O. Deas.

No. 53.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Caledonian
Railway Co. v.
M'Bride.

Railway—Reparation—Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 33), sec. 6—Glasgow Central Railway Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vict. c. cxxiv.), sec. 41.—Section 6 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, enacts that a railway company shall make "to the owners and occupiers and all parties interested in any lands" "injuriously affected by the construction" of the railway full compensation "for all damage sustained by such owners, occupiers, and other parties, by reason of the exercise as regards such lands of the powers by this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, vested in the company."

A railway company authorised by a special Act to construct certain railways in Glasgow was, by one of its clauses bearing to be for the protection of the Corporation of Glasgow, bound to make such alterations on sewers affected by the construction of the railway as the corporation might deem necessary.

Held that section 6 of the Railway Clauses Act did not apply to damage to lands caused by the construction of sewers under section 41 of the special Act, as such damage was not caused by the construction of the railway.

By the Glasgow Central Railway Act, 1888, and other Acts incorporated therewith, the Caledonian Railway Company were authorised to construct certain railways and works in Glasgow.

Sec. 41 * enacted, for the protection of the Corporation of Glasgow, that

* "For the further protection of the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council of the city of Glasgow as a municipal corporation, and as trustees or commissioners acting in execution of the several public and local or personal Acts, by which any powers, jurisdiction, or authorities are conferred on them, . . . the following provisions shall have effect and be binding on the company (that is to say)—(L) Where any of the works to be done under or by virtue of this Act shall or may pass over, under, or by the side of, or so as to interfere with, any sewer, drain, water-course, defence, or work under the jurisdiction or control of the corporation, or shall or may in any way affect the sewerage or drainage of the district under their control, the company shall make good any damage which may be done by their operations to any of the sewers, and shall clean the same should they get silted up in consequence of any of the operations of the company during or after the construction of the company's works, and shall provide by new, altered, or substituted works, including outfall sewers, in such manner as the corporation may deem necessary (and for the construction of which they

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

No. 53.
—
Dec. 8, 1891.
Caledonian
Railway Co. v.
M'Bride.

(subsec. L) where any of the works to be done under the Act should interfere with the sewers or drainage of the district under the control of the corporation, the company should provide by new, altered, or substituted works, "in such manner as the corporation may deem necessary (and for the construction of which they shall be bound to afford all reasonable facilities, and communicate their powers so far as necessary), for the proper protection of, and for preventing injury or impediment to, the sewers."

It was provided by subsection O of the same section,—“The special provisions herein contained for the protection of the corporation and the Glasgow Botanic Institution shall not be deemed to supersede or dispense with the provisions of the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, but these, except in so far as they may be inconsistent with any of the special provisions herein contained, shall be and remain in full force and effect.”

The railway company executed certain sewer works under this clause upon streets beyond the limits of deviation.

On 24th November 1890 Mr John P. M'Bride served a notice upon the railway company, in terms of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, the Glasgow Central Railway Act, 1888, and the Caledonian Railway Act, 1890, in which he stated that he was heritable proprietor of an iron store and machinery yard, and also of two brick and stone tenements of dwelling-houses, all extending from Nos. 39 to 55 M'Alpine Street, Glasgow; that the said iron store and machinery yard had been occupied by defender for the purpose of his business; that his business had been considerably interfered with by the company's operations in constructing a large tunnel or sewer in the front of his property, whereby the buildings themselves had been seriously damaged, and the access to them completely blocked up for several months, and the delivery of the iron stored therein rendered impossible, and thereby suffered loss and damage, which he estimated under the following heads:—“(1) Estimated cost of taking down and restoring where necessary the undernoted buildings . . . £2500; (2) loss and damage sustained and to be sustained to respondent's business, as above narrated, £3000.” Failing payment of that sum, he called upon the company to present a petition to the Sheriff to have his claim settled in terms of the Acts of Parliament above mentioned.

On 15th December 1890 the railway company, while denying the validity and competency of the claim, presented a petition to the Sheriff under protest, and on the same day the Sheriff-substitute fixed the 30th January following as a diet for the nomination of a special jury.

On 25th January 1891 the railway company presented a note of suspension in the Bill-Chamber, craving the Court to interdict M'Bride from following out his notice of 24th November and proceeding further with his pretended claim for compensation, and to suspend the Sheriff-substitute's deliverance of 15th December.

shall be bound to afford all reasonable facilities, and communicate their powers so far as necessary) for the proper protection of, and for preventing injury or impediment to, the sewers and works hereinbefore referred to, by or by reason of the said intended works, or any part thereof, and shall save harmless the corporation against all and every the expense to be occasioned thereby, and such works may be done by or under the direction, superintendence, and control of the corporation, at the costs, charges, and expenses in all respects of the company, and all reasonable costs, charges, and expenses thereby occasioned shall be paid by the company on demand. . . .”

The complainers stated,—“The respondent’s said notice and claim for compensation is incompetent, invalid, and not conform to statute. The sewer in question is outside the limits of deviation of the railways and works authorised by the Glasgow Central Railway Act, 1888, and was executed by the complainers under the provisions of section 41, subsection (L) of that Act,* by which it is provided that, for the construction of the sewers therein referred to, the corporation of Glasgow shall be bound to communicate their powers to the complainers. Section 328 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, under which the corporation of Glasgow are authorised to construct sewers, provides as follows (quoted below).† No sewer was carried or continued by the complainers into or through any lands or heritages belonging to or occupied by the respondent. The loss and damage to the respondent’s business, in respect of which compensation is claimed, was occasioned, as set forth in said notice, by the temporary obstruction of the street, and the claim in respect of such loss and damage is incompetent, and unauthorised by statute, and irrelevant to found any claim against the complainers. Further, no property or right or interest of the respondent has been taken or entered upon, or interfered with, or damaged, or injured by the complainers so as to found any competent or relevant claim for compensation.”

The respondent did not deny that the works in question had been executed under the provisions quoted above, but averred further that his property had been injuriously affected in the sense of section 6 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845.‡

The complainers pleaded, inter alia ;—(2) The operations complained

No. 53.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Caledonian
Railway Co. v.
M'Bride.

* Quoted supra, p. 255, note.

† The Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sec. 328, enacts,—“The board” (of Police of Glasgow) “shall make provision for draining in a suitable manner the portions of the turnpike roads within the city and the public streets, and may, with that object, construct or continue in or under any of the said roads or streets, one or more ordinary or special public sewers, and may from time to time alter, renew, or add to such sewers, as to them shall seem proper, and may carry and continue the said sewers into or through any lands or heritages within the city, and may repair, maintain, and cleanse the said sewers; provided that they shall make reasonable compensation to the proprietors and occupiers of such lands and heritages for any damage which may be done by reason of the exercise of the powers hereby conferred, and such compensation shall, in the option of the board, be assessed either by the Dean of Guild or in manner provided by the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, for determining the amount of compensation to be paid for lands taken under the provisions thereof.”

‡ The Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 6, provides,—“In exercising the power given to the company by the special Act to construct the railway and to take the lands for that purpose, the company shall be subject to the provisions and restrictions contained in this Act and in the said Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, and the company shall make to the owners and occupiers, and all other parties interested in any lands taken or used for the purposes of the railway, or injuriously affected by the construction thereof, full compensation for the value of the lands so taken or used, and for all damage sustained by such owners, occupiers, and other parties by reason of the exercise, as regards such lands, of the powers by this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, vested in the company, and except where otherwise provided by this or the special Act, the amount of such compensation shall be ascertained and determined in the manner provided by the said Lands Clauses Consolidation Act for determining questions of compensation with regard to lands purchased or taken under the provisions thereof, and all the provisions of the said last mentioned Act shall be applicable to determine the amount of any such compensation, and to enforcing the payment or other satisfaction thereof.”

No. 53.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Caledonian
Railway Co. v.
M'Bride.

of having been executed under the authority and subject to the provisions of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, as the said Act is incorporated with the Glasgow Central Railway Act, 1888, and the respondent having no right of compensation under said Acts in respect of any of the matters referred to in said notice and claim, the said notice and claim are incompetent, and the complainers are entitled to decree, as craved.

The respondent pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The respondent's property having been injuriously affected, within the meaning of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, the respondent is entitled to compensation, and to have the same assessed in terms of the Lands Clauses Acts. (3) The notice and claim of the respondent being competent, valid, and authorised by statute, decree of suspension and interdict should be refused.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 8th July 1891, sustained the reasons of suspension, and declared the interdict formerly granted perpetual.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The complainers have in their amended record raised a totally new question, which admits, I think, of being at once disposed of. They allege, and the fact is not disputed, that the operations in connection with which the respondent claims compensation are being executed by them in pursuance of their obligations to the corporation of Glasgow, under section 41 of their special Act of 1888, and particularly in pursuance of the obligation contained in subsection L of that section, which subsection is not quoted on record, but is as follows"—(See footnote, p. 255).

"The complainers contend that, in these circumstances, and in virtue of the provisions of this section, they are vested with all the powers, and by consequence all the immunities, of the corporation, and that the result of that is to bring them within the provisions of the 328th section of the Glasgow Police Act of 1866, which is quoted in article 6 of the complainers' statement, and provides in effect for the construction, renewal, or repair of sewers in or through any lands or heritages within the city on payment of compensation 'to the proprietors and occupiers of such lands and heritages for any damage which may be done by reason of the exercise of the powers hereby conferred.' The respondent being merely a frontager to the street in which the complainers' operations are being conducted, and not being an owner or occupier of any land or heritage occupied by those operations, it is contended that his claim for compensation is expressly excluded.

"The respondent's answer is that, although the complainers were vested with the powers of the corporation, they are not vested with its immunities, and he appeals to subsection O of the same 41st section of the special Act, which provides as follows:—'The special provisions herein contained for the protection of the corporation and the Glasgow Botanic Institution shall not be deemed to supersede or dispense with the provisions of the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845; but these, except in so far as they may be inconsistent with any of the special provisions herein contained, shall be and remain in full force and effect.'

"I have not been able to read the last subsection as enlarging the claims for compensation competent to individuals in the position of the respondent. The whole section is declared to have for its purposes merely the protection of the corporation and certain other specified public bodies, and the subsection I have just read cannot, I think, be construed without reference to the limitation. And with respect to the argument that a transfer of powers does not necessarily imply a transfer of immunities, I am afraid it is rather against that argument that under the provisions of subsection L the works in question might have been executed by the corporation themselves at the expense of the railway company, in which case it is difficult to see how the respondent could have made good any claim for compensation, except under the limitation expressed in the 328th section of the Glasgow Police Act above referred to.

"On the whole, therefore, I think that the matter is sufficiently clear on record and on the statutes to make it vain to proceed with the proposed jury trial, and

No. 53.

M'Bride reclaimed, and argued;—Admittedly the works were being constructed under the 41st section of the Glasgow Central Railway Act, 1888. By that section the railway company came under certain obligations to the corporation of Glasgow, and it was provided, inter alia, that the corporation "should communicate their powers" to the company. These powers were defined in the 328th section of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, and they were given in that Act for the public benefit. The immunities conferred upon the corporation by that Act were not to be presumed to be transferred to mere traders like the railway company. Enactments conferring powers for the benefit of private persons such as the railway company were to be construed very strictly, and the right to compensation in a case like the present could not be taken away except by very clear provision to that effect.¹ Further, upon a sound reading of the 328th section of the Police Act no immunity was conferred upon the corporation in a case like the present, and it did not exclude a claim for compensation where damage had been sustained by reason of such operations as were complained of. This view was supported by the proviso contained in subsection O of the 41st section of the Act of 1888. It could not be maintained that the claimer had been deprived by a mere side-wind of the right he would have had otherwise under the Railways Clauses Act.

Argued for the railway company;—The complainer proposed to proceed with a statutory arbitration, and had given the necessary notices under the Lands Clauses Act. It was for him, therefore, to satisfy the Court that he had a good case for compensation under the statutes. It was true that if by operations carried on by his neighbour a person's support was destroyed, damages would be due at common law.² But there was no case of that kind here. Admittedly the works in question were being conducted under subsection L of the 41st section of the special Act of 1888, by which the railway company were enabled to repair any damage their works might cause to the corporation sewers. Indeed, in terms of that section the railway company were now in the shoes of the corporation. The powers of the corporation, which were thus transferred to the railway company, were set out in the 328th section of the Glasgow Police Act of 1866, and by that section compensation was restricted to "the proprietors and occupiers of lands and heritages." That being so, and the claim for compensation being thus confined to those through whose lands the operations were conducted, it was clear that the complainer had no claim under that section, as he was merely a frontager. The Lands Clauses Act was introduced in subsection O of the 41st section of the company's special Act only as the machinery for giving effect to a claim to which it was applicable. But here there was no land taken. The introduction of the term "immunities" by the Lord Ordinary was unfortunate, for this was no case of immunity. In order to found a claim for compensation the injury must be actionable apart from the statutory powers.³ Further, where powers were conferred by statute, and the Legislature had sanctioned the doing of a particular thing, any claim for compensation for injuries through

I shall therefore grant interdict against so proceeding, with expenses to the complainers since the date of the second closing of the record."

¹ Maxwell on Statutes, ii. 363; Clyde v. Glasgow City and District Railway Co., July 16, 1885, 12 R. 1315; Scales v. Pickering, 1828, 4 Bingham's Reps. 448; Kingston-upon-Hull Dock Co. v. La Marche, 1828, 8 Barnwell & Cresswell, 42; Stockton Railway Co. v. Barrett, 1844, 11 Clarke and Fin. 590.

² Dalton v. Angus, 1881, L. R., 6 App. Ca. 740.

³ Deas on Railways, 271 and 281; Hammersmith Railway Co. v. Brand, 1869, L. R., 4 Eng. and Ir. Apps. 171, 201.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Caledonian
Railway Co. v.
M'Bride.

No. 53. operations conducted under the statute must be confined within the limits allowed by the statute.¹

Dec. 8, 1891.
Caledonian
Railway Co. v.
M'Bride.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—A claim for compensation under the statutes has been made by the reclaimer, Mr M'Bride, against the Caledonian Railway Company, for injurious affection of his lands; and he has given what purport to be the statutory notices in that behalf. The company ask interdict of further proceedings under those notices, and their pleadings challenge the reclaimer to state under what statute his claim for compensation arises. His reply, given in the sixth answer and second plea, is,—Under the 6th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845.

Now, the alleged injury to the reclaimer's property is that certain buildings in M'Alpine Street, Glasgow, have been damaged, and the access temporarily blocked by the construction of a sewer in the centre of the street. Those operations, however, are admittedly not within the limits of deviation of the railways authorised by the special Act (which is the Glasgow Central Railway Act, 1888); and the 6th section of the Railways Clauses Act gives right to compensation for injurious affection only where the construction of the railway is the cause. The section founded on by the reclaimer, therefore, fails to support his claim.

This is, in my opinion, decisive of the case, unless it could have been shewn that the 6th section of the Railways Clauses Act has been, by some other enactment, extended or applied to works not included in its own terms.

I think that there has been no such extension or application, and shall state the relation of the several enactments bearing on the question.

The sewer in M'Alpine Street was constructed by the railway company in consequence of the 41st section of their special Act. That section has nothing to do with the construction of the railways authorised by the Act, its object being stated, in its opening words, to be the further protection of the Glasgow Corporation, the Glasgow Tramway Company, and the Glasgow Botanic Institution. Among its very numerous and miscellaneous subsections, subsection (L) is concerned with the safety of the sewers belonging to the corporation, and requires the company, in certain events, to provide for their protection by new works. Incidentally to this, and in furtherance of it, it is enacted that the corporation shall be bound to afford to the company all reasonable facilities, and communicate their powers so far as necessary. The sewer in M'Alpine Street was constructed by the company in fulfilment of their obligations to the corporation under this subsection, and the company point to the 328th section of the Glasgow Police Act as containing powers conferred on the corporation which have been communicated to them, which authorise this operation, and which, while providing for compensation, does so only to the owners of lands into or through which the sewers have to be taken. Now, admittedly, this sewer in M'Alpine Street was not taken into or through the reclaimer's lands; and therefore he is not in the one case for which compensation is directly provided in this section.

But the reclaimer founds on subsection (O) of the 41st section of the special Act, which lays it down that the special provisions for the protection of the corporation and the Botanic Institution shall not be deemed to dispense with the provisions of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, but that these, except in so far as they may be inconsistent with any of the special provisions contained in section 41, shall be and remain in full force and effect. Now, it is enough to say that this is only a salvo of the Railway Clauses Act for such cases as its terms cover, and is not an extension of it to cases which its terms do not cover. The terms of the 6th section of the Railways Clauses Act would cover a number of cases arising under various subsections of the 41st section of the special Act; they do not cover, and are not here intended to cover, the case of works outside the railway itself.

¹ Hammersmith Railway Co. v. Brand, supra; Rex v. Pease, 1832, 4 B. & A. 30; Vaughan v. Taff Vale Railway Co., 1860, 5 H. & N. 679; contrasted with Jones v. Festiniog Railway Co., 1868, L. R., 3 Q. B. 733.

Whether the powers of the corporation (and by consequence the company) under the 328th section of the Glasgow Police Act give right to withdraw support from the lands or from the buildings, or from any particular building in the streets in which they operate, are questions which do not arise here. What we decide is that, if they do, there is no statutory right to compensation such as is here sought; and if they do not it is obvious that the remedy for an excess of statutory power cannot lie in statutory compensation.

I am for adhering to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNENAR concurred.

LORD ADAM was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

HOPE, MANN, & KIRK, W.S.—ROBERT STEWART, S.S.C.—Agents.

MRS ELIZABETH M'KENZIE OR DAWSON, Pursuer (Reclaimers).—

James Reid.

THOMAS M'KENZIE, Defender (Respondent).—C. J. Guthrie—Gunn.

No. 54.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Dawson v.
M'Kenzie.

Donation—Donatio inter vivos—Deposit-receipt—Proof—Presumption.—A son after his mother's death cashed a deposit-receipt in her name for £240. She had lived with him, and was sixty-three years of age at her death. The deposit-receipt was endorsed by a cross, and bore the signature of the son and of his sister as witnesses attesting this cross as the mother's mark.

In an action by one of the mother's next of kin the son alleged that he had acquired the deposit-receipt by donation inter vivos. Evidence which held insufficient to overcome the presumption against donation.

MRS MARY JANE LAWSON OR M'KENZIE, widow of Alexander M'Kenzie, 1st Division. handresser, Glasgow, died there intestate, at the age of sixty-three, on 27th December 1890. After her death Thomas M'Kenzie, a son of the deceased, with whom she resided, cashed a deposit-receipt by the Clydesdale Bank in her favour for £240. The deposit-receipt was then indorsed with a cross, attested by the signature of the said Thomas M'Kenzie and of a sister, Mrs Martha M'Kenzie or Gebelmann. Lord Kin- cairney.

The present action was raised by Mrs Elizabeth M'Kenzie or Dawson, mother daughter of the deceased, against Thomas M'Kenzie, as a vitious intruder with the deceased's estate, for count and reckoning and payment of the pursuer's share, as one of the six children of the deceased.

The defender stated that on 16th December 1890 his mother "made a donation" to him of the deposit-receipt and the sum therein contained, and gave delivery of it to him as his writ on that date in presence of his sister Martha. He pleaded;—(2) The pursuer's mother having made a donation of said deposit-receipt and its contents to the defender, he should be absolved.

No. 54.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Dawson v.
M'Kenzie.

The Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) allowed a proof, the defender to lead. The following facts were proved:—

Mrs M'Kenzie's husband died in 1882.

In 1883 she received a legacy from a relation of her husband of £490, and at the same time her children received legacies of £100 each. The legacies of the mother and of those children who lived with her were deposited in bank on deposit-receipts, and the deposit-receipts were kept together in a box of which Mrs M'Kenzie kept the key. Mrs M'Kenzie was in the custom of drawing money from the bank from time to time; she did so by making a cross on the back of the deposit-receipt, which was attested by two witnesses, generally, if not always, by two of her children, one of whom took the receipt to the bank, drew the money required, and got a new deposit-receipt in favour of Mrs M'Kenzie for the balance.

In that way the sum in bank gradually diminished. On 19th November 1888 it amounted to £340, on 26th November 1889 to £280, and on 12th December 1890 to £240—so that she had spent £100 in the last two years of her life. How she disposed of these sums did not clearly appear.

Mrs M'Kenzie was survived by six children—the pursuer, who was living separate from her husband, from whom she received £1 per week of aliment—(she had also a son earning wages); Alexander, who was married, and was a hairdresser in business with his brother Thomas, the defender; Thomas, the defender, who was unmarried, with whom his mother lived; Martha, wife of Frederick Gebelmann, who, with her husband, lived with the defender; Jessie, widow of Victor Pippin (who had died in September 1889), who was in poor circumstances; and Daniel, who lived in Melbourne.

Mrs Pippin deponed,—“I was in the habit of visiting my mother two or three times a-week for a number of years. My mother was not in good health for some years, and used to be confined to bed. I know that the defender supported the household before and after my father's death. I remember of my mother getting a sum of money left to her some years ago. It was put on deposit-receipt in the Clydesdale Bank. I have had conversations with my mother about her money frequently when she felt she was ill. She always said the money was to be the defender's. The first time I remember of her saying so was about two years ago, but she has said so frequently since whenever she felt very ill. The last occasion on which she made that statement to me was about a fortnight before she died. There was no one present besides myself. My mother said at that time that she felt very ill, and that she was going to give this deposit receipt to the defender to-night. When I called on the following day I was told that she had given the deposit-receipt to the defender. About two months after my husband died I called one day to see my mother when she was very ill. On that occasion she sent me down to my brother's shop to tell the defender to come up and get the deposit-receipt, as she felt very ill, and she was afraid she would drop down like my husband some day. I went and told the defender what my mother said, and he laughed and said,—‘Go back and tell her that she will live for many years yet.’ . . . I remember of the defender calling upon me about two days after he got the deposit-receipt. He told me then that my mother had given him the deposit-receipt. My mother had told me the day after she had given the deposit-receipt to the defender what she had done, and the defender told me himself afterwards. With the exception of the fortnight before my mother's death I think I saw the pursuer on twice in the house during a period of three or four years. My mother was nursed in her illness by my sister Martha and the defender. I mother was particularly fond of the defender, and relied upon him very much indeed. She used to say that if anyone made a noise about anything it would be the pursuer that would do so. I am getting parochial relief just now. It was my mother who suggested that I should apply for it. The defender has been giving me some money for about a year. He gives me 2s. 6d., 1s. 6d., 2s., and sometimes 5s. on a Saturday. Cross.—

 I never heard my mother say to the defender that he was to look after me, and my brother never told me that my mother had said so to him. Defender never told me that he had got his mother's money on condition that he was to look after me, or anything like that. He has promised to take me into his house to stay with him. He never asked me to stay with him while my mother was alive.
 So far as I know, my mother never spent any of her money, except when she was going away from home. When my mother spoke to me about leaving the money to defender about a fortnight before she died, I did not think at that time that she was dying. (Q.) Did your mother think so herself? (A.) She would not tell me, for I was very ill myself. (Q.) When your mother told you on that occasion that the defender was to get the money that night, did you not think from that that she thought she was going to die? (A.) I thought she was very ill, but I did not think she was going to die. (Q.) If your mother had recovered, was the money to belong to her or to the defender? (A.) I cannot tell, but she always spoke about the money as going to be the defender's. (Q.) Did your mother not speak to you as if she meant to keep her money as long as she lived, and that the defender was to have it after she died? (A.) She wanted to give it to the defender when she was in life. When my mother said that defender was to get the money that night, she did not say that she thought she was dying.”

Mrs M'Kenzie, wife of the said Alexander M'Kenzie, deponed,—Mrs M'Kenzie “used to say that the pursuer would never handle a penny of hers, and that she had got all that she would ever get. Mrs M'Kenzie also said that the defender would get all that she had, as he deserved it. (Q.) Did she say that frequently? (A.) Well, whenever she was saying anything about the pursuer; she has said that two or three times. The first time I heard her say it was about four years ago when she had a quarrel with the pursuer. She also stated that to me about two weeks before she died. There was no one else in the bedroom at the time. Mrs M'Kenzie then said that the pursuer had come there to annoy her, and was wanting the things before she was away, but that she had got all that she would ever get, for she had made that all right, and had left it to defender, as he deserved it for being so kind to her. I was frequently about the house during Mrs M'Kenzie's last illness until the pursuer came, and then I did not go up so often. The defender generally used to nurse his mother, and he used to sit up with her at nights after he left his work. Mrs M'Kenzie could not write. The pursuer had not been about her mother's house for four years until about two or three weeks before her mother's death. By the Court.—(Q.) Might the pursuer not have been in her mother's house without you knowing? (A.) She was not there when I went, and I knew that she had not been there, because they were not speaking. . . . Cross.—. . . I understood that Mrs M'Kenzie meant to keep her money while she lived, and that when she died the defender was to get it.”

Frederick Gebelmann deponed,—“I was married to Martha M'Kenzie, a daughter of the late Mrs M'Kenzie, on 15th July 1890. . . . I remember of speaking to the late Mrs M'Kenzie as to my intention of marrying her daughter. That was nine or ten months before she died.

No. 54.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Dawson v.
M'Kenzie.

No. 54.
Dec. 8, 1891.
Dawson v.
M'Kenzie.

Mrs M'Kenzie said that she had nothing against my marriage if I would be agreeable to stay in the house, as she was used to her daughter Martha nursing her, but that Martha was to get the house furniture and the defender was to get all the money she had. Mrs M'Kenzie repeated that statement to me very often. . . ."

Miss Margaret Crawford, a professional nurse, deponed,—“I was in the habit of nursing Mrs M'Kenzie. I was frequently at the house, and I knew the family very well. Mrs M'Kenzie sometimes spoke to me about her money affairs. About fifteen months ago she spoke to me decidedly about them. She said, ‘Tom, you know, has always been a good son to me, and I am going to tell you that I have left all to him. I asked him to give me his hand that he would never forget Alick if I would leave all to him, for he deserves it, and he has always been dutiful and taken us all into the house and asked nothing in return.’ There was no one else present when that was said. At different times Mrs M'Kenzie has made similar statements to me about her affairs. Her statement was always that Tom would get everything, and it was always her dread that there would be any disturbance which would prevent defender from getting the money. Mrs M'Kenzie also mentioned that it was her dread that the pursuer would create a disturbance. Cross-examined.—Mrs M'Kenzie was a clever and intelligent woman, and when she made the statement about her affairs to me she was in her ordinary health. . . . I remember when Mrs M'Kenzie was speaking to me about lifting her money that she said it was required for the house and for the shop, as the shop was not doing well. She said that she gave money to help the shop, and to start a machine which cost a great lot of money, something like £100. Re-examined.—It was about half-a-dozen years ago that Mrs M'Kenzie mentioned about giving money for the shop. . . . I nursed Mrs M'Kenzie about two years ago. She was afflicted with asthma. I did not think her dangerously ill, because she got so often better.”

Mrs Forrester, who had known Mrs M'Kenzie for thirty-four years, and visited her regularly, deponed,—“ . . . I saw Mrs M'Kenzie several times when she was ill, and shortly before she died. I used to go over on the Sabbath evenings. She generally used to speak to me about the defender's kindness to her, and how attentive he had been to her. I knew the pursuer. I knew that she had not been about the house for two or three years before her mother died until July last. I saw the pursuer at Mrs M'Kenzie's house once or twice between July last and the date of Mrs M'Kenzie's death. The pursuer is a very strange tempered woman, and she and her mother did not do well together. The last time I saw Mrs M'Kenzie was on a Sabbath evening about three weeks before she died. That would be about the beginning of December last. She said to me on that occasion that she thought she would not be long here, that she had not a great deal to leave now, but that it was for Tom. She also said that she hoped there would be no noise about it; she always had a dread of the pursuer. . . ."

Mrs Brash, a widow, deponed,—“I was in the habit of visiting Mrs M'Kenzie very often. . . . Mrs M'Kenzie generally said to me when I was there, that whatever money she had she would leave to the defender. . . . (Q.) Did she ever give any reason why the defender should be so favoured? (A.) Because he had been a most dutiful son to her. I have heard Mrs M'Kenzie say that the pursuer would get nothing belonging to her as she was not deserving of it.”

The defender deponed,—“(Q.) Did your mother ever offer you the deposit-receipt? (A.) Yes, about two months after the sudden death of Mrs Pippin's husband, in September 1889, my mother sent Mrs Pippin

No. 54.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Dawson v.
M'Kenzie.

down to the shop to tell me to come up and go to lift the money, that she felt so ill that she was afraid that she would die in something like the same way as Mr Pippin. I did not go up to the house, as I knew my mother's way, and I said to Mrs Pippin that my mother would see some of us away yet. . . . I remember of my mother uplifting a sum of £20 on 12th December last. On the following day she gave me £10 to pay taxes and some accounts. On Tuesday, 16th December, when I came home for dinner about four o'clock, my mother told me that she had not been so well, and she asked me to have my dinner in the bedroom. After I had taken my dinner, she asked if I had enough money to pay the taxes, and I said that I still required £1. My mother then said she had a few pounds in the box which she would give me, and she told my sister Mrs Gebelmann to open the box and bring a pen and ink. She then put her mark on the deposit-receipt of 12th December 1890, asked me to sign it also, and handing the receipt to me said,—‘Now, that is yours.’ I took the deposit-receipt and placing it in the envelope returned it to the box, and my sister locked up the box again. I did not take the deposit-receipt out of the box again until the morning after the death, when I uplifted the money and re-deposited it in my own name. In connection with a question which arose with my niece Agnes Duncan after she got married, my mother asked me to go up and see Mr John Wilson, writer, Glasgow. Mr Wilson afterwards came down to see my mother, and gave her some advice on the subject. Mr Wilson afterwards said to me that my mother was very bad, and that it would be necessary to get her testament. I told my mother what Mr Wilson had said, and she said that there would be no testament with her—what she had she would give me in my hand. A day or two after I got the deposit-receipt from my mother, I told Mrs Pippin that my mother had given it to me. . . .

Cross-examined.— . . . (Q.) The first deposit-receipt produced is dated 1st February 1888, and is for £380, while the last one is dated 12th December 1890, for £240. Can you give me any idea where that £140 went to if you were keeping your mother all that time? (A.) My mother went to Carrickfergus in Ireland for her health for ten or twelve weeks at a time, and she took my brother Alexander's wife, my sister Martha, and Agnes Duncan with her, and kept them all there. That is what she did with the money, and she lifted it for that purpose. My mother used also to go down the Clyde occasionally. I could not tell how much money was consumed on these visits to Ireland. She generally went about June, and she has been there half-a-dozen times since she got the money. . . . I never was in Ireland with my mother. I did not know anything about the uplifting of the deposit-receipts from time to time; that was all done by my two sisters. (Q.) The deposit-receipts have been mostly cashed for sums of £10; do you represent that these sums were expended in visits to Ireland? (A.) I have known my mother to spend £20 in Ireland for a couple of months. My mother never helped to pay the household expenses with the interest and sums withdrawn from these deposit-receipts, and I never asked her to do so. . . . (Q.) Did you understand why she should leave nothing to the daughter who had just lost her husband? (A.) When my mother handed the deposit-receipt to me on the 16th December, she made me promise that I would look after Mrs Pippin. . . . I have been giving Mrs Pippin a few shillings a-week ever since she lost her husband. . . . (Q.) After taking out the deposit-receipt in her own name on 12th December, when do you think she first conceived the notion of giving the contents to you? (A.) On the following Tuesday, 16th December. She then said that she had got off it now all that she would require. (Q.) If that was the case, why

No. 54.

Dec. 8, 1891:
Dawson v.
M'Kenzie.

was the last deposit-receipt not taken out in your name? (A.) When I got the deposit-receipt I just put it in the box, and it was not taken out until after the death. I had been told by Mr Wilson, after my mother would not make a testament, that it would be necessary to get delivery of the deposit-receipt, and that is the reason why I put it into the box, and thought no more about it after it was endorsed. I thought that after the deposit-receipt was given to me nothing more was required. . . . (Q.) Was your idea that, even although your mother recovered, you could have kept that money from her and never given her any? (A.) Certainly; I considered that it was wholly mine. My mother had said to me when handing me the deposit-receipt, 'That is yours.' She also said, 'Promise me that you will look after Mrs Pippin.' She said that when she handed over the deposit-receipt to me. (Q.) And you considered that you got the money with that charge? (A.) Yes. (Q.) To administer it, looking after Mrs Pippin? (A.) Yes, and I promised her to do so. (Q.) You took delivery of it on that condition, that you would fulfil your dying mother's wish in that respect? (A.) Yes. My mother had also said that the furniture was to belong to my sister Mrs Gebelmann, but that was some months before. She said nothing about the furniture at the time the deposit-receipt was handed over to me. On the occasion when my mother spoke about the furniture she was unwell, and what she said was, that, on account of Martha nursing her, she was entitled to the furniture. I considered that the handing over of the furniture to Mrs Gebelmann and of the deposit-receipt to me was part of the arrangement of my mother's affairs in view of her death. . . . The money in the deposit-receipt and the furniture embraced all that my mother possessed in the world. (Q.) Did you not think it necessary to let your brother Alexander know that your mother had parted with all her estate? (A.) No; he knew that it was my mother's intention to part with it to me. I cannot say why I did not tell my brother Alexander that my mother had carried out her intention. . . . My mother had often spoken about my getting the money before 16th December last. She has mentioned that to all the members of the family except Alexander. She has also spoken about it to my brother-in-law, Frederick Gebelmann. (Q.) Was it a subject of common talk amongst you that it was your mother's intention to give you the money? (A.) It was. That had been well understood for years before my mother's death. . . . I never heard my mother say that the pursuer was to get any of her money. (Q.) Did your mother ever say that she would get nothing? (A.) Yes. When my mother would not make her testament, Mr Wilson advised me to get delivery of the deposit-receipt. (Q.) And you got delivery of it? (A.) Yes. . . . My mother's deposit-receipt was kept along with my sister's and my own in one box. There was only one key to the box, and my mother generally kept it in a drawer. My mother frequently talked to me about the money when she was very ill. My mother said to me that she was afraid the pursuer would get the money. I told my mother that Mr Wilson said it was necessary that I should get delivery of the deposit-receipt. That was nine months before she died. At that time my mother said that there would be no testament with her, that she would give it to me into my hand. I never asked my mother for the deposit-receipt. For seven or eight years my mother was confined to the house during the winter time being up one day and in bed another. My mother's condition did not get worse between 13th and 16th December. When she gave me the deposit-receipt on 16th December, she was able to sit at the fire. My interview with my mother at that time would last perhaps two hours. I generally came to my dinner at four o'clock, and it would be after six before I left. I suppose my mother endorsed the deposit-receipt at that time because she felt so ill. By the Court.— . . . When my mother gave me the deposit-receipt she said that she did not think she would get better.”

No. 54.

Dec. 8, 1891.

Dawson v.

M'Kenzie.

Mrs Martha Gebelmann deponed,—“ My brother Tom got the deposit-receipt in question on the 16th of December, I think. I fix the date because I bought a cloak on that day. (Shewn No. 25)—That is a receipt for payment of the cloak, dated 16th December. It was my mother who gave me the money to buy the cloak. It was on the same day that my brother had the transaction about the deposit-receipt. Those in the house on that occasion were my brother, my mother, and myself. My brother and I were brought into my mother's room about four o'clock in the afternoon. My mother was in bed at the time. My brother Tom had come up for his dinner, and my mother asked him to come into the room. On that occasion my mother gave me £1 to go for the cloak, and I went. When I came back my mother said to my brother Tom, had he paid the taxes ? and he said he had paid them all but one, for which he wanted £1. He said he would pay it himself. My mother told me to bring her the little box in which she had her deposit-receipt. I did so, and she gave me £4, which she had borrowed from me. There were three deposit-receipts in the box—one belonging to myself for £100, another belonging to my brother for £100, and the third deposit-receipt was my mother's. I handed my mother her own deposit-receipt at her request. She then asked me to bring her pen and ink, which I did. She made a cross on the deposit-receipt, and then my brother and I signed it at her request. She then handed the deposit to my brother Tom, saying, ' There, that's yours, as I have got all that I require of it, and I know you will look after your sister Jessie,' meaning Mrs Pippin. My brother then put the deposit-receipt into the box, along with the other two deposit-receipts. That box was the common family repository where all our valuables were kept. My mother frequently during her life spoke to me about that money on deposit-receipt. She many a time during a period of years said that the money she had was Tom's. I have heard her say so in presence of Mrs Dawson. On one occasion, three or four years before my mother's death, my sister wanted a tureen that my mother had. My mother said that perhaps she would live us all out, and made a little fun at the time. She said that the money she had was my brother Tom's, and anything that was in the house she would give to me, as she knew that my brother Tom would not take it from me. I think £11 is the fair value of the furniture belonging to my mother in the house. The furniture was old and worn out. Cross.— . . . My mother said that she gave the whole of the furniture to me. She did so at the same time as she gave Tom the deposit-receipt. (Q.) You get the furniture and Tom gets the whole money, so that between you you get the whole estate ? (A.) Yes, it was my mother's wish that we should. My mother did not say to me that she did not wish Alexander, or Mrs Pippin, or Mrs Dawson to get anything. (Q.) Can you give any reason why they should not get a share as well as yourself ? (A.) My brother Tom and I were the only ones who looked after my mother and did anything for her. (Q.) Why should you and your brother get it all ? (A.) I helped with my brother to nurse my mother. I sat up at night, and did all I could. I was the youngest in the house. Mrs Pippin is very poor. She got £100 as well as I. I cannot say where that £100 is now; I don't know whether she has got it. As far as I remember, I have stated all that my mother said on the 16th of December when the deposit-receipt was handed over to my brother. (Q.) Is it not the case that your mother

No. 54.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Dawson v.
M'Kenzie.

signed the receipt and handed it to Tom in order that he should get a pound or two out of the receipt to pay the taxes? (A.) No, he said he would pay the tax himself out of his own money. When my mother gave the deposit-receipt to Tom, the conversation began about some taxes which had to be paid. I think it was the income-tax, and that it amounted to £1, but I cannot really say. (Q.) And it was because of this amount of money that your mother asked you to fetch the deposit-receipt out of the box? (A.) Yes, and to give me the £4 which she had borrowed from me. (Q.) Did your mother get £1 on that occasion to give to Tom? (A.) No, he said he would pay it himself. (Q.) If she did not give him the £1, can you explain why it was necessary to take the deposit-receipt out of the box? (A.) Because she was going to repay me the £4 which she had borrowed, and she gave it to me. It was on 16th December that she gave me the £4."

Alexander M'Kenzie (who was examined for the pursuer) deponed,—“The defender told me that my mother had given him her money. I cannot say whether he told me before or after my mother died. . . . I was not at all annoyed when the defender told me that my mother had given him all her money. The words he used were that my mother had given the deposit of her money to him. The defender did not say anything to me about Mrs Pippin. He did not say at that time that my mother had told him he was to look after Mrs Pippin. (Q.) Did he tell you shortly after your mother's death that he was to look after Mrs Pippin? (A.) Yes; and he has always done so, and did so before my mother's death. I am married, and I could not afford to look after them as he could. I have heard the defender tell Mrs Pippin that my mother desired him to look after her. (Q.) Is it not rather strange that Mrs Pippin never heard that? (A.) Since her husband died Mrs Pippin has not been well, and it is quite possible that things might often be said in her presence which she might pay no attention to. . . . By the Court.—It was generally understood by myself and the other members of the family before my mother died that the defender was to get my mother's money. That was understood amongst us for three or four years at anyrate."

Mr Wilson, writer, was not examined. In a letter addressed by him as the defender's agent to the pursuer's agent, dated 14th January 1891, he stated that the deposit-receipt was handed over to his client on the 14th December previously, and in the account of the deceased's personal estate sworn to by the defender the particulars of the £240 given were "an immediate gift, inter vivos, on 12th December 1890."

The Lord Ordinary (Kincairney), on 21st August 1891, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that Mrs M'Kenzie, mother of the pursuer and defender, died on 27th December 1890; (2) that on 16th December 1890 she made a donation inter vivos to the defender, of a bank deposit-receipt in her favour for £240, and of the said £240 contained therein: Finds that the defender has not intromitted with any other part of the estate of the deceased: Therefore assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds him entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.— . . . A proof has now been taken in which the defender led. I do not think that the evidence adduced by him has been met to any serious extent by counter evidence; and what the defender has to overcome is not so much the pursuer's counter evidence as the very strong presumption against the donation which he avers.

"There is always a strong presumption against donation, either inter vivos or mortis causa.

"In this particular case the presumption is exceptionally strong. What is

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—There was a strong presumption against donation, and it was stronger against an inter vivos gift than one

No. 54.

Dec. 8, 1891.

Dawson v.
M'Kenzie.

averred is not donation mortis causa but a donation inter vivos and absolute, and there is authority for the proposition that a more complete proof is required to establish the latter than the former—(Sharp v. Paton, 27th June 1883, 10 R. 1000, per Lord Deas, 1008). Further, what is said to have been bestowed was practically Mrs M'Kenzie's whole estate. The gift would leave her penniless and dependent on her son ; further, she had five other children with legal claim to legitim on her death, a right not readily or easily defeated, and not in all cases liable to be defeated ; and lastly, the donation is alleged to have been made by a blank indorsation of a deposit-receipt—Mrs M'Kenzie's indorsation having been made by a cross on the back of the deposit-receipt (she being unable to write) attested by the defender and by his sister Mrs Gebelmann.

"The defender's case, therefore, requires careful examination, and it is not without hesitation that I have ultimately come to the conclusion that it has been made out.

"The facts are shortly these :—

"Mrs M'Kenzie's husband had died in 1882. The defender depones that for some years previously his father had resided with and been maintained by him ; that his mother had continued to reside with him, and that he had maintained her, and also his sister Martha, afterwards Mrs Gebelmann, and his niece, Agnes Duncan, until they were married. It would rather appear, however, that Mrs M'Kenzie must have contributed either to the expense of the housekeeping or of the business.

"Mrs M'Kenzie had four other children, one resident in Melbourne, and the others had been married.

"The defender depones that his mother frequently expressed her intention that he should have her money, and her desire to avoid, if possible, disputes about it after her death. It appears to have been generally understood in the family that the defender should have his mother's money, and to have been acquiesced in as natural, I suppose, because she had lived in his house.

"Not long before her death Mrs M'Kenzie had occasion to consult Mr Wilson, a lawyer, and he, noticing the frail state of her health, had advised the defender that she ought to make her will. The defender repeated this advice to his mother, and he depones that she replied that there would be no testament with her ; what she had she would give into his, the defender's, hand. On another occasion, Mr Wilson, when this was mentioned to him, advised the defender that it would be necessary that he should get delivery of the deposit-receipt.

"One would have wished to know the precise advice which Mr Wilson gave, but that gentleman has not been examined.

"It appears that Mrs M'Kenzie had been in failing health for several years, and that latterly she never left her house during winter. She suffered from asthma, and was much indisposed. The evidence is not so clear as might be wished about the state of her health shortly before her death. She died on 27th December 1890, at the age of sixty-three. On 12th December she drew £20 from bank, and a new deposit-receipt for £240 in her favour was made out. The donation is said to have been made on 16th December, when she seems to have been seriously ill, though not in a condition materially worse than on the 12th.

"The defender depones that on that day she asked him to come to her room ; that her daughter, Mrs Gebelmann, was present ; and that Mrs M'Kenzie desired Mrs Gebelmann to bring her the deposit-receipt and pen and ink ; and that she then made her cross on the deposit-receipt by way of indorsation, and that the defender wrote his name on it as a witness.

"She then handed it to him, and said, 'Now, that is yours.' He then replaced the deposit-receipt in the box, which was locked by Mrs Gebelmann, and never touched it again until he took it out of the box after his mother's death and cashed it at the bank without informing the clerk at the bank that

No. 54.

Dec. 8, 1891.

Dawson v.
M'Kenzie.

mortis causa.¹ In every case of alleged donation independent testimony was required.² Here there was no evidence beyond that of the alleged his mother had died. He says, on cross-examination, that his mother made him promise to look after his sister, Mrs Pippin, who seems to have been very poor, and was indeed in receipt of parochial relief.

"The pursuer's counsel endeavoured to establish discrepancies between the defender's evidence and that of Mrs Gebelmann; but I think her evidence substantially corroborates her brother's on all material points. She mentions, what he does not, that she also signed the deposit-receipt as a witness to her mother's indorsation.

"The defender and Mrs Gebelmann also depone that they understood that the gift to the defender was absolute.

"Mrs Pippin depones that her mother had told her of her intention to give the defender the deposit-receipt, and she was afterwards told, by the defender I suppose, that she had done so.

"That I think is the whole of the direct evidence on the point.

"It is not and indeed hardly could be contradicted. I have no right to hold that these witnesses are perjured, and I can find no solid reason to doubt their substantial veracity. It appears to me to be sufficiently, though not perhaps superabundantly proved that on 16th December Mrs M'Kenzie had the deposit-receipt taken out of its box and brought to her for no other reason than that she might endorse it, and give it to the defender. She had clearly no need to draw the money at the time, and if the occurrence took place at all, that was her only intelligible object.

"I therefore think it proved that she made a donation of the deposit-receipt and its contents to the defender.

"But the question of real difficulty remains: Was this donation intended to be an absolute donation or only a donation mortis causa? Was it meant to be irrevocable or not?

"The defender, Mrs Gebelmann, and Mrs Pippin deponed that they understood that it was absolute and irrevocable.

"Mrs M'Kenzie died about a fortnight afterwards, and nothing that occurred after the 16th December throws any light on the point.

"It is no doubt, generally speaking, antecedently very unlikely that one should make an absolute gift of her whole property, and often an assertion to that effect might seem so incredible as to be almost incapable of proof. Nevertheless, if it be considered that Mrs M'Kenzie had lived in family with her son probably during all his life, and may have had the most ample reason to feel an absolute reliance on his filial affection, she may have done what the defender says she did. It is probably the case that what she desired was to secure that he should have the money after her death; but she may very probably have thought that the best way to secure that was to give it to him during her life, and the notion of a donation mortis causa is probably too complicated and artificial to be plausibly ascribed to her.

"I have certainly difficulty on the point, but I am not prepared to reject the defender's evidence.

"The indirect evidence, at least the balance of it, is to the effect that Mrs M'Kenzie and the defender lived on cordial terms; that she entertained much affection for him and received in return corresponding attention. It also shews that she had a fixed purpose that he should have her money, but the impression of the witnesses was that the defender was to get her money after her death and not during her life.

"It is in favour of the defender's case that his statement that his mother had given him her money did not surprise the other members of the family except the pursuer, is believed by them, and contentedly acquiesced in. This is even ¹ Sharp v. Paton, June 21, 1883, 10 R. 1000; Ross v. Mallis, Dec. 7, 1871, 10 Macph. 197, 44 Scot. Jur. 119.

² Gibson v. Hutchison, July 5, 1872, 10 Macph. 923, 44 Scot. Jur. 514; Crosbie's Trustees v. Wright, May 28, 1880, 7 R. 823.

donee and his sister, to whom it was alleged the furniture had been given. Even upon the defender's own testimony the gift was one for administration for behoof of other members of the family as well as of himself. A gift under conditions was in law no gift.¹

No. 54.
Dec. 8, 1891.
Dawson v.
M'Kenzie.

Argued for the defender;—This was not a question of balancing of testimony, for it was all on one side. The only question was whether there was sufficient evidence to overcome the presumption.² The animus donandi was abundantly proved, and a good reason for it was that the defender had supported several members of the family for years. The direct evidence in favour of an inter vivos gift was all that was required, and was consistent. Failing an inter vivos gift, a donatio mortis causa had been made out. It was not necessary that a donatio mortis causa should be made in immediate prospect of death.³

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The defender in this action rests his claim to the money for which he is sued on an alleged donation by his mother shortly before her death. A well-settled rule in such cases—I quote from the late Lord President in Sharp v. Paton, 21st June 1883, 10 R. 1006—is that “there is a strong presumption against donation, and it requires very strong and unimpeachable evidence to overcome it.” I have anxiously examined the evidence in this present case, and have come to the conclusion that it distinctly falls short of this requirement.

The deposit-receipt, which was the subject of the alleged gift, constituted, with her furniture, the whole estate of the deceased. The defender is one of her six surviving children, and of the other five none are said to be affluent, and at least one is in indigence. The facts regarding the maintenance of the family in former years do not seem to support the suggestion that the estate of the deceased had been to any large extent saved by the defender during her lifetime from burdens which would naturally have fallen on it.

Although the case of the defender is donation inter vivos, he is, of course, well entitled to derive what support he can from the age or health of the deceased, or her own notions about her health, as diminishing the inherent improbability of her divesting herself of her whole estate during her life. The case with the defender's brother, Alexander M'Kenzie, who was called as a witness by the pursuer, but whose evidence is really strongly for the defender, and I am not able to say that any undue means have been used to bring about this state of feeling.

“It was argued for the pursuer that the gift, supposing it made, was not in my view an absolute donation, but was burdened with an obligation to support the defender's sister, Mrs Pippin, and was really of the nature of a trust, and was, if that were so, wholly ineffectual. The case of Thomson v. Dunlop, 23d January 1884, 11 R. 453, seems to justify that position. But I am of opinion that the facts of this case do not raise the point, because, assuming that there was inter vivos donation, I do not think that it can be held that any legal obligation to support Mrs Pippin was imposed on the defender. I think rather that she was commended to his care with that confidence which the gift to him, supposing it made, so amply demonstrates. I think it cannot be represented that the defender was not a donee but a trustee. . . .”

¹ Thomson, &c. v. Dunlop, Jan. 23, 1884, 11 R. 453.

² Macdonald v. Macdonald, June 11, 1889, 16 R. 758; Gibson v. Hutchison, supra; Crosbie's Trustees v. Wright, supra; Thomson's Executor v. Thomson, June 8, 1882, 9 R. 911.

³ Blyth, &c. v. Curle, Feb. 20, 1885, 12 R. 674; but see M'Nicol v. M'Dougal, Oct. 25, 1889, 17 R. 25.

No. 54.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Dawson v.
M'Kenzie.

facts, however, do not go far in this direction. The deceased was only sixty-three. Apart from her having died a fortnight later, there is nothing to shew that at 16th December her illness was critical, or that a conviction had been borne in upon her that her use of worldly goods was over. The testimony of Mrs Pippin comes nearest this point, but it is diluted and not strengthened by its references to former occasions, and it is not supported either by her own opinion of her mother's health or by the subsequent speech and conduct of the deceased and the other members of the household.

On two occasions spoken to by independent witnesses the deceased seems to have expressed intentions of leaving her money to the defender. The defender indeed has himself thrown some doubt on the accuracy of his mother's recorded statements to friends on this subject by examining a witness (Margaret Crawford), who says that months before her death the deceased told her she had already "left all to" the defender, which was certainly not the case. I am disposed, however, to consider that the other two women establish that when she spoke to them she had testamentary intentions of that kind more or less deliberate.

I have mentioned these matters first, not because they are of primary importance, but in order to see how far the defender gathers antecedent probability to sustain him in the case which he has to make out by direct evidence. To that evidence I now come, and I shall state first in summary why I consider it insufficient to establish donation. First, there is no real evidence whatever; second, the testimony directly relating to the gift is solely that of interested persons; third, the testimony of those interested persons, taken as it is given, does not clearly, circumstantially, and consistently tell what was said and done so as to demonstrate donation.

In all previous cases of this kind there has been at least some act of the deceased donor which is admitted or proved by real evidence to have taken place, and which goes so far towards donation. The money is invested in name of the donee, or the deposit-receipt is endorsed in his favour under the hand of the donor. Here there is a blank indorsation attested by a mark. The illiteracy of the deceased, of course, renders this form of signature consistent with the defender's case if it were otherwise made out, but not the less is he without what is generally the first step in such cases, independent proof, by a signature telling its own story, that the deceased did something to realise or part with the fund. Apart from testimony there is nothing to shew that Mrs M'Kenzie put pen to paper on the occasion in question, or that it ever occurred.

In considering the testimony, the salient feature is that only the defender and Mrs Gebelmann are said to have been present when the gift was made. Now, the estate of their mother having consisted of the deposit-receipt and the furniture, Mrs Gebelmann depones that, at the same time as she gave the deposit-receipt to the defender she gave the furniture to her, Mrs Gebelmann. The defender, on the other hand, depones that his mother said nothing about the furniture on that occasion, although she had done so some months before. I cannot regard this discrepancy otherwise than as of grave importance. It throws doubt on the story, and at least shews that there is not on the part of both that pointed recollection of what the deceased woman really said about her property which enables us to proceed with confidence regarding the other part of it, or to be clear whether she was minded to divest herself of all she had, or only of her money.

No. 54.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Dawson v.
M'Kenzie.

Turning now to what is spoken to as having been said about the deposit-receipt, the first thing which strikes one is that this important and affecting act of the mother giving away her all has a most inept beginning or occasion. "The transaction," says the defender, "originated in my stating that I was short of £1,"—for the taxes, as appears. The account of the gift itself had better be given as it stands,—“On Tuesday, 16th December, when I came home for dinner about four o'clock, my mother told me that she had not been so well, and she asked me to have my dinner in the bedroom. After I had taken my dinner, she asked if I had enough money to pay the taxes, and I said that I still required £1. My mother then said she had a few pounds in the box which she would give me, and she told my sister Mrs Gebelmann to open the box and bring a pen and ink. She then put her mark on the deposit-receipt of 12th December 1890, asked me to sign it also, and handing the receipt to me said,—‘Now, that is yours.’ I took the deposit-receipt and placing it in an envelope returned it to the box, and my sister locked up the box again. I did not take the deposit-receipt out of the box again until the morning after the death, when I uplifted the money and re-deposited it in my own name.” Now, apart from everything else, it seems to me that it would be impossible to accept this excessively bald and blank story as importing a donation, and yet this is the defender's case, where it ought to be at its best, in his own examination in chief. The pursuer, it is true, by her cross-examination, succeeded in infusing some colour into the narrative, and Mrs Gebelmann's account is a little fuller. Yet the only speech ascribed to the deceased never reaches higher than the following :—“There, that's yours, as I have got all I require of it, and I know you will look after your sister Jessie.” Now, this might mean all that the defender requires, if it were led up to, or followed, or explained, or acted on. But when all is said, the substance of the interview is simply that the conversation having begun about the £1 for the taxes, the money-box is asked for; the deposit-receipt taken out and endorsed (as it had been often before when money was required); it is handed to the defender with the words which I have quoted, in their briefer or ampler form; and the defender, apparently without a word in reply, puts the deposit-receipt back in its place.

Nobody seems to have said or done anything further on the subject (with one doubtful exception) until Mrs M'Kenzie died. Then the defender that very morning went to the bank and uplifted the money, omitting to tell the bank that the depositor was dead.

The doubtful exception to which I refer is a communication said to have been made by the deceased to Mrs Pippin. “My mother,” says Mrs Pippin, “had told me, the day after she had given the deposit-receipt to my brother, what she had done, and the defender told me afterwards.” Now, it is obvious that such evidence is perfectly useless, for it does not even profess to tell what the deceased said, and even if it is to be taken as meaning that she used the word “gave,” that is wholly ambiguous and proves nothing.

The fact that the defender kept the alleged gift secret from all the rest of the family except Mrs Pippin, who appears to be dependent on him, cannot be overlooked. The Court is, I think, bound to exercise peculiar caution in such a case. There may have been good reasons for such secrecy, but the means of testing the facts are thereby proportionally diminished.

But further, in a case where the defender has at the time acted with such reserve towards his relatives, it became him to be specially frank and above-

No. 54.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Dawson v.
M'Kenzie.

board in possessing the Court of all available evidence. Now, I do not think he has been so. As he presents his case, his attitude was that of the passive recipient of his mother's bounty. But it incidentally appeared in cross-examination that, before the alleged gift, he had been taking counsel with a lawyer, and I have found and heard no satisfactory explanation of the following sentence:—"I had been told by Mr Wilson, after my mother would not make a will, that it would be necessary to get delivery of the deposit-receipt, and that is the reason why I put it into the box and thought no more about it after it was endorsed." Now, Mr Wilson was not examined; he and the defender may have had quite legitimate occasion for this conversation, whether it took place with or without the knowledge of the deceased; but the importance of the incident was manifest, and the suggestion of the sentence which I have read is rather sinister; but it at all events shews that there is an omitted chapter in the narrative, and the omission confirms my indisposition to hold the case to be proved.

I should have hesitated to propose, as I now do, that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor be recalled, if the question had been one of mere credibility. But I consider the evidence, even as it stands, to be insufficient in quality to establish donation.

LORD ADAM.—The question in this case is whether it is proved by the defender that a donation of a sum of £240 contained in a deposit-receipt was made to him by his mother in 1890. There is always a strong presumption against donation, so strong indeed that it is within the last thirty or forty years that parole proof has been held sufficient to establish it. I agree that, in the words of the late Lord President, "it requires very strong and unimpeachable evidence to overcome the presumption against donation." In the present case this presumption is specially strong, looking to the facts adverted to by your Lordship, that this woman was only sixty-three years old, and, though frail, was at the time of the alleged donation in the same condition of health that she had been in for months before, and that the alleged donation is of her whole estate, with the result that she thereby placed herself in the position of being entirely dependent upon her son or upon charity.

Now, what is the reason given by the defender for the alleged donation? He says that he kept his mother, and paid the household expenses, and that that consideration was one of the motives which led his mother to make the donation. It was pointed out to him in cross-examination that the legacy received by his mother in 1883 amounted to £490, that on 1st February 1888 it had diminished to £380, and on 12th December 1890 to £240, and he is asked to account for the decrease. His answer is that the money had been spent on visits to Carrickfergus, where she generally went in June of each year. It was further pointed out that there were ten deposit-receipts between 1st February 1888 and 2d July 1890, and he is unable to account for that. There is other evidence shewing that the defender's mother did contribute to the expenses of the household, because it appears that a sum of £20 was drawn on 12th December 1890, and the defender admits that he got £10 of it to pay taxes on some accounts. The defender therefore is not very candid or very accurate when he states that he supported his mother.

These observations, however, merely go to the general probability or improbability of the donation having been made, and I agree that his case must depend upon the evidence of the only two persons who were present when the donation is said to have been made, and that when such a case depends on the evidence of two witnesses only, one of whom has so great an interest in the result, we cannot give effect to their evidence unless it appears to be thoroughly satisfactory and reliable. I do not suppose that the Court will ever give effect to a donation of this kind, unless they are in possession of all the facts and circumstances at the time of the alleged donation. I agree with your Lordship that the evidence of the two witnesses is not satisfactory. They contradict one another in various particulars, and I do not think that any of your Lordships would accept what is said by the defender in his examination in chief—when, if he were a candid man, we should expect to have a full account of what took place—as sufficient to constitute donation. In cross-examination he makes various additions. He says, for instance, with regard to Mrs Pippin,—“When my mother handed the deposit-receipt to me on the 16th December, she made me promise that I would look after Mrs Pippin”; and again, “My mother had said to me when handing me the deposit-receipt, ‘That is yours.’ She also said, ‘Promise me that you will look after Mrs Pippin.’ She said that when she handed over the deposit-receipt to me,” and he follows this up by saying, “I have promised to take her and her family into my house to live.” In another passage he says that when his mother made the donation “she said that she had got off it now all that she would require,” making for the first time the suggestion that when she made the donation his mother thought herself in articulo mortis. This suggestion, however, he repeats in a subsequent passage of his evidence in answer to a question by the Court,—“She said she would not require any more money because she felt herself done. When my mother gave me the deposit-receipt, she said that she did not think she would get better.” This evidence may have been intended to meet what was obviously a possible explanation of the action of the deceased in the view of the pursuer, viz., that the deposit-receipt was handed to the defender in trust for administration only. In any case, it appears to me to be a very important consideration that these additions to his story are made by the defender under the pressure of cross-examination. If he had been a candid man we would have had the whole account in his examination in chief.

Again, when we come to compare his evidence with the evidence of his sister, the other witness to the alleged donation, we do not find that she gives the same account of the matter. She adds various points of which we hear nothing from the defender; she says very distinctly that her mother gave her a gift of the furniture at the same time as she gave the defender the deposit-receipt, but the defender says that that gift was made months before. It seems to me that evidence such as this cannot be relied on.

There is also another passage in Mrs Gebelmann's evidence to which I would like to advert. It is as follows,—“(Q.) When your mother said that Tom was to look after Mrs Pippin, what did you understand her to mean? (A.) She meant that my brother would never see my sister want anything. (Q.) Did you understand her to mean by that that Tom was to give her her share of the money which he had in the deposit-receipt? (A.) No, she meant that he would never see Jessie want. (Q.) Where was he to get the money to give to Jessie? (A.) He always worked for money, and she knew that he would help Jessie. She said that she did not mean him to give her any money out of the deposit-receipt.” One can see the motive of these questions, for if no money was to be given to Mrs Pippin out of the deposit-receipt, then there was no

No. 54.
Dec. 8, 1891.
Dawson v.
M'Kenzie.

No. 54.

Dec. 8, 1891.
Dawson v.
M'Kenzie.

trust imposed on the defender, but it seems to me a very odd thing that the old lady should have limited her directions as to Mrs Pippin in the way spoken to by Mrs Gebelmann. The statement may be true, but it is not very credible.

Now, if we cannot rely on the evidence of the two principal witnesses the defender's case must fail. There is no real evidence to support it. A blank indorsation of a deposit-receipt is sometimes not of much importance in a case of this kind. Here I think it is very important. Further, the witnesses to the mark of the deceased were the defender and his sister Mrs Gebelmann, and the defender does not go to the bank at once to get the receipt transferred. He puts it back in the box from which it had been taken, and only goes to the bank after his mother's death. The evidence of the other witnesses for the defender, with the exception of Mrs Pippin, is to the effect that his mother intended to leave him her money at her death, and that appears to me rather against than in favour of the defender's case. As to Mrs Pippin's evidence, I cannot in the circumstances accept it as reliable. We know that she is a needy woman, and that since the date of the alleged donation the defender has promised to take her and her family to live with him. Further, there seems to have been considerable confusion on the side of the defender as to the date of the alleged donation. In the residue account prepared by his agent we find the date stated as 12th December, and in a letter by the same agent written on 14th January 1891 the donation is said to have been made on 14th December. How did this confusion arise? No explanation is given. In such a state of the evidence the Court would, I think, be very wrong were it to hold that there was here such strong and clear evidence as to leave no reasonable doubt that a donation was made to the defender.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with the view of the evidence which has been presented by your Lordship in the chair, and which has been further developed by Lord Adam, and were it not for the great importance of the principles involved in the case, I should not have added anything to the opinions which have been delivered.

It is to be remembered that all the cases of donation which come before the Court, whether described as donationes mortis causa or inter vivos, are really cases of gifts or alleged gifts by a moribund person to those who are around and about him. I had occasion to consider the subject very seriously when taking the proof in the case of Sharp v. Paton, and it appeared to me then that some of the previously decided cases came dangerously near to the point of giving effect to a nuncupative will. It is very difficult to find a real distinction between what is called a nuncupative or verbal will and a gift of bank money, not admitting of actual delivery, bestowed in contemplation of death and accompanied by words of testamentary intention. If it were open to reconsider the matter, I should doubt whether the Court would now sanction the principle by which money in bank vouched by a deposit-receipt is held to be well transferred by handing over or pointing to the receipt. I ventured in the case of Sharp to suggest what appeared to me to be a reasonable limitation, viz., that we should not sustain a case of deathbed donation where it is supported by no evidence other than that of the alleged donee and of persons subject to his or her influence. That view was adopted by the Court on a full consideration of the authorities, and I am unable to find in the facts of this case any solid dition which will take it out of the category of the cases which were condemned in the case of Sharp. No. 54.

A proper case of donation mortis causa is where a moveable corporeal subject is handed to the donee in the presence of witnesses, with the implied condition that it is to be handed back in the event of the donor's recovery from the illness from which he is suffering. The indorsation of a deposit-receipt does not seem to me to be a proper way of transferring money in bank from a dying person to a donee, and certainly where the transference is said to be effected by an indorsation in blank, it can amount to nothing, and is quite inadequate to pass any right whatever. The present case is no better when it is attempted to refer it to the category of donation inter vivos, because in that view the mandate to uplift the money falls upon the death of the mandant. There is therefore wanting in the present case what is necessary to constitute a good donatio inter vivos, either the actual handing over of the subject of the gift during life or a power given to the donee to receive it after death. If this was a donatio inter vivos to take effect immediately and irrevocably, then the donee ought to have gone to the bank and cashed the deposit-receipt at once. If that had been done, and an action had then been brought by the defender's mother calling upon him to account, would the Court ever have entertained the theory of donation in the face of an assertion by her that she had signed the receipt for the purpose of his uplifting the proceeds and handing them to her? Dec. 8, 1891. Dawson v. M'Kenzie.

We have not the evidence of the defunct in this case to oppose to that of the defender, but we are not therefore released from the duty of scrutinising the evidence by which the alleged gift is supported. This is due to the fact that the defender delayed to act upon the alleged donation until his mother was dead, when there was no one to contradict him. I ought to guard myself against being supposed to make any imputation on the truthfulness of the parties in the case. It is of the nature of such cases that we never know where the truth is, and possibly the witnesses who favour the view of donation may be speaking the truth, but the question is whether we can hold property to be transferred where there is no evidence other than that of those who will benefit by the alleged transfer. While the Lord Ordinary may be correct in characterising the case as one of difficulty, I think the tendency of the decisions has been to establish a sounder ground of judgment in recent cases, and persons who mean to give away money on deathbed must find a better way of doing so than by the indorsation of deposit-receipts.

LORD KINNAR was absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary: "Find that the defender has failed to prove that the deceased Mrs M'Kenzie made a donation to him of the deposit-receipt for £240 mentioned on record, and that he, the defender, is bound to account for said sum, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from 27th December 1890 as part of the estate of the deceased, and decern," &c.

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—WHIGHAM & COWAN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 55.

Dec. 9, 1891.
Malcolm v.
Campbell.

MISS AGNES CHRISTINA MALCOLM, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—

Dickson—Salvesen.

MRS AGNES TRAILL OR CAMPBELL, Defender (Respondent).—

W. C. Smith—Cullen.

Contract—Sale of heritage—Unilateral agreement.—In an action by A B for declarator that the defender had sold a house to the pursuer, the pursuer founded on the following document subscribed by the defender before witnesses, and delivered by her to the pursuer,—“I have agreed to sell my house . . . for one hundred and fifty pounds to A B.” The Court assolizied the defender, holding that the document did not import a unilateral obligation by the defender to sell the house to the pursuer at a certain price, which would have been effectual without writing on the part of the pursuer, but imported merely one side of a bilateral contract of sale of heritage, which could have no effect until completed in writing by the other party.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

ON 23d June 1891 Miss Agnes Christina Malcolm, stationer, High Street, Leven, raised an action against Mrs Agnes Traill or Campbell, residing at 82 High Street there, concluding for declarator that the defender had on 16th June 1891 sold to the pursuer the property No. 82 High Street, Leven, and for decree ordaining the defender to execute a valid conveyance thereof in favour of the pursuer, or alternatively for £250 damages.

The pursuer stated;—(Cond. 3) At a meeting between the pursuer and the defender the latter stated “she desired to sell her property, and ultimately both parties agreed on £150 as the price.” (Cond. 4) “The parties having concluded the contract of sale of the said house as above mentioned, the defender thereafter signed, in the presence of two subscribing witnesses, the following agreement:—‘Leven, June 16, 1891.—I have agreed to sell my house at corner of High Street, Leven, for one hundred and fifty pounds to Miss A. C. Malcolm.’ This agreement, which accurately embodies the contract of sale concluded between the parties, was at once delivered to the pursuer, and is still retained by her.”

The defender in answer stated that she signed the document founded on by the pursuer, “not intending or understanding in so doing that the contract of sale was thereby concluded, but on the footing that she was to receive from pursuer a written missive of acceptance, expressing pursuer’s part of the bargain in order to render the transaction complete. No such written acceptance or missive was however received by defender or signed by pursuer.”

The pursuer pleaded;—A valid and effectual contract of sale of the said subjects having been constituted by the said missive, and by the delivery thereof as condescended, and the defender having refused to fulfil the same, the pursuer is entitled to decree of implement as craved.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The action is irrelevant. (2) There being no concluded contract of sale between the parties, the defender should be assolizied.

On 12th November the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) sustained the first and second pleas in law for the defender, and assolizied her from the conclusions of the action, with expenses.*

* “OPINION.—I am of opinion that the defender should be assolizied.

“The pursuer’s averment is (cond. 3), that on 16th June 1891 the defender stated to the pursuer that she (the defender) desired to sell her property, and that both parties agreed on £150 as the price, and that the defender agreed to give immediate entry. The pursuer further avers that the parties having concluded the contract of sale the defender signed the following agreement:—

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—This was not the case of an offer to sell, which required the acceptance of the other party before it became enforceable, but of a unilateral obligation to dispoise on the pursuer tendering the price.* If necessary, the pursuer was willing to amend her record. No. 55.
Dec. 9, 1891.
Malcolm v.
Campbell.

Argued for the defender ;—Ex facie of this document it was nothing more than a record, under the hand of one of the parties only, of the fact of a contract of sale having been verbally concluded. The subject being heritage, a contract of sale to be effectual must be in writing, and signed by both parties. It was not possible to read the document as embodying a unilateral obligation binding on the defender only. It contained no words of unilateral obligation, merely a statement that the defender had “agreed,” and agreed meant agreed with someone, or, in other words, ‘Leven, 16th June 1891.—I have agreed to sell my house at corner of High Street, Leven, for £150, to Miss A. C. Malcolm.’ This document was duly attested. It was not signed by the pursuer, and no corresponding agreement or missive was executed by her. I do not read this document as a disposition of the house or as a unilateral promise to dispoise it, but as—what the pursuer herself calls it—a contract or agreement, and therefore mutual and bilateral.

“The defender, on the day on which this document was signed and delivered, withdrew her offer. It is not pretended that by that time there had been any rei interventus, and the question therefore is, whether the bargain was by that time beyond recall, or whether the defender had a locus penitentie. The defender maintained that she had, and referred to Goldston v. Young, 8th Dec. 1868, 7 Macph. 188, 41 Scot. Jur. 122.

“The pursuer maintained that that case did not apply, because there the contract in form and expression was mutual, and was embodied in two deeds—an offer and acceptance—and she maintained that this case fell under the proposition stated in Bell’s Principles, sec. 889, that a promise in writing to dispoise land if delivered is good without acceptance, and her counsel referred in support of that proposition to the following authorities :—Ferguson v. Paterson, 23d Nov. 1748, M. 8440 ; Muirhead v. Chalmers, 10th Aug. 1759, M. 3414 ; Fulton v. Johnstone, 26th Feb. 1761, M. 8446 ; and Barron v. Rose, 23d July 1794, M. 8463. Of these cases Ferguson v. Paterson seems to be most in the pursuer’s favour, and it does indeed resemble this case somewhat closely, but it appears to be of doubtful authority. It was stated from the bench in Barron v. Rose to be special, to have been misunderstood, and to decide no general point. In Muirhead v. Chalmers there was ample rei interventus to warrant the judgment on that ground. In Fulton v. Johnstone the defender was assoilzied, although the ground of absolvitor may have been that the deed was not delivered. Barron v. Rose, in which the defender was assoilzied, is rather against the pursuer than for her. It is true that in that case there were two missives, the one probative and the latter improbativ. But the judgment would, I think, have been the same had the latter missive not been executed, and if that had been so the case would have been much the same as this. Shedden v. Sproul Crawford, 6th July 1768, M. 8456, seems in favour of the defender. In Sproat v. Wilson and Wallace, 24th January 1800, Hume, 920, a missive of lease signed by both parties, and holograph of one, was held not binding, and in Sinclair v. Weddell, 8th Dec. 1868, 41 Scot. Jur. 121, a judgment was pronounced to a similar effect.

“On the whole, I think that while it may be true that a unilateral promise to convey land is binding on the grantor if it imply no obligation on the grantee, yet the cases to which that rule is applicable must rarely occur, and that in this case what is averred by the pursuer is not a promise but a mutual contract, which must bind both parties or neither, and that it is clear that it does not bind the pursuer.”

* The authorities cited by the parties were those quoted by the Lord Ordinary.

No. 55.

Dec. 9, 1891.
Malcolm v.
Campbell.

contracted. Even if the document were capable of being read as setting forth a unilateral obligation by the defender, the pursuer was barred from adopting that reading, for her whole case was founded upon contract.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The judgment of the Lord Ordinary in this case appears to me to be very clearly right. That the owner of heritage may become bound by a writing under his own hand to dispoise it on payment of a price, although there is no writing under the hand of the proposed dispoinee, cannot well be disputed, because the cases which have been cited shew that anyone can place in the hands of another a valid obligation to dispoise heritage upon payment of a certain price. The question here is, whether this writing sets out such an obligation to dispoise, or is merely a memorandum of a bilateral agreement between both the parties but under the hand of one of them only. We were referred to a passage in the opinion of the late Lord President, in the case of Goldston v. Young, 7 Macph. 188—where all the prior authorities were considered—which precisely distinguishes these two classes of cases. His Lordship says,—“The case is one of mutual contract. Not only is it so libelled in the summons, but it is impossible to represent it as anything else, for it is constituted by mutual missives both of which are essential to the constitution of the contract. Therefore this entirely differs from that class of cases where a written holograph promise to convey heritage has been held enforceable without acceptance, because in these cases there was no mutual contract but simply a unilateral obligation.” Now, is this case one in which there was no mutual contract, but simply a unilateral obligation? In the first place, the document does not purport to embody an obligation, but to be merely the record of an agreement. The words “I have agreed” set out the fact of an agreement, and an agreement is necessarily a mutual or bilateral arrangement. But the pursuer has certainly clinched the matter in the most remarkable style, because I do not think that Mr Cullen exaggerated when he said that the record rings and resounds with the word “contract.” In the third article of her condescendence the pursuer states that the defender “desired to sell her property, and ultimately both parties agreed on £150 as the price.” Then in the fourth article the pursuer goes on to state that “the parties having concluded the contract of sale of the said house as above mentioned, the defender thereafter signed, in the presence of two subscribing witnesses, the following agreement,” and after quoting the document, she proceeds, “this agreement, which accurately embodies the contract of sale concluded between the parties, was at once delivered to the pursuer.” Finally, the first plea in law for the pursuer expressly rests her case upon “a valid and effectual contract of sale” of the subjects.

Now, Mr Dickson—I must do him the justice to say with some hesitation and not in very confident tones—has proposed to amend his record. But how would an amendment be effected? It would be effected by deleting those essential averments of fact upon which the case at present is rested, and substituting therefor a statement that there was not a contract of sale, but what is to be contrasted with that—a unilateral obligation; and that again would involve this, that in place of being, as set out in the original record, bound, the pursuer was free, because what she got was not a contract to which she was party, but a unilateral obligation by the defender alone. To allow an amendment of that kind would be entirely to transcend our powers of amendment

Therefore the case must be decided as it stands, and I cannot say that it presents any difficulty. It is a case in which it is proposed to establish a contract of sale by a memorandum of agreement under the hand of one of the parties only. It seems to me to fall entirely within the decided cases, and therefore I think we should adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

No. 55.

Dec. 9, 1891.

Malcolm v. Campbell.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. I do not doubt that persons are able to bind and oblige themselves by unilateral obligation to do most acts which are not contra bonos mores. A person may bind himself by a single document, to which he alone is a party, to dispose a house to another person for a certain sum, but that does not appear to me to be the nature of the document here. It does not embody a unilateral obligation; it appears to be clear on the face of the document that it expresses the fact of a mutual agreement; and that being so, I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is perfectly sound.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree that the question for our consideration is, whether the document to which the case relates was intended by the parties to be complete in itself—to be a complete expression of the matter about which they were transacting, or whether it is only one side of what is called in another part of the country an indenture—that is, a bilateral agreement. One must, in deference to the authorities, admit that a unilateral obligation to convey land for a price is a legal obligation, but I must say that to my mind it is not a very intelligible obligation, because one does not see how a contract of sale—for sale is a contract under all circumstances—one does not see how the contract is to be worked out. Apparently the suggestion is that such a unilateral obligation is an obligation by which one party becomes bound as seller without receiving in return any obligation which he can enforce, the purchaser being entitled to agree to the sale or not as he pleases. Assuming that that is a legal mode whereby an intending seller may oblige himself, it is certainly not a very probable arrangement, or, I think, a very businesslike proceeding on his part, and the presumption must certainly be against such an interpretation of a business matter about which parties are transacting. The view that parties have contemplated a mutual contract of sale is very much more consistent with what is usual in the business of life, and is, in the absence of adverse circumstances, I think, a probable interpretation of the matter, especially when the word agreement is used, as it is in this case. I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the thing which the parties had agreed upon was a sale. Now, if that be so, there is not being the conjoint consent of seller and purchaser which the law holds to be necessary to a contract of sale, we have not here a complete expression of that contract in the form which the law requires. We have some evidence of consent, but that evidence is insufficient for the purpose of binding the parties according to the principles of our law relating to the sale of heritable property. I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has taken the right view of the case.

LORD KINNEAR was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—T. TEMPLE MUIR, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 56.

Dec. 10, 1891.
Campbell v.
A. & D. Morrison.

GEORGE CAMPBELL, Pursuer (Respondent).—Strachan—Watt.
A. & D. MORRISON, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Johnston—Ure.

Reparation—Breach of Contract—Jus tertii.—A workman in the employment of a firm of engineers, who were engaged in fitting up engines in a ship which was lying in a dry dock, fell from the gangway, which was the only means of access to the ship, and was injured. He raised an action of damages against the ship-carpenters, who had docked the vessel and put up the gangway, averring that they had been employed to dock the vessel by the shipbuilders; that they had undertaken this work, and had performed it; and that the gangway which it was their duty to provide, and which they did provide, was defective. He also averred that the shipbuilders had no connection with the engineers in whose employment he was.

Held that he had stated no relevant grounds for damages, the failure to supply a sufficient gangway, if it truly were insufficient, being not a delict, but a breach of the contract between the ship-carpenters and the shipbuilders, with which neither the pursuer nor his employers had any concern.

Discharge—Reparation—Payment by one of several persons sued.—A workman in the employment of a firm of engineers, who were fitting up engines in a ship which was lying in a dry dock, fell from a gangway connecting the ship with the shore and was injured. He raised an action of damages in the Sheriff Court against (1) his own employers, (2) the builders of the ship, and (3) the ship-carpenters who had docked the ship and put up the gangway. This action was dismissed for want of jurisdiction. The workman accepted two small sums from his own employers and from the builders, acknowledging receipt of the payment by the former as "in full of expenses incurred . . . in connection with his alleged claim for damages," and discharging the latter in consideration of this payment "of and from all claims of reparation, and for payment of legal and other expenses now or hereafter competent to me." He then raised an action of damages for £500 in the Court of Session against the ship-carpenters. Held (per Lord Low, Ordinary) that he was not barred from doing so by these payments or the terms of his discharges. Opinions reserved in the Inner-House.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Low.

GEORGE CAMPBELL, an apprentice in the employment of Messrs Kincaid & Company, Limited, engineers in Greenock, was, in September 1890, engaged in working on the engines of the s.s. "Alexandria," then lying in the Garvel Graving Dock at Greenock. On the morning of the 12th September he fell from a gangway, which was the only means of access from the edge of the dock to the vessel, and was injured. He raised an action on 28th January 1891 against Messrs A. & D. Morrison, ship-carpenters in Greenock, for £500 in name of damages for his injuries.

As his ground of action against the defenders he averred,—"In order that the work might be done by the pursuer and other workmen engaged at the vessel, she had to be docked, and the operations in connection with the docking of said vessel were undertaken and performed by the defenders, and a gangway, from the side of the dock to the ship for the use of all the workmen engaged thereon, was supplied and laid down by them, which it was their duty to do. The said gangway was the only means of access to the vessel. It was part of the duty of the defenders when docking the vessel to provide a gangway for the use of the pursuer and anyone requiring to go on board the vessel, but the gangway which they provided was dangerous and defective. . . . It is believed that the defenders were employed to dock the vessel by Seath & Company [the shipbuilders], who had no connection whatever with pursuer's employers but were employed by the owners of the vessel to paint her hull."

He specified the defects which were alleged to exist in the construction of the gangway, and pleaded fault on the part of the defenders.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The statements of the pursuer are not relevant and sufficient to sustain the conclusions of the summons. No. 56.

The defenders pleaded, separatim, (9) that the pursuer was barred from recovering against them in consequence of having accepted sums in name of damages in respect of the accident which was the foundation of the present action. They were allowed a proof of their averments on this point, and the result of that proof was as follows:—

The pursuer brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Greenock against his own employers [Messrs Kincaid & Company], the builders of the ship [Messrs Seath & Company], and the present defenders, who had contracted with Messrs Seath & Company for docking the ship. The action was thrown out on a plea of no jurisdiction. The pursuer's agent, Mr M'Dowall, then determined to bring an action in the Court of Session against the present defenders alone, as being the parties against whom the pursuer was most likely to establish his claim. M'Dowall, however, was unwilling absolutely to give up the claim which he had made against Seath & Company and Kincaid & Company without receiving some consideration for doing so, and it occurred to him that he might, at all events, obtain from these two firms a sum which would put him in funds to carry on the Court of Session action. He accordingly went to the agents of Seath & Company and obtained from them a sum of £12, for which he granted a receipt, in which he acknowledged receipt of the money "as in full of expenses incurred by my client and myself, as his agent, in connection with his alleged claim for damages. . . . And in consideration of the said payment the said T. R. Seath & Company, but they only, are discharged of all said alleged claims." Mr M'Dowall then went to Mr Oattes, the agent of the Employers' Insurance Company of Great Britain, with whom Messrs Kincaid & Company were insured, and who had defended the action in the Sheriff Court in Kincaid & Company's name. Mr M'Dowall told Mr Oattes that he was raising an action in the Court of Session against the present defenders, and was considering whether or not Kincaid & Company should also be called, and he intimated that if the insurance company would make a payment to the pursuer, which would help with the expenses of the Court of Session action, the pursuer would give up his claim against Kincaid & Company. Mr Oattes agreed to the proposal, and ultimately the amount to be paid by the insurance company was fixed at £17, 10s. A discharge was prepared by Mr Oattes, and was ultimately signed by the pursuer and his father. The latter, however, only signed the discharge on being assured by Mr M'Dowall that it would not prejudice the pursuer's right to sue the present action. By this discharge the pursuer, with consent of his father, and in consideration of £17, 10s. paid to him by Kincaid & Company, discharged that company "of and from all claims of reparation, and for payment of legal and other expenses now or hereafter competent to me," in respect of injuries occasioned by the action. The pursuer and his father also bound and obliged themselves to free and relieve Kincaid & Company "from all claims of relief competent to any other person liable in reparation for said accident."

On 11th September 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer has not accepted any sum in name of damages, or as reparation for the injuries libelled: Therefore repels the ninth plea in law for the defenders: Appoints the cause to be enrolled for farther procedure: Farther, grants leave to reclaim."*

* "OPINION.—The averment upon which I allowed a proof is to the effect that the pursuer accepted, in respect of the injuries sustained by him, from an

Dec. 10, 1891.
Campbell v.
A. & D. Morrison.

No. 56. The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) On the plea of bar.—The present case fell under the rule laid down by Erskine that “obligations founded solely upon damage cannot possibly continue after the damage ceaseth to exist,”¹ i.e., after a payment has been accepted as extinguishing it. In the language of the English law, “judgment against one of two tort-feasors is a bar to an action against the other for the same cause of action, even although the judgment be unsatisfied.”² The counsel for the pursuer having agreed that the argument on relevancy should now be taken without remitting the case to the Lord Ordinary, the defenders argued;—(2) On the plea of irrelevancy.—It followed necessarily from the pursuer’s averments that the defect in the gangway, if defect there were, was latent and unknown to the defenders, for it was not stated that any complaint had been stated in regard to its erection by those who were interested in it. If that were so, there could be no culpa in the defenders, and therefore they could not be liable.³ It appeared that Seath & Company were satisfied with the gangway, and, if that were so, no one else could complain,⁴ for this was a matter of contract; there was no delict. A delict or quasi-delict implied a right in the person who was the subject of the delict, and a duty on the person who committed it.⁵ What right had the pursuer against the defenders, or what duty did they owe him?

The pursuer argued;—(1) On the plea of bar.—The Lord Ordinary was right in his view of the transaction. The sums accepted could not be regarded as in full compensation for the serious damage suffered, and hence Erskine’s rule did not apply. It had been held that the compromise of an action with some of a body of alleged wrongdoers did not free the rest, and the action might proceed as against them.⁶ (2) On the question of relevancy.—The person employed to put up a gangway was bound insurance company with whom his own employers, Messrs Kincaid & Company, were insured, ‘the sum of £40 or thereby in name of damages.’ It appeared to me that if the pursuer had actually accepted a sum in satisfaction of his claim, and as reparation for the injuries which he had received, he could not be allowed to proceed with the present action. . . . It is clear that the money paid by Seath & Company and by the insurance company was neither paid nor received as compensation to the pursuer for the injuries which he had received. The money was paid by the companies for the purpose of getting rid of a claim, which, however ill founded, might have resulted in expensive litigation with a man of no means, and was accepted by the pursuer as the consideration in respect of which he agreed not to press a claim for reparation against Messrs Seath & Company and Kincaid & Company. I think that it is impossible to hold that such a transaction precludes the pursuer from making a claim for reparation against anyone. He has not received any sum in name of damages, or as reparation for his injuries, and if the defenders are truly responsible for these injuries, I see no ground for holding that the pursuer is barred from suing them. The transactions with Seath & Company and Kincaid & Company cannot, I think, prejudice the defenders. Such transactions cannot make the defenders liable unless they would have been liable in any case, and a transaction to which they were not parties cannot prejudice any right of relief which they may have against Kincaid & Company or Seath & Company. I must therefore hold that the defenders have failed to establish the averments remitted to probation.”

¹ Erskine, iii. 1, 15; see also Young v. Smarts, Dec. 14, 1831, 10 S. 130, 4 Scot. Jur. 184.

² Brinsmead v. Harrison, 1872, L. R., 7 C. P. 547; see also Pollock on Torts, p. 178.

³ Ovington, &c. v. M’Vicar, May 12, 1864, 2 Macph. 1066, 36 Scot. Jur. 553.

⁴ M’Gill v. Bowman & Co., Dec. 9, 1890, 18 R. 206.

⁵ Pollock on Torts, p. 1.

⁶ Western Bank v. Bairds, March 20, 1862, 24 D. 859, 34 Scot. Jur. 435.

to make it secure for its purpose, i.e., the passage along it of all who had legitimate occasion to use it. He put himself in the position of one who was charged with the making and maintenance of a road; such a person was bound to do his work in a way that would answer the purpose in view, i.e., the transit of passengers, and would be liable if he failed to do so.

No. 56.
Dec. 10, 1891.
Campbell v.
A. & D. Morrison.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—The pursuer here states that he is an apprentice engineer, and that on the 12th September he was in the employment of Kincaid & Company, who were under a contract to put engines on board a certain ship, which was lying in the Garvel Graving Dock at Greenock. He says that on that day a gangway from the edge of the dock to the ship got displaced while he was upon it,—the gangway consisted of two or three loose planks,—and that he thus met with the accident in respect of which he sues.

He then brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Greenock, not only against his own employers, but also against Seath & Company, a firm of shipbuilders who had built this ship, which was in course of being finished. He also called as defenders Messrs A. & D. Morrison, who are a firm of ship-carpenters, whose connection with the ship consisted in this, that they had a contract with Seath & Company to dock the vessel, and who had placed the gangway between the ship and the edge of the dock.

An objection was taken to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff to entertain that action, it matters not on what grounds, and the action was dismissed because the Sheriff thought that he had no jurisdiction to entertain it.

It is stated that the pursuer then effected a settlement with Kincaid & Company and with Seath & Company, receiving from each of them a sum of money, and giving each of them a discharge. The discharge to Seath & Company dealt with expenses only. The sum which was accepted from Kincaid & Company, however, was accepted in full satisfaction of all claims in respect of injuries received by him in consequence of this accident.

Then the present action was brought against the present defenders, who had supplied the gangway, and two defences were stated to it. The first, which was repelled by the Lord Ordinary, was that the pursuer was barred by reason of the payments which he had received and the discharge which he had granted. The other defence was, that the action is irrelevant, i.e., that the pursuer's statement does not set forth any sufficient ground of action against the defenders.

The Lord Ordinary repelled the former defence. He did not consider the other, but granted leave to reclaim against his interlocutor.

I propose to consider, first and chiefly, almost exclusively, the defence of irrelevancy. It appears to me that it is a good defence, and that we can dispose of it, and sustain it on grounds which are simpler and clearer than the considerations which are involved in the plea of bar.

The foundation of the action is an alleged imperfection in the gangway which was put up by the defenders. The first question is, under what contract, or how otherwise, did they put it up. It is explained by the pursuer in his record that the operations "in connection with the docking of the vessel were undertaken and performed by the defenders," and that the defenders "were employed to dock the vessel by Seath & Company, who had no connection whatever with pursuer's employers, but were employed by the owners of the vessel to paint her hull." That is a contract between the defenders and Seath & Company. In

No. 56.
 Dec. 10, 1891.
 Campbell v.
 A. & D. Morrison.

the course of that contract the planks were laid down between the vessel and the edge of the dock. That is, as I say, a contract between the defenders and Seath & Company, and they had no other concern with this matter except what the contract gave them. And it is explained by the pursuer very properly, because very candidly, that his employers had no connection whatever with Seath & Company. How shall there be an action at the pursuer's instance, any more than at the instance of his employers, against the defenders? Delict or quasi-delict is out of the question. Cases were quoted in argument of obstructions placed on public roads. These are cases of delict, and, generally, the acts complained of are police offences as well, but there is nothing of the kind here. The contract to supply a gangway between the edge of the dock and the ship is not in the same position at all. There is no obligation there to provide for the public safety. The contractor is liable under his contract and to the person with whom he contracted to supply what he contracted to supply. He is not liable quasi ex delicto to the public or anyone with whom he has not contracted because the gangway furnished by him gives way.

In the course of the argument I referred to a class of illustrations, which were very commonly used at one time, the case of a person travelling on a stage-coach who suffers some injury in consequence of a defect in the coach. He has no action against those who furnished the coach; he must go against the party with whom he contracted. Other illustrations might be given. Take the case,—I am not sure that it did not actually occur,—that a gun bursts in the hands of someone who has bought it and injures a companion who is shooting with him, but who had no contract relation with the gunmaker who sold the gun. The injured man will have no action against the gunmaker.

Now, that is sufficient for the decision of the case. We do not know what the defenders' contract with Seath & Company was. According to the views I have stated the pursuer is not the person who has any right to inquire. It may be, and this brings me to glance—and I shall only glance—at the effect of the discharge, it may be that it was the duty of Kincaid & Company to the pursuer, as their apprentice, to see that he got a good gangway. If he had a good claim against Kincaid & Company, he has discharged them. If they had a claim against Seath & Company they would be entitled to relief, as against Seath & Company, for the sum they had to pay. Seath & Company would then be entitled to their remedy against the present defenders, if the truth be that these defenders put down an insufficient gangway in breach of their contract with them. But, the action being irrelevant, it is superfluous to consider this question, and I have not considered it as it would be becoming to consider it if it were to be the turning point of our judgment. I am not to be held as approving—or as disapproving either—of the Lord Ordinary's view. I am of opinion that no good ground of action has been stated against these defenders, with whose contract the pursuer has no concern.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—It was stated for the pursuer that the contract with the defenders was completed before the accident took place, and that they had retired from the scene altogether. In these circumstances I concur in the proposed judgment.

LORD TRAYNER.—If it were necessary to decide the question which has been disposed of by the Lord Ordinary in the interlocutor reclaimed against, I should be inclined, as at present advised, to agree with the view which the Lord Ordinary has taken. But it is not necessary to decide that question, because I think the pursuer's case fails on relevancy. The gangway in question—the alleged insufficiency of which is said to have been the cause of the injuries sustained by the pursuer—was fitted up and supplied by the defenders under a contract between them and Seath & Company, the builders of the vessel. It is not said that the gangway was in any respect other, or less sufficient, than the defenders had contracted to supply. On the contrary, the fair inference from the pursuer's averments is, that the gangway as supplied was taken off the hands of the defenders by Seath & Company, and it must be taken that, in doing so, they were satisfied that the gangway was conform to contract. In these circumstances, I fail to see how a claim can arise at the pursuer's instance against the defenders such as he here seeks to establish.

The defenders were under no obligation to the pursuer, there was no relation between them which could give rise to an obligation. The defenders having fulfilled their contract, as regards the gangway, to the satisfaction of their co-contractor, their obligation and duty concerning the gangway was at an end, for the pursuer does not aver that the defenders were bound to maintain the gangway during the time it was being used.

I could have understood a claim at the pursuer's instance against his employers for having failed in their duty to provide, or see provided, a safe access to the work which the pursuer was employed to perform. But I cannot see how any such duty could be said to lie on the defenders.

This is not, in my view, a claim arising out of a wrong done to the pursuer for which all concerned in the wrongdoing would be liable. The defenders committed no delict or quasi-delict. The most that is alleged against them is a breach of contract. For that, if true, they must answer to the person with whom the broken contract was made, but to no other. What the pursuer may have reason to complain of is, that Seath & Company having accepted from the defenders an insufficient gangway, the pursuer's employers were negligent of their duty in not seeing that that gangway was made sufficient before permitting or inviting their servants to use it. But this just comes to a claim against the pursuer's employers for failure to perform a duty incumbent on them, not to a claim as for a wrong done to the pursuer by the defenders.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and having, of consent of parties, heard counsel on the plea of relevancy, sustained the defenders' first plea in law, and dismissed the action.

CLARK & MACDONALD, S.S.C.—SMITH & MASON, S.S.C.—Agents.

JAMES BURNS, Appellant.—J. C. Thomson—Craigie.

MATTHEW CASSELLS, Respondent.—Dickson—Pitman.

No. 57.

Election Law—Franchise—Signature of claim for another by person having no mandate—Burgh Voters Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 58), sec. 36.—Held Burns v. Cassells.
that a claim to be enrolled on the register of voters, which was signed on

Dec. 10, 1891.*

No. 57. behalf of the claimant by a person who held no mandate, written or oral, from the claimant, was not valid.

Dec. 10, 1891.
Burns v.
Cassells.

Registration
Appeal Court.
Lord Adam.
Lord Trayner.
Lord Kin-
cairney.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

At a Registration Court for the North-eastern Division of Lanarkshire held at Motherwell on 5th October 1891, a claim was made to be enrolled upon the register of voters for the division on behalf of Matthew Cassells, in respect of his being joint tenant of minerals at Blackridge, in the parish of Shotts.

The claim form was signed thus :—"Matthew Cassells, per J. Jack Robertson."

James Burns, solicitor, Motherwell, objected that Cassells had not signed the claim nor authorised Robertson to sign for him, and that even though Robertson had a mandate, he did not sign as agent or mandatary, nor give his designation.

The Sheriff-substitute (Mair) admitted the claim, and Burns craved a case.

The case stated ;—"It was admitted that Mr Robertson had no written mandate to sign the claim, and it was not proved that he had authority to do so from the claimant and respondent ; but it was stated that he was authorised by the Unionist Association of the district to do so, and in most of the cases the claimants were aware that claims were being made for them. Mr Robertson, who is not a law-agent, is the recognised organising secretary for the Conservatives for said division of the county, and it was contended that he had a presumed mandate from the respondent and all parties for whom he signed claims."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was,—“Whether a claim signed in the manner and in the circumstances above set forth is a valid claim under the Registration Statutes ?”

Argued for the appellant ;—Upon the facts stated by the Sheriff-substitute it was clear that the present claim was not valid under the 36th section of the Act of 1856 * (applied to counties by the Reform Act, 1884). Robertson had no mandate from the claimant, written or verbal, to sign the claim.

Argued for the respondent ;—When this objection (which was merely technical) was taken at the Registration Court Robertson was given no opportunity of proving his mandate aliunde.¹ The case should therefore be remitted back to the Sheriff-substitute for this purpose.² Further, the question of mandate was one between the assessor and the claimant and it was jus tertii of Burns to object.

LORD ADAM.—I think the case upon the merits is clear. The claim for the respondent was signed “Matthew Cassells, per J. Jack Robertson.” Now, it will be observed upon the face of it that that signature does not bear to be an agent or mandatary for Cassells.

When the case came before the Sheriff-substitute objection was taken to the claim in respect that Cassells had given no authority or mandate to Robertson to sign for him. That was a question of fact. The findings with which we have to deal are these,—“It was admitted that Mr Robertson had no written

* The Burgh Voters Act, 1856, sec. 36, enacts,—“Any claim, objection notice of appeal, or other writ, may be signed, and any proceedings under this Act may be prosecuted, by any person as agent or mandatary for the part thereto ; and any mandate bearing to be signed by such party shall be prima facie a sufficient mandate ; and every such mandate shall have all the privileges attaching to any judicial mandate.”

¹ Rutherford v. Lockie, Nov. 13, 1880, 8 R. 6.

² Representation of the People Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 48), sec. 22.

mandate to sign the claim, and it was not proved that he had authority to do so from the claimant and respondent." Now, upon that statement of facts we must assume that Mr Robertson had no authority or mandate from the claimant himself to sign the claim. That being so, the only question which remains is, whether that mandate which the Sheriff has sustained is sufficient. The statement in the case as to this mandate is—"It was stated that he was authorised by the Unionist Association of the district to do so, and in most of the cases the claimants were aware that claims were being made for them. Mr Robertson, who is not a law-agent, is the recognised organising secretary for the Conservatives for said division of the county, and it was contended that he had a presumed mandate from the respondent and all parties for whom he signed claims."

No. 57.

Dec. 10, 1891.
Burns v.
Cassella.

I understand that to mean that as organising secretary for a certain Unionist Association he had a presumed authority to sign for anybody he chose to consider either a Conservative or a Liberal Unionist. I cannot comprehend how the Sheriff-substitute made up his mind so to find. I am therefore of opinion that the appeal must be sustained.

LORD TRAYNER—I am of the same opinion. Under the statute the claim of anyone desiring to be put upon the roll of voters must be signed by him. The form in the schedule indicates that. But then it is provided that the claim shall be sufficiently signed if it is signed by an agent or mandatary for the party. Now, if Mr Robertson had been an agent or mandatary, his signature would have been sufficient, and I should not have been disposed to have taken objection to the fact that he did not so design himself in signing if it had been satisfactorily shewn to the Sheriff that he had authority. But in point of fact the Sheriff has held it established that there was no authority whatever granted by the claimant to Mr Robertson. It was admitted, he says, that Mr Robertson had no written mandate, and it was not proved that he had any mandate whatever. And it appears quite certain that the Sheriff thought he was exhausting the subject of mandate, because he goes on in effect to say that Mr Robertson did not pretend to have a direct mandate, written or verbal, but relied upon this, that he was authorised by the Unionist Association of the district to put in the claims, of which this was one, and it was contended that he had a presumed mandate for what he did. I think what the Sheriff means is that he contended that he presumed he had a mandate. That is not an authority which the Sheriff could recognise, or which in the very least degree proceeds from or is binding on the claimant, and therefore I agree that upon the statement of facts as found there was no claim validly signed presented for Mr Cassella.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I concur. I think the case is very plain.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, reversed the finding of the Sheriff-substitute, and remitted to him to expunge the name of the respondent from the roll.

R. J. GIBSON, S.S.C.—J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 58.

ROBERT ARCHIBALD LINDSAY, Appellant.—Dundas—C. N. Johnston.JAMES FALCONER, Respondent.—Asher—A. J. Young.

Dec. 10, 1891.*

Lindsay v.
Falconer.

Election Law—Burgh Occupation Franchise—Nature of qualification—Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. c. 3), sec. 5.—A person who claimed to be enrolled as a voter stated the nature of his qualification thus:—“Occupier. Occupied whole of the house last year. This year joint tenant (half and half) with J. A. L.”

Held that he had sufficiently specified the nature of his qualification.

Registration
Appeal Court.
Lord Adam.
Lord Trayner.
Lord Kin-
cairney.
Sheriff of the Lothians and
Peebles.

ROBERT ARCHIBALD LINDSAY, clerk, 17 Dundas Street, claimed to be enrolled on the register of voters for the West Division of Edinburgh.

In his claim, the “nature of his qualification” was stated to be “Occupier. Occupied whole of house last year. This year joint tenant (half and half) with J. A. Lindsay.”

James Falconer, W.S., objected to the entry of the claimant’s name in the list of voters on the ground that it did not specify the nature of the qualification in respect of which he claimed.

The Sheriff (Blair), on 10th October 1891, sustained the objection, and Lindsay craved a case, in which the following question of law was stated for the opinion of the Court,—“Whether the said claim sufficiently specifies the nature of the qualification founded on by the appellant, and the appellant is entitled to be put on the roll?”

Argued for the appellant;—His claim was stated with sufficient clearness, and was a claim to be enrolled as an “occupier” under section 5 of the Act of 1884. The additional statement that he was “joint tenant for the year” was a mere matter of history, and of no importance. In any case the claim contained a mere innocent inaccuracy which the Court had power to correct under section 46 of the Burgh Voters Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 58).

Argued for the respondent;—The Sheriff was right. The claimant said he was only joint tenant “this year,” sharply distinguishing between his occupation for this year and the past year. It was impossible to say from the claim whether he meant “this letting year” beginning Whitsunday last or the year 1891. In any case, if he meant that he was joint tenant for this current year, his allegation of qualification for the period before it was simply that he was “occupier.” Now, occupation per se was not recognised as a qualification. By section 7 (7) of the Act of 1884, the 11th section of the Reform Act, 1832 (2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 65), had been re-enacted, and under it the occupation must be “either as proprietor, tenant, or liferenter.” Although this 11th section had been in part repealed by the 12th section of the 1884 Act, the 12th section of the Act of 1832 was still in force, and manifestly referred to the kind of occupation contemplated by the 11th section of that latter Act.

In order to entitle the claimant to be enrolled, he must shew that he was occupier as tenant, liferenter, or owner of the premises upon which he claimed. He had failed so to describe himself.

LORD ADAM.—The only question raised in this case is a question as to the construction of the words used in the column headed “nature of qualification.” The Sheriff has found that these words do not sufficiently specify the nature of the qualification founded on, and the question, and the only one, is whether he is right. Now, if the qualification had been set forth as occupier and joint tenant, it is admitted that that would be a relevant statement. But according to my reading that is the meaning of the words he uses. The claimant sets forth that he is an occupier, and then explains that he occupied the whole house last year, and that this year he is a joint tenant. That I consider to be equivalent to the statement of a qualification as occupier and joint tenant, and therefore I think the decision of the Sheriff was wrong.

No. 58.

Dec. 10, 1891.
Lindsay v.
Falconer.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. As your Lordship has pointed out, the one question we have to determine here is, whether or not the specification in the claim of the nature of the qualification in respect of which the claimant desires to be put upon the roll is sufficient. I find it to be amply sufficient without the necessity of referring to section 46 of the Act of 1856. I find that this claim sets forth beyond the possibility of doubt what this gentleman's qualification is. He is an occupier and joint tenant with another person. That he says that last year he occupied the whole house is a mere matter of history, and is of no importance.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—If it be enough that the nature of the qualification in this case is the qualification of occupancy, I would think that the nature of the qualification is sufficiently stated. I am not prepared to say from what I have heard from the bar that it is insufficient. Your Lordships appear to decide on the ground that the claimant is an occupant as joint tenant. No doubt he says so, and in some sense that is the nature of his qualification, but he adds words which seem to indicate that he has not been occupant and joint tenant for twelve months. I think that history is part of the nature of the qualification, but as it might be enough to state that he was occupier I am not prepared to differ.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, reversed the finding of the Sheriff, and remitted to him to put the name of the claimant and appellant upon the roll.

GEORGE INGLIS, S.S.C.—JAMES FALCONER, W.S.—Agents.

JAMES FALCONER, Appellant.—Asher—A. J. Young.

No. 59.

ROBERT CRAWFORD MACLEOD, Respondent.—Dundas—C. N. Johnston.

Dec. 10, 1891.*
Falconer v.
Macleod.

Election Law—Claim—Statement of qualification—Partner of firm—Burgh Voters Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 58).—A person claiming to be enrolled as a voter in respect of certain subjects stated in his claim the nature of his qualification thus,—“Sole partner of M. Brothers, printers, in possession of said interest.”

Held that he was not entitled to be put upon the roll, in respect his claim did not sufficiently specify the nature of his qualification.

At a Registration Court for the burgh of Edinburgh, held on 2d October 1891, Robert Crawford Macleod, printer, residing at 8 Lauriston Place, Edinburgh, claimed to be enrolled on the register of voters for the West Division of Edinburgh in respect of premises at 13 Clyde Street.

In the column of his claim which was headed “nature of supposed qualification” he stated his qualification as “sole partner Macleod Brothers, printers, in possession of said interest prior to 31st July 1890.”

The claim was objected to by James Falconer, W.S., a voter on the roll, who maintained that it did not specify the nature of the qualification in respect of which the claimant claimed to be put upon the roll.

Registration
Appeal Court.
Lord Adam.
Lord Trayner.
Lord Kin-
cairney.
Sheriff of the Lothians and
Peebles.

No. 59.

Dec. 10, 1891.
Falconer v.
Macleod.

The Sheriff (Blair) admitted the claim, and the objector craved a case, in which the Sheriff stated as follows :—" I was informed by the Assessor that the method adopted by the claimant in filling up his claim was one which had previously been adopted and followed in the Burgh of Edinburgh Registration Court in the cases of partner claimants without objection. It was stated by the Assessor, and was not disputed, that the firm of Macleod Brothers appeared upon the Valuation-roll as the tenants and occupants of 13 Clyde Street, and that the value of the premises and the respondent's interest in the said firm were sufficient to entitle him to be enrolled as tenant and occupant for the parliamentary franchise."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was,—“ Whether the said claim sufficiently specifies the nature of the qualification founded on by the respondent, and the respondent is entitled to be put on the roll ? ”

Argued for the appellant ;—The claim must be rejected. It contained no statement of Macleod's qualification as a voter, but merely a statement of his interest in a partnership.

Argued for the respondent ;—The nature of his qualification was stated in accordance with the usual practice in the Burgh of Edinburgh Registration Court. The Assessor must take the qualification from the Valuation-roll, and in it the firm of Macleod Brothers appeared as tenants and occupants of 13 Clyde Street. No one could suffer prejudice from this, because, under section 16 of the Burgh Voters Act, 1856, any member of the public had a right to inspect the Valuation-roll, and satisfy himself that the claim was a good one.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think the Sheriff has gone wrong here. The statute requires that the claimant shall give a notice to the Assessor containing the particulars of his qualification. The only qualification stated in the case before us is that the claimant represents himself as partner of a certain firm. That is no qualification.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I think the claim is bad, past correction.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, reversed the finding of the Sheriff, and remitted to him to expunge the name of the claimant from the roll.

JAMES FALCONER, W.S.—GEORGE INGLIS, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 60.

Dec. 10, 1891.*
M'Kenzie v.
Comrie.JOHN M'KENZIE, Appellant.—*J. G. Millar.*JOHN SMITH COMRIE, Respondent.—Pitman.

Election Law—County Franchise—Sale of subjects on which claim based—Reform Act, 1832 (2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 65), sec. 7.—In order to support a claim for registration under section 7 of the Reform Act, 1832,† it is necessary

* Decided Nov. 24, 1891.

† The Reform Act, 1832, sec. 7, enacts,—“ Every person . . . shall be entitled to be registered . . . who when the Sheriff proceeds to consider his claim for registration . . . shall have been for a period of not less than six calendar months next previous to the last day of July . . . the owner . . . of any lands, houses, . . . provided the subject or subjects on which he so claims shall be of the yearly value of ten pounds, and shall actually yield or be capable of yielding that value to the claimant . . . provided he be by himself, his tenants, vassals, or others, in possession of the said sub-that the claimant shall not have ceased to be proprietor of the subjects upon which he claims the franchise at the date at which the Sheriff proceeds to consider the claim in the Registration Court. No. 60.

Dec. 10, 1891.
M'Kenzie v.
Comrie.

At a Registration Court for the county of Bute, held on 12th October 1891, John Smith Comrie, civil engineer, London, claimed to be enrolled on the register of voters for the county as joint proprietor of a house, 36 Crichton Road, Rothesay. Registration Appeal Court.
Lord Adam.
Lord Trayner.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

John M'Kenzie, blacksmith, objected to the claim on the ground that the property upon which it was founded no longer belonged to the claimant, having been sold by him on 5th October 1891, with entry at that date.

It was admitted that the yearly value of the subjects and the claimant's interest in them were sufficient, that the claimant had held that interest for more than six calendar months prior to 31st July 1891, and that the subjects had, since the claim was lodged, been sold to a third party, with entry at 5th October 1891.

The Sheriff (Cheyne) admitted the claim, and M'Kenzie craved a case, in which the Sheriff, after a narrative of the foregoing facts, stated the following question for the opinion of the Court:—"Whether it is necessary, in order to support a claim under section 7 of 2 and 3 William IV. c. 65, that the claimant shall be still proprietor of the subjects at the date when the Sheriff proceeds to consider his claim?"

Argued for the appellant;—In order to entitle a person to the franchise under section 7 of the Act of 1832, it was necessary that he should not only have been owner of property of statutory value for six months prior to 31st July, but should be in "actual occupation or in receipt of the profits thereof" when the Sheriff came to consider his claim. In this view of the statute the respondent's name fell to be expunged from the roll, for at the date of the Registration Court he had parted with the subjects upon which he claimed.¹

Argued for the respondent;—Section 7 of the Act of 1832 was perfectly clear and unambiguous. Any person was entitled to the franchise who, when the Sheriff comes to consider his claim, "shall have been" for a period of not less than six calendar months next previous to the last day of July owner of the subjects upon which he claimed. There was nothing to indicate that the Legislature intended the ownership to continue after that date. This was made more clear by a comparison of the section with section 5, subsection 2, of the Representation of the People Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 48). This latter section reduced the ownership franchise in counties from £10 to £5, and contained an express enactment that the period of ownership should extend down to the date of the Sheriff's consideration of the claim, by the introduction for the first time of the words "is and has been" for a period of not less than six calendar months previous to the last day of July owner of the subject upon which the voter claimed. This intention of the Legislature to create an innovation in the later Act for the first time was also seen on comparing the sections as to burghs in the Acts 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 65, sec. 11, and 31 and 32 Vict. c. 48, sec. 3, subsec. 2.

LORD ADAM.—It appears that this claim was made by the claimant as joint proprietor of certain subjects in Rothesay. The yearly value of the subjects ject, and be either himself in the actual occupation, or in receipt of the profits and issues thereof to the extent above mentioned. . . ."

¹ Latta v. Raeburn, Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 298, 41 Scot. Jur. 177; Smith v. McDonald, Nov. 26, 1886, 14 R. 125.

No. 60.
Dec. 10, 1891.
M'Kenzie v.
Comrie.

was £70, and the claimant's interest more than £10 per annum, and he had possessed that interest for more than six months prior to 31st July. The subjects since the claim was lodged were sold to a third party, with entry at 5th October current. The question of law stated is,—“Whether it is necessary, to support a claim under section 7 of 2 and 3 William IV. c. 65, that the claimant shall be still proprietor of the subjects at the date when the Sheriff proceeds to consider his claim?” I have no doubt upon the point. The statute proceeds upon the footing that at the date when the claim comes to be considered the claimant shall still be proprietor of the subjects. The clause says,—“Every person . . . who when the Sheriff proceeds to consider his claim . . . shall have been for a period of six calendar months next previous . . . to the last day of July . . . the owner, &c.,” and goes on to say, “provided the subject or subjects on which he so claims shall be of the yearly value of ten pounds, and shall actually yield or be capable of yielding that value to the claimant,” and further, provided he be in possession, and either in actual occupation or in receipt of the profits and issues. I suppose it will not be said that after a person has parted with property it is capable of yielding yearly rent to him, or that a person who has sold subjects is in possession, in actual occupation, or in receipt of profits and issues.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree, and without the slightest hesitation or doubt. I think the Sheriff has gone upon a narrow construction of three or four words in the 7th section of the Reform Act, without taking into account either the general scope of the Act or other parts of the same clause that he was considering. The Reform Act conferred the right to the franchise upon certain proprietors and occupiers, but it was the basis of the right to vote under the statute that the person claiming had the right of proprietor or of occupant, and it assumes that when he claims he has that right. The statute no doubt says that he shall have something more. He must have been proprietor for a period of not less than six calendar months prior to the 31st July. It is obvious I think that that merely means that he is not to be admitted because he is now proprietor, but that he must also have been proprietor during that period. I think your Lordship has demonstrated that that must be the meaning of the section when we come to consider the proviso which your Lordship has read.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair. I cannot help thinking that the attention of the Sheriff had been drawn solely to the primary clause, the clause conferring the qualification, and if the case had to be decided upon that clause alone I would have agreed with him, differing, I rather think, from the opinion expressed by Lord Trayner; but I think the proviso makes it very clear that the claimant must be in possession of the subjects at the time when the Sheriff holds his Registration Court.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, reversed the finding of the Sheriff, and remitted to him to expunge the name of the said John Smith Comrie from the roll of voters for the county of Bute.

L. M'INTOSH, S.S.C.—COOPER & BRODIE, W.S.—Agents.

JAMES FALCONER (Objector), Appellant.—Asher—A. J. Young.

No. 61.

JAMES M'GUFFIE, Respondent.—Dundas—Pitman.

Dec. 10, 1891.*

Election Law—"Inhabitant occupier"—Service Franchise—Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. c. 3), sec. 3.—A draper's warehouse consisted of a tenement of several flats, the ground flat being devoted to the business premises, while the upper flats were devoted to sitting-rooms and bed-rooms for the firm's servants. The manager occupied rooms on the second flat, and a butler occupied for his exclusive use a bedroom on an upper flat. The flats were all reached by a common stair. There was no other communication between the flat occupied by the manager and that occupied by the butler. The manager was entrusted with a general supervision of the whole domestic arrangements provided for the servants, and had power to dismiss the domestic servants, including the butler.

Held that the butler was entitled to be regarded as an "inhabitant occupier" of a dwelling-house in the sense of the 3d section of the Representation of the People Act, 1884, in respect (1) that the premises he occupied were not inhabited by the manager, and (2) that he did not serve under the manager in the sense of the Act.

Lord Kincairney reserved his opinion upon the second point.

At a Registration Court for the burgh of Edinburgh on 10th October 1891, James Falconer, W.S., objected to the entry upon the voters list for the burgh (West Division) of James M'Guffie, butler, as tenant and occupant, 8 South St David Street.

The ground of objection was that M'Guffie inhabited a dwelling-house in virtue of his employment which was also inhabited by a person under whom he served in this employment.

The Sheriff (Blair) repelled the objection, and Falconer craved a case, which was accordingly stated by the Sheriff.

These facts were set forth:—"The witnesses examined were Mr Kennedy, the senior partner of the firm of Charles Jenner & Company, and Mr Cormack, a manager or buyer and shop-walker in the employment of the said firm.

"It was proved that the said James M'Guffie is a butler in the employment of Charles Jenner & Company, drapers, Princes Street and South St David Street, Edinburgh, and that in virtue of his employment he occupies, and had occupied, for his exclusive use a bedroom in one of the two upper flats of the tenement 8 South St David Street aforesaid, for the period of twelve months prior to 31st July 1891. That the tenement 8 and 12 South St David Street had originally consisted of several houses, which had been altered to suit the business requirements of the said firm of Jenner & Company. That the first or street and sunk flats are occupied as part of their shop or warehouse; that the second flat, being the flat above the street flat, contains a dining-hall for the assistants in the employment of the firm, the rooms consisting of a dining-room, sitting-room, bedroom, and bath-room allotted to the said Mr Cormack, a sitting-room for the female assistants, and another room; that the third flat contains kitchens, servants' rooms, and bedrooms for the female assistants; that the fourth flat contains a library or reading-room, smoking-room, and other rooms; and that the fifth and attic flats, being the two upper flats, are entirely occupied by bedrooms for the assistants or employees of the firm, of which bedrooms Mr M'Guffie occupies one. That entrance is had to the whole tenement, including the shop flat, by the door 8 South St David Street, which gives access to a stair on which at each landing there is a

Registration
Appeal Court.
Lord Adam.
Lord Trayner.
Lord Kin-
cairney.
Sheriff of the Lothians and
Peebles.

No. 61.

Dec. 10, 1891.
Falconer v.
M'Guffie.

door opening into the corresponding flat; that this stair is the only access to the fourth and fifth and attic flats; that when the door is closed the flat is shut off from the rest of the tenement, except in the case of the second and third flats, between which there is an internal stair; that there is a stair from the second flat to the door entering at 12 South St David Street, but that this door is not used. That Mr Cormack is one of the managers in the employment of the firm of C. Jenner & Company, but acts under the direct supervision of the partners of the firm, who themselves manage the business; that in the shop he has charge of the fancy department of the business of C. Jenner & Company; that the assistants in his own department are subject to his orders; and that if shorthanded he can require assistance from other departments in the same way as the managers of these departments, but otherwise has no authority over the assistants in the other departments. That Mr Cormack has no power to engage or dismiss assistants, but in these matters reports to the firm; that Mr Cormack is, further, manager of the domestic establishment, and in this capacity has a general supervision of the whole of the domestic arrangements provided for the assistants in the said tenement 8 and 12 South St David Street. That he has charge of the keys of the shop and tenement; that he has power to engage and dismiss the domestic servants required for the establishment, including the said James M'Guffie; that he has access to every part of the tenement, and has power, in the event of grave misconduct, to expel an assistant from the tenement for the night, but must immediately report having done so to the firm; that when he pleases he can use the dining-hall and reading-room provided for the assistants, and has also the use of the kitchens and servants, as well as the exclusive use of the rooms allotted to him as aforesaid; but that he does not use or for his own purposes in any way occupy the fifth and attic flats of said tenement, or any part of them. That Mr Cormack is enrolled, under the service franchise, as tenant and occupant of 12 South St David Street. That house-duty is paid for the whole tenement, including the shop, as one subject.

"I held that whether Mr Cormack was or was not a person under whom the voter served in his employment, that he did not inhabit the same dwelling-house as the voter, and I repelled the objection."

The question of law for the decision of the Court was,—“Whether in respect of the foressaid facts the said James M'Guffie is entitled to be entered on the roll in respect of the qualification set forth in the 3d section of the Act 48 and 49 Vict. cap. 3?”

Argued for the objector;—The claimant was not an “inhabitant occupier” in the sense of the Representation of the People Act, 1884,* for the franchise intended by the Act was limited to cases where a house was not inhabited by the person under whom he served. Upon the facts as stated, (1) The claimant occupied the same premises as Cormack, who had access to every corner of the house; and (2) the claimant served under Cormack, who had power at his pleasure to dismiss any domestic servant employed in the warehouse.

Counsel for the claimant was not called upon.

LORD ADAM.—The question raised in this case is whether the claimant

* 48 and 49 Vict. c. 3, sec. 3.—“Where any man himself inhabits any dwelling-house by virtue of any office, service, or employment, and the dwelling-house is not inhabited by any person under whom such man serves in such office, service, or employment, he shall be deemed . . . to be an inhabitant occupier of such dwelling-house as a tenant.”

M'Guffie, who is designed as a butler in the employment of Charles Jenner & Company occupies the premises in No. 8 South St David Street as tenant and occupant. Certain facts are set forth as to the premises, the employment of the claimant, and the employment of a manager called Cormack. Having set forth these facts, the Sheriff states that he held that Cormack did not inhabit the same dwelling-house as the voter, and therefore he admitted the claim. No. 61.
Dec. 10, 1891.
Falconer v. M'Guffie.

The question arises entirely under the 3d section of the Act of 1884. Under that section the house in respect of which the claim is made must not be inhabited by any person under whom the claimant serves. That involves the consideration of two questions. The first of these is, whether the claimant is in the service of Cormack? I am clearly of opinion that he is not. I think he is Messrs Jenner's butler, and in their service. Cormack's position is simply that of a manager for Jenner & Company. In that capacity he occupies a certain flat in this house, and has a power of superintendence over the persons in the house, including the claimant. That does not make the claimant a servant of Cormack in the sense of the Act. The appeal thus clearly fails upon the first ground.

That being so, the other question raised in the case does not require to be discussed. But I am equally clear with the Sheriff that Cormack occupies a different house in the sense of the Act from that occupied by the claimant. These appear to be large premises of four or five flats, and Cormack occupies the second flat, which constitutes his separate premises. In his character of manager he superintends the rest, but then the claimant has his premises in the fifth flat, which is entirely shut off from any other flat in the house.

LORD TRAYNER.—I also agree with the Sheriff. I think he has pronounced a sound judgment upon the ground on which he puts it. The statement of facts shews clearly that the claimant does not occupy the same house as Cormack. But apart from that, I agree also with your Lordship that M'Guffie is not employed in any office, service, or employment under Cormack in the sense of the statute.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I concur entirely in the judgment of the Sheriff, and I do not see any reason for going beyond it. I reserve my opinion upon the other question, but I would like to say that I cannot read the words "under whom such man serves in such office" as meaning nothing but employer.

THE COURT refused the appeal.

JAMES FALCONER, W.S.—GEORGE INGLIS, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN M'KENZIE (Objector), Appellant.—J. G. Millar.

JOHN WATT, Respondent.—Pitman.

No. 62.

Dec. 10, 1891.

M'Kenzie v.

Watt.

Election Law—County Franchise—Property qualification—Absolute disposition qualified by back-bond—Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 48), sec. 5.—Certain bankrupts who had entered into a composition arrangement with their creditors disposed certain subjects to the person who had become cautioner for the composition. By the disposition, which expressly proceeded upon a narrative of this fact, the bankrupts disposed the subjects in the cautioner's favour, "and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably." The deed, which contained the usual clauses of assignation of rents and writs and of warrandice, then declared that the subjects

No. 62.

Dec. 10, 1891.
M'Kenzie v.
Watt.

were disposed to him in real security and for payment to him of all sums paid by him to the creditors, or in reference to such sequestration expenses, insuring the property and collecting the rents. Power of sale was also conferred on the disponent, and he was taken bound to account for his intromissions, and to pay over any balance to the bankrupts.

Held that the disponent, being in fact a security holder merely, was not entitled to be put upon the roll as "proprietor" of the subjects disposed, under section 5 of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868.*

Registration
Appeal Court.
Lord Adam.
Lord Trayner.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

AT a Registration Court for the county of Bute, held at Rothesay on 12th October 1891, John Watt, net manufacturer, Kilbirnie, claimed to be enrolled on the register of voters for the county as proprietor of houses in Roslin Place, Mount Pleasant Road, Rothesay.

There was produced in support of the claim a disposition of the subjects in the claimant's favour, dated 14th, 15th, and 18th July 1879, and duly recorded. Its tenor, so far as material, was as follows:—
"We, John Thorburn and Thomas Thorburn, fishermen in Rothesay considering," &c. The deed here narrated the sequestration of the Thorburns and the acceptance by their creditors of the offer of composition, "and considering also that the said John Watt agreed to become cautioner for payment of the said composition on the distinct arrangement that we, the said John Thorburn and Thomas Thorburn, should convey and dispose to him our whole heritable property of every description, as after mentioned Therefore, in implement and pursuance of the said arrangement, we do hereby assign and dispose to and in favour of the said John Watt, and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably,—First (here follows description of subject) . . . with entry at the term of Whitsunday last, notwithstanding the date hereof; and we all, with joint consent and assent, and taking burden as aforesaid, assign the writs, and have delivered the same according to inventory annexed and subscribed as relative hereto; and we all, with joint consent and assent, and taking burden as aforesaid, assign the rents; and we, with joint consent and assent, and taking burden as aforesaid, grant warrantice, but excepting always therefrom the bonds and dispositions in security existing over the said subjects at the date of said sequestration, amounting to £3680 or thereby: Declaring always that the said subjects are disposed, and this conveyance is granted, to the said John Watt and his foresaids in real security, and for payment to him and his foresaids of all sums of money he has advanced and may advance or pay to the said just and lawful creditors of the said John and Thomas Thorburn, of the debts due to them respectively in the event of our failing to pay the same, and also of all interest due thereon, and of all expenses of every kind and description which the said John Watt may incur in any manner of way also the expense of this conveyance and the completion of the said John Watt's title, insuring the subjects against loss by fire, the factor's commission for collecting the rents, and, generally, everything which the said John Watt may incur in relation to the premises: Declaring that an account thereof to be made up by the said John Watt, with his oath, if required, as to the accuracy of the same, shall be conclusive as against us, and any one or more of us, to the exclusion of all other proof; and we, with joint consent and assent, and taking burden as aforesaid, do hereby authorise and empower the said John Watt immediately to sell the fore-said subjects: . . . Declaring always that purchasers and others shall have no concern with the application of the prices to be paid by them, and the simple discharge by the said John Watt or his fore-said subjects shall be sufficient, and be as binding as if granted by all of us; but declaring always that the said John Watt shall be bound to account to us for his intromissions in the premises, and in the event of there being any balance due by him, to be ascertained as before provided, the same shall be paid us, whose acceptance shall be a sufficient discharge to our said disponent for his whole intromissions in the premises; and we, with joint consent and assent, and taking burden as aforesaid, consent to registration hereof for preservation and execution."

* The Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 48), sec. 5, enacts,—“Every man . . . shall be entitled to be registered as a voter . . . who when the Sheriff proceeds to consider his right to be inserted . . . in the register of voters is qualified as follows,—that is to say, . . . (2) is and has been for a period of not less than six calendar months next preceding the last day of July, the proprietor (whether he has made up his titles or is infert or not) of lands and heritages, the yearly value of which as appearing from the Valuation-roll of the county shall be £5 or upwards.”

No. 62.

Dec. 10, 1891.
M'Kenzie v. Watt.

John M'Kenzie, blacksmith, 60 High Street, Rothesay, objected to the claim being admitted, on the ground that the claimant was, ex facie of his title, not proprietor of the subjects, but merely a security holder.

The Sheriff (Cheyne) admitted the claim; whereupon M'Kenzie craved a case, in which the foregoing narrative appeared.

The question of law for the decision of the Court was,—“Whether the writ produced is sufficient to support a claim to be registered as proprietor?”

Argued for the appellant;—The deed here was tantamount to an absolute conveyance qualified by a back-bond declaring that the conveyance though in form absolute was really in security. The holder of such a disposition could not be regarded as a “proprietor” in the sense of section 5 of the Act of 1868.¹ The radical title and proper proprietorship lay in the bankrupts.

The respondent relied on Anderson v. Niven, Nov. 8, 1880, 8 R. 4.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The question submitted to us is, whether the disposition produced is sufficient to support the respondent's claim?

The form of the deed in question appears to be somewhat unusual. [His Lordship here adverted to the peculiarity of the deed.] Notwithstanding the difficulties which the form of this conveyance undoubtedly suggests, its import and effect when taken as a whole seem to me to be sufficiently plain. It is an absolute conveyance with a qualifying back-bond, both given in the same deed instead of being separately executed as is commonly done. The question therefore comes to be, is the holder of an absolute conveyance qualified by a back-bond, duly recorded (for here the back-bond is recorded along with the conveyance), declaring that the conveyance, in form absolute, is really only a security, a proprietor in respect of such a title under the Act of 1868? That the holder of such a title is proprietor in some sense cannot be doubted. That is made very clear by the decision in the case of The Scottish Heritable Security Company, Limited, v. Allan Campbell & Company, Jan. 14, 1876, 3 R. 333. In that case the Court held that the holder of an absolute title, even although qualified by a back-bond, was not entitled to use a certain diligence competent only to a heritable creditor. The Court proceeded on the ground that the title which the pursuer relied on did not warrant the diligence he had used; and, dealing ¹ Monteith v. Scott, Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 300, 41 Scot. Jur. 178; Jardine v. M'Culloch, Dec. 2, 1865, 4 Macph. 138, 38 Scot. Jur. 80.

No. 62.

Dec. 10, 1891.
M'Kenzie v.
Watt.

with a question of diligence, regarded rather the nature and effect of the title than the reality of the transaction out of which that title sprang. Now, it appears to me, that questions arising under the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, must be differently regarded. Under that Act (the provisions of which we are now administering) the fact of proprietorship rather than the state of the title is the leading and indeed only consideration. By section 5 it is provided that every man of full age and legal capacity shall be entitled to be registered as a voter who is "the proprietor" of lands of a certain value, "whether he has made up his title or is infest or not." The Sheriff must register as a voter any claimant who satisfies him that he is the proprietor in fact, although that may not be proved by the production of a formal or feudal title to the subjects. It is certain that the Sheriff could not in other cases proceed on the same ground. For example, in a petition for removing, the only title at which the Sheriff could look (where the pursuer's title was competently challenged) would be the pursuer's infestment; and no other title would be sufficient. Accordingly, what has to be ascertained here is, what in fact is the claimant's right to the subjects in question. The answer to that on the terms of the deed produced by him is, that he is only a holder of the subjects in security, and not proprietor. The radical title and the proper proprietorship is in the Thorburns. This question seems to have been thus regarded, and decided in accordance with this view by the Judges in the Registration Court. Perhaps the most direct authority on this point is the case of Monteith v. Scott, 7 Macph. 300, where the claimant was put on the roll as proprietor of a house which he had purchased, to which, however, he had never obtained a title, and the title to which stood at the time as an absolute title in the name of a property company, from whom the claimant had obtained the advances which enabled him to pay for the property. The claimant was held to be, as in fact he was, the proprietor, while the company's title, ex facie absolute, was regarded as only a security, which again it was in point of fact. In the case of Jardine, 4 Macph. 138, it was decided that a conveyance ex facie absolute could not be qualified as a mere security by the production of an unstamped back-letter so qualifying it, or by the oath of the disponee that the right was in fact a security only. This is only an authority on the point before us inferentially, but in that respect it may be regarded as an authority. For if the production of a duly stamped and recorded back-letter would not have prevailed to reduce the apparent right of proprietorship under an ex facie absolute conveyance to the level of a security merely, the case would probably have been so decided, and the decision on the competency of the proffered evidence would have been unnecessary. The decision in that case was followed in the subsequent case of Skeete v. Stewart, Nov. 7, 1879, 7 R. 12, where a voter on the roll was objected to on the ground that he had disposed the subjects to another by an absolute conveyance. The disponee under that conveyance deponed that the conveyance, although ex facie absolute, was only a security in fact. The Court held such evidence inadmissible to qualify the conveyance, and struck the voter off the roll as he had divested himself, so far as competently appeared, absolutely of the property. But in giving judgment Lord Mure observed, "If he (the voter) had at any time got a back-letter declaring that this was simply a trust, no question as to his right could have arisen." Following what I think has been decided by the cases I have referred to, and for the other reasons I have above given, I think the judgment of the Sheriff should be reversed.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I concur in thinking that this claim ought not to be admitted. I have never met with a deed like that on which the claim is founded. It is anomalous and self-contradictory, and I abstain from expressing an opinion as to its precise legal effects. The title may in form and to some effect be a proprietary title, but I think that the right conferred is not a full proprietary right, but is more of the character of a right constituted by an absolute disposition and back-bond or other form of security, which has never been held to confer a qualification.

No. 62.

Dec. 10, 1891.
M'Kenzie v.
Watt.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, reversed the finding of the Sheriff, and remitted to him to remove the name of the claimant from the roll of voters for the county of Bute.

L. M'INTOSH, S.S.C.—COOPER & BRODIE, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN NEILSON, Appellant.—Comrie Thomson—Craigie.
JOHN JACK ROBERTSON, Respondent.—Dickson—Pitman.

No. 63.

Dec. 10, 1891.
Neilson v.
Robertson.

Election Law—County Franchise—Notice of objection—Time—Burgh Voters Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 58), secs. 4 and 9—Representation of the People Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 48), sec. 20.—The Burgh Voters Act, 1856, sec. 4, as amended by the Representation of the People Act, 1868, and applied to counties by the Reform Act, 1884, sec. 8 (6), provides, that every person objecting to any entry on the roll shall, "on or before the 21st day of September, give or cause to be given to the person so objected to, or leave or cause to be left at his place of abode as described in such list, a notice . . ." Sec. 9 provides that "it shall be sufficient if such notice be sent by the post, postage paid, addressed with a sufficient direction, to the person to whom the same ought to be given at his usual place of abode."

A notice of objection, addressed to the person objected to at his residence at Shotts, was posted at Motherwell on the evening of 21st September after the last despatch for that day.

Held (diss. Lord Adam) that the notice was not timeously given.

Observations per curiam on M'Creath v. Smith, Oct. 22, 1869, 8 Macph. 15, 42 Scot. Jur. 20.

Election Law—County Franchise—Notice of objection sent to the Assessor—Burgh Voters Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 58), sec. 4 and Schedule No. 4.—Held that a notice of an objection sent to the Assessor under sec. 4 of the Burgh Voters Act, 1856, which omitted to state the qualification of the person objected to as appearing in the Assessor's list of voters, was not disconform to the statute.

Election Law—Representation of the People Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 48), sec. 22—Appending to special case names of persons objected to.—Held that the regulations of this clause regarding the appending to a special case the names of persons whose cases depend upon the same question of law as is stated in the special case are applicable to cases raising questions as to qualifications by new claimants, and not to objections to those already on the roll.

At a Registration Court for the North-Eastern Division of Lanarkshire, held at Motherwell on 5th October 1891, John Jack Robertson, Calder Street, Motherwell, objected to the Assessor's entry upon the voters list of the name of John Neilson, miner, as tenant of a house in High Street, Shotts.

Registration
Appeal Court.
Lord Adam.
Lord Trayner.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

Neilson objected (1) that Robertson was not entitled to object to any person whose name was on the list of voters then being revised, as Robertson was not on the register of voters for the year 1890-91; (2)

No. 59.

Dec. 10, 1891.
Falconer v.
Macleod.

The Sheriff (Blair) admitted the claim, and the objector craved a case, in which the Sheriff stated as follows:—"I was informed by the Assessor that the method adopted by the claimant in filling up his claim was one which had previously been adopted and followed in the Burgh of Edinburgh Registration Court in the cases of partner claimants without objection. It was stated by the Assessor, and was not disputed, that the firm of Macleod Brothers appeared upon the Valuation-roll as the tenants and occupants of 13 Clyde Street, and that the value of the premises and the respondent's interest in the said firm were sufficient to entitle him to be enrolled as tenant and occupant for the parliamentary franchise."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was,—“Whether the said claim sufficiently specifies the nature of the qualification founded on by the respondent, and the respondent is entitled to be put on the roll?”

Argued for the appellant;—The claim must be rejected. It contained no statement of Macleod's qualification as a voter, but merely a statement of his interest in a partnership.

Argued for the respondent;—The nature of his qualification was stated in accordance with the usual practice in the Burgh of Edinburgh Registration Court. The Assessor must take the qualification from the Valuation-roll, and in it the firm of Macleod Brothers appeared as tenants and occupants of 13 Clyde Street. No one could suffer prejudice from this, because, under section 16 of the Burgh Voters Act, 1856, any member of the public had a right to inspect the Valuation-roll, and satisfy himself that the claim was a good one.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think the Sheriff has gone wrong here. The statute requires that the claimant shall give a notice to the Assessor containing the particulars of his qualification. The only qualification stated in the case before us is that the claimant represents himself as partner of a certain firm. That is no qualification.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I think the claim is bad, past correction.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, reversed the finding of the Sheriff and remitted to him to expunge the name of the claimant from the roll.

JAMES FALCONER, W.S.—GEORGE INGLIS, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 60.

Dec. 10, 1891.*
M'Kenzie v.
Comrie.

JOHN M'KENZIE, Appellant.—J. G. Millar.

JOHN SMITH COMRIE, Respondent.—Pitman.

Election Law—County Franchise—Sale of subjects on which claim based. Reform Act, 1832 (2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 65), sec. 7.—In order to support claim for registration under section 7 of the Reform Act, 1832,† it is necessary

* Decided Nov. 24, 1891.

† The Reform Act, 1832, sec. 7, enacts,—“Every person . . . shall be entitled to be registered . . . who when the Sheriff proceeds to consider his claim for registration . . . shall have been for a period of not less than six calendar months next previous to the last day of July . . . the owner . . . of any lands, houses, . . . provided the subject or subjects which he so claims shall be of the yearly value of ten pounds, and shall actually yield or be capable of yielding that value to the claimant . . . provided he be by himself, his tenants, vassals, or others, in possession of the said s that the claimant shall not have ceased to be proprietor of the subjects upon which he claims the franchise at the date at which the Sheriff proceeds to consider the claim in the Registration Court. No. 60.

Dec. 10, 1891.
M'Kenzie v.
Comrie.

AT a Registration Court for the county of Bute, held on 12th October 1891, John Smith Comrie, civil engineer, London, claimed to be enrolled on the register of voters for the county as joint proprietor of a house, 36 Crichton Road, Rothesay. Registration
Appeal Court.

John M'Kenzie, blacksmith, objected to the claim on the ground that the property upon which it was founded no longer belonged to the claimant, having been sold by him on 5th October 1891, with entry at that date. Lord Adam.
Lord Trayner.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

It was admitted that the yearly value of the subjects and the claimant's interest in them were sufficient, that the claimant had held that interest for more than six calendar months prior to 31st July 1891, and that the subjects had, since the claim was lodged, been sold to a third party, with entry at 5th October 1891.

The Sheriff (Cheyne) admitted the claim, and M'Kenzie craved a case, in which the Sheriff, after a narrative of the foregoing facts, stated the following question for the opinion of the Court:—"Whether it is necessary, in order to support a claim under section 7 of 2 and 3 William IV. c. 65, that the claimant shall be still proprietor of the subjects at the date when the Sheriff proceeds to consider his claim?"

Argued for the appellant;—In order to entitle a person to the franchise under section 7 of the Act of 1832, it was necessary that he should not only have been owner of property of statutory value for six months prior to 31st July, but should be in "actual occupation or in receipt of the profits thereof" when the Sheriff came to consider his claim. In this view of the statute the respondent's name fell to be expunged from the roll, for at the date of the Registration Court he had parted with the subjects upon which he claimed.¹

Argued for the respondent;—Section 7 of the Act of 1832 was perfectly clear and unambiguous. Any person was entitled to the franchise who, when the Sheriff comes to consider his claim, "shall have been" for a period of not less than six calendar months next previous to the last day of July owner of the subjects upon which he claimed. There was nothing to indicate that the Legislature intended the ownership to continue after that date. This was made more clear by a comparison of the section with section 5, subsection 2, of the Representation of the People Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 48). This latter section reduced the ownership franchise in counties from £10 to £5, and contained an express enactment that the period of ownership should extend down to the date of the Sheriff's consideration of the claim, by the introduction for the first time of the words "is and has been" for a period of not less than six calendar months previous to the last day of July owner of the subject upon which the voter claimed. This intention of the Legislature to create an innovation in the later Act for the first time was also seen on comparing the sections as to burghs in the Acts 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 65, sec. 11, and 31 and 32 Vict. c. 48, sec. 3, subsec. 2.

LORD ADAM.—It appears that this claim was made by the claimant as joint proprietor of certain subjects in Rothesay. The yearly value of the subjects ject, and be either himself in the actual occupation, or in receipt of the profits and issues thereof to the extent above mentioned. . . ."

¹ Latta v. Raeburn, Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 298, 41 Scot. Jur. 177; Smith v. M'Donald, Nov. 26, 1886, 14 R. 125.

No. 60.
Dec. 10, 1891.
M'Kenzie v.
Comrie.

was £70, and the claimant's interest more than £10 per annum, and he had possessed that interest for more than six months prior to 31st July. The subjects since the claim was lodged were sold to a third party, with entry at 5th October current. The question of law stated is,—“Whether it is necessary, to support a claim under section 7 of 2 and 3 William IV. c. 65, that the claimant shall be still proprietor of the subjects at the date when the Sheriff proceeds to consider his claim?” I have no doubt upon the point. The statute proceeds upon the footing that at the date when the claim comes to be considered the claimant shall still be proprietor of the subjects. The clause says,—“Every person . . . who when the Sheriff proceeds to consider his claim . . . shall have been for a period of six calendar months next previous . . . to the last day of July . . . the owner, &c.,” and goes on to say, “provided the subject or subjects on which he so claims shall be of the yearly value of ten pounds, and shall actually yield or be capable of yielding that value to the claimant,” and further, provided he be in possession, and either in actual occupation or in receipt of the profits and issues. I suppose it will not be said that after a person has parted with property it is capable of yielding yearly rent to him, or that a person who has sold subjects is in possession, in actual occupation, or in receipt of profits and issues.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree, and without the slightest hesitation or doubt. I think the Sheriff has gone upon a narrow construction of three or four words in the 7th section of the Reform Act, without taking into account either the general scope of the Act or other parts of the same clause that he was considering. The Reform Act conferred the right to the franchise upon certain proprietors and occupiers, but it was the basis of the right to vote under the statute that the person claiming had the right of proprietor or of occupant, and it assumes that when he claims he has that right. The statute no doubt says that he shall have something more. He must have been proprietor for a period of not less than six calendar months prior to the 31st July. It is obvious I think that that merely means that he is not to be admitted because he is now proprietor, but that he must also have been proprietor during that period. I think your Lordship has demonstrated that that must be the meaning of the section when we come to consider the proviso which your Lordship has read.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair. I cannot help thinking that the attention of the Sheriff had been drawn solely to the primary clause, the clause conferring the qualification, and if the case had to be decided upon that clause alone I would have agreed with him, differing, I rather think, from the opinion expressed by Lord Trayner; but I think the proviso makes it very clear that the claimant must be in possession of the subjects at the time when the Sheriff holds his Registration Court.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, reversed the finding of the Sheriff, and remitted to him to expunge the name of the said John Smith Comrie from the roll of voters for the county of Bute.

L. M'INTOSH, S.S.C.—COOPER & BRODIE, W.S.—Agents.

JAMES FALCONER (Objector), Appellant.—Asher—A. J. Young.

JAMES M'GUFFIE, Respondent.—Dundas—Pitman.

No. 61.

Dec. 10, 1891.*

Election Law—"Inhabitant occupier"—Service Franchise—Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. c. 3), sec. 3.—A draper's warehouse consisted of a tenement of several flats, the ground flat being devoted to the business premises, while the upper flats were devoted to sitting-rooms and bed-rooms for the firm's servants. The manager occupied rooms on the second flat, and a butler occupied for his exclusive use a bedroom on an upper flat. The flats were all reached by a common stair. There was no other communication between the flat occupied by the manager and that occupied by the butler. The manager was entrusted with a general supervision of the whole domestic arrangements provided for the servants, and had power to dismiss the domestic servants, including the butler.

Held that the butler was entitled to be regarded as an "inhabitant occupier" of a dwelling-house in the sense of the 3d section of the Representation of the People Act, 1884, in respect (1) that the premises he occupied were not inhabited by the manager, and (2) that he did not serve under the manager in the sense of the Act.

Lord Kincairney reserved his opinion upon the second point.

At a Registration Court for the burgh of Edinburgh on 10th October 1891, James Falconer, W.S., objected to the entry upon the voters list for the burgh (West Division) of James M'Guffie, butler, as tenant and occupant, 8 South St David Street.

The ground of objection was that M'Guffie inhabited a dwelling-house in virtue of his employment which was also inhabited by a person under whom he served in this employment.

The Sheriff (Blair) repelled the objection, and Falconer craved a case, which was accordingly stated by the Sheriff.

These facts were set forth:—"The witnesses examined were Mr Kennedy, the senior partner of the firm of Charles Jenner & Company, and Mr Cormack, a manager or buyer and shop-walker in the employment of the said firm.

"It was proved that the said James M'Guffie is a butler in the employment of Charles Jenner & Company, drapers, Princes Street and South St David Street, Edinburgh, and that in virtue of his employment he occupies, and had occupied, for his exclusive use a bedroom in one of the two upper flats of the tenement 8 South St David Street aforesaid, for the period of twelve months prior to 31st July 1891. That the tenement 8 and 12 South St David Street had originally consisted of several houses, which had been altered to suit the business requirements of the said firm of Jenner & Company. That the first or street and sunk flats are occupied as part of their shop or warehouse; that the second flat, being the flat above the street flat, contains a dining-hall for the assistants in the employment of the firm, the rooms consisting of a dining-room, sitting-room, bedroom, and bath-room allotted to the said Mr Cormack, a sitting-room for the female assistants, and another room; that the third flat contains kitchens, servants' rooms, and bedrooms for the female assistants; that the fourth flat contains a library or reading-room, smoking-room, and other rooms; and that the fifth and attic flats, being the two upper flats, are entirely occupied by bedrooms for the assistants or employees of the firm, of which bedrooms Mr M'Guffie occupies one. That entrance is had to the whole tenement, including the shop flat, by the door 8 South St David Street, which gives access to a stair on which at each landing there is a

Registration
Appeal Court.
Lord Adam.
Lord Trayner.
Lord Kin-
cairney.
Sheriff of the Lothians and
Peebles.

No. 61.

Dec. 10, 1891.
Falconer v.
M'Guffie.

door opening into the corresponding flat; that this stair is the only access to the fourth and fifth and attic flats; that when the door is closed the flat is shut off from the rest of the tenement, except in the case of the second and third flats, between which there is an internal stair; that there is a stair from the second flat to the door entering at 12 South St David Street, but that this door is not used. That Mr Cormack is one of the managers in the employment of the firm of C. Jenner & Company, but acts under the direct supervision of the partners of the firm, who themselves manage the business; that in the shop he has charge of the fancy department of the business of C. Jenner & Company; that the assistants in his own department are subject to his orders; and that if shorthanded he can require assistance from other departments in the same way as the managers of these departments, but otherwise has no authority over the assistants in the other departments. That Mr Cormack has no power to engage or dismiss assistants, but in these matters reports to the firm; that Mr Cormack is, further, manager of the domestic establishment, and in this capacity has a general supervision of the whole of the domestic arrangements provided for the assistants in the said tenement 8 and 12 South St David Street. That he has charge of the keys of the shop and tenement; that he has power to engage and dismiss the domestic servants required for the establishment, including the said James M'Guffie; that he has access to every part of the tenement, and has power, in the event of grave misconduct, to expel an assistant from the tenement for the night, but must immediately report having done so to the firm; that when he pleases he can use the dining-hall and reading-room provided for the assistants, and has also the use of the kitchens and servants, as well as the exclusive use of the rooms allotted to him as aforesaid; but that he does not use or for his own purposes in any way occupy the fifth and attic flats of said tenement, or any part of them. That Mr Cormack is enrolled, under the service franchise, as tenant and occupant of 12 South St David Street. That house-duty is paid for the whole tenement, including the shop, as one subject.

"I held that whether Mr Cormack was or was not a person under whom the voter served in his employment, that he did not inhabit the same dwelling-house as the voter, and I repelled the objection."

The question of law for the decision of the Court was,—“Whether in respect of the foresaid facts the said James M'Guffie is entitled to be entered on the roll in respect of the qualification set forth in the 3d section of the Act 48 and 49 Vict. cap. 3?”

Argued for the objector;—The claimant was not an “inhabitant occupier” in the sense of the Representation of the People Act, 1884,* for the franchise intended by the Act was limited to cases where a house was not inhabited by the person under whom he served. Upon the facts as stated, (1) The claimant occupied the same premises as Cormack, who had access to every corner of the house; and (2) the claimant served under Cormack, who had power at his pleasure to dismiss any domestic servant employed in the warehouse.

Counsel for the claimant was not called upon.

LORD ADAM.—The question raised in this case is whether the claimant

* 48 and 49 Vict. c. 3, sec. 3.—“Where any man himself inhabits any dwelling-house by virtue of any office, service, or employment, and the dwelling-house is not inhabited by any person under whom such man serves in such office, service, or employment, he shall be deemed . . . to be an inhabitant occupier of such dwelling-house as a tenant.”

M'Guffie, who is designed as a butler in the employment of Charles Jenner & Company occupies the premises in No. 8 South St David Street as tenant and occupant. Certain facts are set forth as to the premises, the employment of the claimant, and the employment of a manager called Cormack. Having set forth these facts, the Sheriff states that he held that Cormack did not inhabit the same dwelling-house as the voter, and therefore he admitted the claim. No. 61.
Dec. 10, 1891.
Falconer v. M'Guffie.

The question arises entirely under the 3d section of the Act of 1884. Under that section the house in respect of which the claim is made must not be inhabited by any person under whom the claimant serves. That involves the consideration of two questions. The first of these is, whether the claimant is in the service of Cormack? I am clearly of opinion that he is not. I think he is Messrs Jenner's butler, and in their service. Cormack's position is simply that of a manager for Jenner & Company. In that capacity he occupies a certain flat in this house, and has a power of superintendence over the persons in the house, including the claimant. That does not make the claimant a servant of Cormack in the sense of the Act. The appeal thus clearly fails upon the first ground.

That being so, the other question raised in the case does not require to be discussed. But I am equally clear with the Sheriff that Cormack occupies a different house in the sense of the Act from that occupied by the claimant. These appear to be large premises of four or five flats, and Cormack occupies the second flat, which constitutes his separate premises. In his character of manager he superintends the rest, but then the claimant has his premises in the fifth flat, which is entirely shut off from any other flat in the house.

LORD TRAYNER.—I also agree with the Sheriff. I think he has pronounced a sound judgment upon the ground on which he puts it. The statement of facts shews clearly that the claimant does not occupy the same house as Cormack. But apart from that, I agree also with your Lordship that M'Guffie is not employed in any office, service, or employment under Cormack in the sense of the statute.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I concur entirely in the judgment of the Sheriff, and I do not see any reason for going beyond it. I reserve my opinion upon the other question, but I would like to say that I cannot read the words "under whom such man serves in such office" as meaning nothing but employer.

THE COURT refused the appeal.

JAMES FALCONER, W.S.—GEORGE INGLIS, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN M'KENZIE (Objector), Appellant.—J. G. Millar.

JOHN WATT, Respondent.—Pitman.

No. 62.

Election Law—County Franchise—Property qualification—Absolute disposition qualified by back-bond—Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868 Dec. 10, 1891.
M'Kenzie v. Watt.
(31 and 32 Vict. c. 48), sec. 5.—Certain bankrupts who had entered into a composition arrangement with their creditors disposed certain subjects to the person who had become cautioner for the composition. By the disposition, which expressly proceeded upon a narrative of this fact, the bankrupts disposed the subjects in the cautioner's favour, "and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably." The deed, which contained the usual clauses of assignation of rents and writs and of warrandice, then declared that the subjects

No. 62.

Dec. 10, 1891.
M'Kenzie v.
Watt.

were disposed to him in real security and for payment to him of all sums paid by him to the creditors, or in reference to such sequestration expenses, insuring the property and collecting the rents. Power of sale was also conferred on the disponee, and he was taken bound to account for his intromissions, and to pay over any balance to the bankrupts.

Held that the disponee, being in fact a security holder merely, was not entitled to be put upon the roll as "proprietor" of the subjects disposed, under section 5 of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868.*

Registration
Appeal Court.
Lord Adam.
Lord Trayner.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

At a Registration Court for the county of Bute, held at Rothesay on 12th October 1891, John Watt, net manufacturer, Kilbirnie, claimed to be enrolled on the register of voters for the county as proprietor of houses in Roslin Place, Mount Pleasant Road, Rothesay.

There was produced in support of the claim a disposition of the subjects in the claimant's favour, dated 14th, 15th, and 18th July 1879, and duly recorded. Its tenor, so far as material, was as follows:—
"We, John Thorburn and Thomas Thorburn, fishermen in Rothesay considering," &c. The deed here narrated the sequestration of the Thorburns and the acceptance by their creditors of the offer of composition, "and considering also that the said John Watt agreed to become cautioner for payment of the said composition on the distinct arrangement that we, the said John Thorburn and Thomas Thorburn, should convey and dispoise to him our whole heritable property of every description, as after mentioned Therefore, in implement and pursuance of the said arrangement, we do hereby assign and dispoise to and in favour of the said John Watt, and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably,—First (here follows description of subject) . . . with entry at the term of Whitsunday last, notwithstanding the date hereof; and we all, with joint consent and assent, and taking burden as aforesaid, assign the writs, and have delivered the same according to inventory annexed and subscribed as relative hereto; and we all, with joint consent and assent, and taking burden as aforesaid, assign the rents; and we, with joint consent and assent, and taking burden as aforesaid, grant warrandice, but excepting always therefrom the bonds and dispositions in security existing over the said subjects at the date of said sequestration, amounting to £3680 or thereby: Declaring always that the said subjects are disposed, and this conveyance is granted, to the said John Watt and his foresaids in real security, and for payment to him and his foresaids of all sums of money he has advanced and may advance or pay to the said just and lawful creditors of the said John and Thomas Thorburn, of the debts due to them respectively in the event of our failing to pay the same, and also of all interest due thereon, and of all expenses of every kind and description which the said John Watt may incur in any manner of way also the expense of this conveyance and the completion of the said John Watt's title, insuring the subjects against loss by fire, the factor's commission for collecting the rents, and, generally, everything which the said John Watt may incur in relation to the premises: Declaring that an account thereof to be made up by the said John Watt, with his oath, if required, as to the accuracy of the same, shall be conclusive as against us, No. 62.

* The Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 48), sec. 5, enacts,—“Every man . . . shall be entitled to be registered as a voter . . . who when the Sheriff proceeds to consider his right to be inserted . . . in the register of voters is qualified as follows,—that is to say, . . . (2) is and has been for a period of not less than six calendar months next preceding the last day of July, the proprietor (whether he has made up his titles or is infeft or not) of lands and heritages, the yearly value of which as appearing from the Valuation-roll of the county shall be £5 or upwards.”

and any one or more of us, to the exclusion of all other proof; and we, with joint consent and assent, and taking burden as aforesaid, do hereby ^{Dec. 10, 1891.}
authorise and empower the said John Watt immediately to sell the fore- ^{M'Kenzie v.} said subjects: . . . Declaring always that purchasers and others shall have no concern with the application of the prices to be paid by them, and the simple discharge by the said John Watt or his foresaids shall be sufficient, and be as binding as if granted by all of us; but declaring always that the said John Watt shall be bound to account to us for his intromissions in the premises, and in the event of there being any balance due by him, to be ascertained as before provided, the same shall be paid us, whose acceptance shall be a sufficient discharge to our said disponsee for his whole intromissions in the premises; and we, with joint consent and assent, and taking burden as aforesaid, consent to registration hereof for preservation and execution."

John M'Kenzie, blacksmith, 60 High Street, Rothesay, objected to the claim being admitted, on the ground that the claimant was, ex facie of his title, not proprietor of the subjects, but merely a security holder.

The Sheriff (Cheyne) admitted the claim; whereupon M'Kenzie craved a case, in which the foregoing narrative appeared.

The question of law for the decision of the Court was,—“Whether the writ produced is sufficient to support a claim to be registered as proprietor?”

Argued for the appellant;—The deed here was tantamount to an absolute conveyance qualified by a back-bond declaring that the conveyance though in form absolute was really in security. The holder of such a disposition could not be regarded as a “proprietor” in the sense of section 5 of the Act of 1868.¹ The radical title and proper proprietorship lay in the bankrupts.

The respondent relied on Anderson v. Niven, Nov. 8, 1880, 8 R. 4.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The question submitted to us is, whether the disposition produced is sufficient to support the respondent's claim?

The form of the deed in question appears to be somewhat unusual. [His Lordship here adverted to the peculiarity of the deed.] Notwithstanding the difficulties which the form of this conveyance undoubtedly suggests, its import and effect when taken as a whole seem to me to be sufficiently plain. It is an absolute conveyance with a qualifying back-bond, both given in the same deed instead of being separately executed as is commonly done. The question therefore comes to be, is the holder of an absolute conveyance qualified by a back-bond, duly recorded (for here the back-bond is recorded along with the conveyance), declaring that the conveyance, in form absolute, is really only a security, a proprietor in respect of such a title under the Act of 1868? That the holder of such a title is proprietor in some sense cannot be doubted. That is made very clear by the decision in the case of The Scottish Heritable Security Company, Limited, v. Allan Campbell & Company, Jan. 14, 1876, 3 R. 333. In that case the Court held that the holder of an absolute title, even although qualified by a back-bond, was not entitled to use a certain diligence competent only to a heritable creditor. The Court proceeded on the ground that the title which the pursuer relied on did not warrant the diligence he had used; and, dealing

¹ Monteith v. Scott, Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 300, 41 Scot. Jur. 178; *Jardine
v. McCulloch*, Dec. 2, 1865, 4 Macph. 138, 38 Scot. Jur. 80.

No. 62.

Dec. 10, 1891.
M'Kenzie v.
Watt.

with a question of diligence, regarded rather the nature and effect of the title than the reality of the transaction out of which that title sprang. Now, it appears to me, that questions arising under the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, must be differently regarded. Under that Act (the provisions of which we are now administering) the fact of proprietorship rather than the state of the title is the leading and indeed only consideration. By section 5 it is provided that every man of full age and legal capacity shall be entitled to be registered as a voter who is "the proprietor" of lands of a certain value, "whether he has made up his title or is infeft or not." The Sheriff must register as a voter any claimant who satisfies him that he is the proprietor in fact, although that may not be proved by the production of a formal or feudal title to the subjects. It is certain that the Sheriff could not in other cases proceed on the same ground. For example, in a petition for removing, the only title at which the Sheriff could look (where the pursuer's title was competently challenged) would be the pursuer's infeftment; and no other title would be sufficient. Accordingly, what has to be ascertained here is, what in fact is the claimant's right to the subjects in question. The answer to that on the terms of the deed produced by him is, that he is only a holder of the subjects in security, and not proprietor. The radical title and the proper proprietorship is in the Thorburns. This question seems to have been thus regarded, and decided in accordance with this view by the Judges in the Registration Court. Perhaps the most direct authority on this point is the case of Monteith v. Scott, 7 Macph. 300, where the claimant was put on the roll as proprietor of a house which he had purchased, to which, however, he had never obtained a title, and the title to which stood at the time as an absolute title in the name of a property company, from whom the claimant had obtained the advances which enabled him to pay for the property. The claimant was held to be, as in fact he was, the proprietor, while the company's title, ex facie absolute, was regarded as only a security, which again it was in point of fact. In the case of Jardine, 4 Macph. 138, it was decided that a conveyance ex facie absolute could not be qualified as a mere security by the production of an unstamped back-letter so qualifying it, or by the oath of the disponee that the right was in fact a security only. This is only an authority on the point before us inferentially, but in that respect it may be regarded as an authority. For if the production of a duly stamped and recorded back-letter would not have prevailed to reduce the apparent right of proprietorship under an ex facie absolute conveyance to the level of a security merely, the case would probably have been so decided, and the decision on the competency of the proffered evidence would have been unnecessary. The decision in that case was followed in the subsequent case of Skeets v. Stewart, Nov. 7, 1879, 7 R. 12, where a voter on the roll was objected to on the ground that he had disposed the subjects to another by an absolute conveyance. The disponee under that conveyance deponed that the conveyance, although ex facie absolute, was only a security in fact. The Court held such evidence inadmissible to qualify the conveyance, and struck the voter off the roll as he had divested himself, so far as competently appeared, absolutely of the property. But in giving judgment Lord Mure observed, "If he (the voter) had at any time got a back-letter declaring that this was simply a trust, no question as to his right could have arisen." Following what I think has been decided by the cases I have referred to, and for the other reasons I have above given, I think the judgment of the Sheriff should be reversed.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I concur in thinking that this claim ought not to be admitted. I have never met with a deed like that on which the claim is founded. It is anomalous and self-contradictory, and I abstain from expressing an opinion as to its precise legal effects. The title may in form and to some effect be a proprietary title, but I think that the right conferred is not a full proprietary right, but is more of the character of a right constituted by an absolute disposition and back-bond or other form of security, which has never been held to confer a qualification.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, reversed the finding of the Sheriff, and remitted to him to remove the name of the claimant from the roll of voters for the county of Bute.

L. M'INTOSH, S.S.C.—COOPER & BRODIE, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN NEILSON, Appellant.—Comrie Thomson—Craigie.

JOHN JACK ROBERTSON, Respondent.—Dickson—Pitman.

No. 63.

Dec. 10, 1891.
Neilson v.
Robertson.

Election Law—County Franchise—Notice of objection—Time—Burgh Voters Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 58), secs. 4 and 9—Representation of the People Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 48), sec. 20.—The Burgh Voters Act, 1856, sec. 4, as amended by the Representation of the People Act, 1868, and applied to counties by the Reform Act, 1884, sec. 8 (6), provides, that every person objecting to any entry on the roll shall, “on or before the 21st day of September, give or cause to be given to the person so objected to, or leave or cause to be left at his place of abode as described in such list, a notice . . .” Sec. 9 provides that “it shall be sufficient if such notice be sent by the post, postage paid, addressed with a sufficient direction, to the person to whom the same ought to be given at his usual place of abode.”

A notice of objection, addressed to the person objected to at his residence at Shotts, was posted at Motherwell on the evening of 21st September after the last despatch for that day.

Held (disc. Lord Adam) that the notice was not timeously given.

Observations per curiam on M'Creath v. Smith, Oct. 22, 1869, 8 Macph. 15, 42 Scot. Jur. 20.

Election Law—County Franchise—Notice of objection sent to the Assessor—Burgh Voters Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 58), sec. 4 and Schedule No. 4.—

Held that a notice of an objection sent to the Assessor under sec. 4 of the Burgh Voters Act, 1856, which omitted to state the qualification of the person objected to as appearing in the Assessor's list of voters, was not disconform to the statute.

Election Law—Representation of the People Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 48), sec. 22—Appending to special case names of persons objected to.—Held that the regulations of this clause regarding the appending to a special case the names of persons whose cases depend upon the same question of law as is stated in the special case are applicable to cases raising questions as to qualifications by new claimants, and not to objections to those already on the roll.

At a Registration Court for the North-Eastern Division of Lanarkshire, held at Motherwell on 5th October 1891, John Jack Robertson, Calder Street, Motherwell, objected to the Assessor's entry upon the voters list of the name of John Neilson, miner, as tenant of a house in High Street, Shotts.

Neilson objected (1) that Robertson was not entitled to object to any person whose name was on the list of voters then being revised, as Robertson was not on the register of voters for the year 1890-91; (2)

Registration
Appeal Court.
Lord Adam.
Lord Trayner.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

No. 63.

Dec. 10, 1891.
Neilson v.
Robertson.

that the notice of objection was not timeously given to the appellant; and (3) that the notice of objection given to the Assessor did not comply with the statutes, the nature of the qualification, or supposed qualification, of the person objected to not having been stated therein.

The following facts were admitted:—That Robertson was not on the current register of voters (1890-91) for the North-Eastern Division of Lanarkshire, but was on the Assessor's list of voters for the year 1891-92 then being revised, and was not objected to; that the notice of objection to Neilson was posted at Motherwell on 21st September 1891, about 11.30 P.M., after the last despatch for that day; that the notice of objection to the Assessor did not contain the qualification, or supposed qualification, of Neilson as appearing in the Assessor's list of voters, the column in the Assessor's list headed "Nature of the supposed qualification" being left blank.

The Sheriff-substitute (Mair) repelled Neilson's preliminary objections, and on the merits sustained Robertson's objections, and deleted Neilson's name from the roll.

Neilson thereupon craved a case, which contained the above narrative, and in which the following questions of law were stated for the opinion of the Court:—“(1) Whether in a county a person whose name is not on the register of voters, but is on the list of voters then being revised, and not objected to, is entitled to object to the name of any person being retained on the list of voters? (2) Whether a notice of objection is timeously posted to the person objected to in the circumstances above stated? and (3) Whether a notice of objection to the Assessor must state the qualification of the person objected to as appearing in the Assessor's list of voters?”

The case further stated,—“Appeals were also taken against my decisions in sustaining the respondent's objections to the retention on the roll of the persons whose names are appended hereto” (seventeen in number) “in circumstances similar to those above set forth, in each case the nature of qualification stated in the Assessor's list being omitted to be stated in the notice of objection sent to the Assessor.”

Argued for the appellant;—(1) The notice of objection was not given, delivered, or left for the appellant “on or before the 21st September.” Indeed, from the nature of the postal arrangements at Motherwell it was physically impossible that it could be. It was not then timeously given in terms of secs. 4 and 9 of the Burgh Voters Act of 1856,* as amended

* The Burgh Voters Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 58), sec. 4 (as amended by section 20 of the Representation of the People Act, 1868, and applied to counties by section 8 (6) of the Reform Act of 1884), enacts,—“In every year every person whose name shall have been inserted in any list of voters for any burgh may object to any other person as not having been entitled on the last day of July next preceding to have his name inserted in any list of voters for such burgh, and every person so objecting shall, on or before the 21st day of September in such year, give or cause to be given to the Assessor of such burgh a notice according to the form No. 4 of the said Schedule A, or to the like effect, and shall also, on or before such 21st day of September, give or cause to be given to the person so objected to, or leave or cause to be left at his place of abode as described in such list, a notice according to the form No. 5 of the said Schedule A, or to the like effect. . . .”

Section 9 of the Act enacts,—“Whenever any notice is by this Act required to be given to the Assessor it shall be sufficient if such notice shall be delivered to him or left or sent to him by post, postage paid, at his place of abode, or at his place for transacting his official business; and wherever by this Act any notice is required to be given to any other person, it shall be sufficient if such by the Acts of 1868 and 1884. The case of *M'Creath v. Smith*¹ relied on by the respondent fell to be reconsidered. It unduly relaxed the requirements of the statute. In any case it could not rule the present case, for (1) it was decided upon a construction of the County Voters Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 83), the words of which were not identical with the Act of 1856; and (2) the judgment, which was given in face of a strong dissent by Lord Benholme, was rested upon a fancied distinction between the requirements of the County Voters Act, 1861, as regarded a notice of an objection to the assessor, and a notice to the person objected to. (2) The notice of objection was disconform to Schedule No. 4 of the Act of 1856, as it omitted to state the qualification of the person objected to as appearing in the Assessor's list of voters.² (3) The Sheriff was entitled to append the names of the different persons in the same position as the appellant under sec. 22 of the Reform Act, 1868.*

No. 63.

Dec. 10, 1891.
Neilson v.
Robertson.

Argued for the respondent;—The case of M'Creath v. Smith was an authoritative judgment following upon a series of cases,³ and it ruled the present case. Although it was decided upon a construction of the County Voters Act of 1861, there was really no distinction between that statute and the present statute, and the principle to be applied in both was the same. So long as the letter was posted upon the 21st of September, properly addressed to the person objected to, the notice was timeous. It did not matter whether that person received it personally on the 21st, for the post-office fell to be regarded as his agent. (2) The notice was sufficiently stated to identify the entry, and in any case the Sheriff might have amended it under section 46 of the Act of 1856. (3) The appeal could not be competently used by other persons struck off the roll. The regulations of sec. 22 of the Act of 1868 were only applicable where the qualifications of different claimants were rested upon the same point.⁴

At the close of the opening speeches for the appellant and respondent Lord Adam said,—“ We are of opinion that the respondent's objection to the appending to the special case of the names of other persons than the appellant is well founded. Section 22 of the Act of 1868 applies only to the case of claimants, and questions affecting their qualifications. The present case relates to neither of these.”

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—In this case the Assessor placed the appellant's name on his list of voters, which I presume was published as required by statute. The respondent objected to the appellant being put upon the list of voters, and this notice be sent by the post, postage paid, addressed, with a sufficient direction, to the person to whom the same ought to be given, at his usual place of abode.”

¹ M'Creath v. Smith, Oct. 22, 1869, 8 Macph. 15, 42 Scot. Jur. 20.

² Muir v. Patterson, Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 293, 41 Scot. Jur. 175; Lamont v. Richardson, Nov. 12, 1879, 7 R. 32; Freeman v. Newman, 1883, L. R., 12 Q. B. D. 373.

* The Reform Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 48), sec. 22, enacts,—“ . . . And if it shall appear to the Sheriff that his judgments respecting the qualifications of any two or more persons depend on the same questions of law, he shall append to such special case the names of all such persons who have appealed against his judgment on their respective claims.”

³ Mackenzie v. Cameron, decided Oct. 26, 1868, reported Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 291, 41 Scot. Jur. 174; Rose v. Farquhar, decided Oct. 27, 1868, reported Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 286, 41 Scot. Jur. 171.

⁴ M'Gowan v. Mather, Nov. 15, 1879, 7 R. 46.

No. 63.

Dec. 10, 1891.
Neilson v.
Robertson.

objection the Sheriff sustained. But the appellant maintained as preliminary that the respondent's objection could not be heard nor given effect to upon these grounds, viz., (1) that the respondent was not a person who by statute had any title to object; (2) that the statutory notice of objection was not timeously given to the appellant; and (3) that the notice given to the assessor was defective, and not conform to the statutory requirements. The Sheriff repelled the appellant's preliminary objections, and on the appellant's request stated the present case.

The first of the appellant's preliminary objections was not insisted in. With regard to the third, I am of opinion that it is unsound, and was rightly repelled, because in my opinion the notice sent to the Assessor was substantially conform to the statutory requirement, and because the alleged defect was one which the Sheriff, if he had thought proper, could have amended under the 46th section of the Act of 1856. The appellant has suffered no prejudice from the alleged defect in the notice, which was certainly not of a character to mislead or deceive the Assessor. The only objection therefore which remains for consideration is the second. It was maintained for the respondent that the objection was unsound in principle, and that it had already been settled to be so by decision. This makes it necessary to consider the special circumstances out of which the objection has arisen, the statutory provisions regarding notices of the kind in question, and the decisions on the point to which we have been referred. It will be convenient, first, to state what the statutory provisions are which affect this question. By section 4 of the Act of 1856 (as amended by sec. 20 of the Act of 1868) it is provided that anyone objecting to the name of another being inserted on the list of voters "shall, on or before the 21st day of September in such year, give or cause to be given to the Assessor of such burgh a notice according to the form No. 4 of the said Schedule (A), or to the like effect, and shall also, on or before such 21st day of September, give or cause to be given to the person so objected to, or leave or cause to be left at his place of abode as described in such list, a notice according to the form No. 5 of the said Schedule (A), or to the like effect." By this clause therefore it is provided that notice (in a specified form) is to be given by the objector of an objection to a certain name being entered on the list of voters both to the Assessor and to the person whose name is objected to. The notice to the Assessor is to be given or caused to be given to him, while the notice to the person objected to is to be given or caused to be given to him, or left "or caused to be left at his place of abode" as described in such list.

I do not stop here to inquire what may be the precise effect of the difference in the mode or form of service of the notice—given or caused to be given to the Assessor, left or caused to be left at the residence of the person objected to. There may or may not be importance in this distinction, but it is not important here, for the question now before us relates, not to the mode in which the notice was served, but to the time when this was done. Now, as regards the time of giving notice, there is no distinction between the Assessor and the person objected to: the notice is to be served or given, one way or other, to both and each "on or before the 21st day of September." In the present case it is stated by the Sheriff that this was not done so far as the appellant is concerned. The case sets forth that the "notice of objection to the appellant was posted at Motherwell on 21st September 1891 about 11.30 P.M. after the last despatch for that day." Accordingly, a notice posted at Motherwell at 11.30 P.M. of the 21st September

"after the last despatch for that day" could not be given to the appellant or left at his residence in High Street, Shotts, on the 21st September. Apart therefore from decision it would appear to me that the statutory requirements as to notice had not been complied with. The notice which the statute says shall be given to a person in the position of the appellant, or left at his place of abode "as described in such list" on or before 21st September, could not reach him, and did not reach him until the 22d September. Delivery of the notice to the appellant, or leaving it at his residence on the 22d September, was no better than if it had been given or left on the 29th—that is, a week later; or on the 22d October—that is, a month later. It is not the notice required by statute if it is not given or left "on or before 21st September."

The remaining question is, has the view I have just expressed been overruled or determined otherwise by authority? We were referred to three cases, and I shall notice them shortly. The first is Mackenzie v. Cameron, decided on 26th October 1868, 7 Macph. 291, and the facts were shortly these,—The notice sent to the Assessor was posted by the objector at Dingwall, addressed to the Assessor at Inverness, in time for transmission to Inverness by the latest post on the 21st. It reached Inverness that night, as the postmark proved, but was not delivered to the Assessor till the morning of the 22d. The Sheriff in these circumstances held that the notice was duly sent, and all that is said further in the report is that "the Court affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff." I think that case can scarcely be regarded as an authority where no reason is given for the judgment of the Sheriff or its affirmance by the Court. The Registration Court of that day did not consider it authoritative, for the same question was again discussed and decided the following day, when one of the Judges dissented.

The second case, decided on 27th October 1868, was Rose v. Farquhar, 7 Macph. 286, and in it the facts were almost the same as in the preceding case. A claim was posted at Tain on the 21st September, addressed to the Assessor at Inverness, where it arrived "about half-past seven the same evening." There was no delivery of letters by letter-carriers after 4 P.M., "but persons could have letters by applying at the post-office up to 9 P.M." The claim was delivered to the Assessor on the morning of the 22d. That it was a claim to be registered, and not a notice of objection, does not in my judgment affect the point now under consideration, for by the 19th section of the Act of 1868 a claim is required to be delivered to the Assessor "on or before the 21st day of September in any year." It was objected in this case that the claim had not been timeously delivered. The Sheriff admitted the claim, and his judgment was affirmed by a majority of the Court, consisting of Lords Ardmillan and Manor, Lord Benholme dissenting. The grounds on which the majority of the Court proceeded were, that the claim had reached Inverness on the 21st September, and that the Assessor should have sent to the post-office for it. Lord Ardmillan said,—“The claimant has fulfilled his duty in placing the claim before the expiry of the time within reach of the Assessor. The post-office contained the letter, and was open and accessible. On this special ground I think we should affirm the Sheriff's judgment.” Lord Manor concurred. Lord Benholme, dissenting from the judgment, said,—“The specialty on which your Lordships are disposed to rest this case, that the Assessor was bound to send to the post-office in order to put himself in possession of any claims possibly lying there, does not commend itself to my judgment. I am not prepared to hold that there was any such duty incumbent on the Assessor. Apart from that alleged specialty the case could not be

No. 63.

Dec. 10, 1891.

Neilson v.
Robertson.

No. 63. maintained, and I am unable to regard that specialty as it is viewed by your Lordships."

Dec. 10, 1891.
Neilson v.
Robertson.

Now, I must say, with the greatest respect, that the specialty on which Lord Ardmillan proceeded in that case commends itself no more to my mind than it did to Lord Benholme's. The statute required a claimant to deliver his claim to the Assessor on or before the 21st September, and it was held that this was sufficiently fulfilled if the claimant delivered his claim at a place where the Assessor could have got it if he had asked for it—that is, had asked for a thing of the existence of which at the time he had no knowledge. I could not assent to that proposition. But taking the case as it stands, and assuming its authority for the moment, it does not appear to me to be of any avail to the respondent here. Assuming that the appellant had the power of foreseeing that an objection to his name being entered on list of voters was coming—an objection of which he had never previously heard—he could not have got the statutory notice of that objection at the post-office at Shotts at any hour on the 21st September even if he had applied for it. That notice had not then left Motherwell. It cannot be supposed that the learned Judges who decided the cases of Mackenzie and Rose would have decided as they did if it had appeared that the claims had not left the places at which they were posted before the 22d September. This, however, is not left to conjecture, for I find this very point decided by the same Court at (I suppose) the same sitting in a case not cited at the bar. The case is that of Bruce v. Rose, Dec. 19, 1868, reported on the same page with Rose v. Farquhar. There William Bruce claimed to be entered on the roll as a voter, and posted at Tain his claim addressed to the Assessor at Inverness on 21st September, about 10 P.M., the latest mail from Tain to Inverness leaving Tain at 5.25 A.M. The claim therefore did not leave Tain on the 21st, but was delivered to the Assessor at Inverness on the morning of the 22d. It was held, affirming the judgment of the Sheriff, that the claim not having been posted in time to reach the Assessor within the statutory period, had not been timeously transmitted. There was no inconsistency in these judgments. Rose v. Farquhar was decided on the specialty that the claim was put by the claimant "within reach of the Assessor" within the statutory period; it was not so in Bruce v. Rose. But the specialty in the former case does not exist here, while Bruce v. Rose is exactly the same as the present case, and is a direct authority in favour of the appellant's contention.

The third case cited by the respondent is that of McCreath, 8 Macph. 15, where it was held that a notice of objection was timeously given to the person objected to if posted on or before 4th September (the statutory period in that case), although it might not reach its destination until after that day. In that case Lord Benholme again dissented. Lord Ardmillan's judgment (with which Lord Ormidale agreed) proceeds entirely upon a distinction between the case of a claim to be registered and an objection to a claim. He says, referring to the previous decisions,—“We must assume, in considering this case, that notice of a claim sent to the Assessor by post is too late unless it be posted so that in the course of post it would reach the Assessor on the 4th of September. The case now before us has reference to notice of objection sent to a voter. If there be no distinction between the two cases, we must of course arrive at the same conclusion.” He then goes on to point out a distinction which he thinks may fairly be drawn between the two cases. The distinction he draws seems to be this,—that the statute confers on objectors the “right of searching for objections” to and including the specified day, and that to require that notice of objection should be given so as to reach the person objected to on that day would be practically to diminish the statutory time given to objectors by the number of days which the course of post may take to reach the voter, whereas in the case of notice to the Assessor, he being a person occupying a public position, with a known office or residence in the county, and near the place where the list lies, there can be no difficulty in giving him the notice "without encroaching upon the time allowed by statute for examining the lists." In view of this distinction, which I have given almost in Lord Ardmillan's own words, he reaches the conclusion that in the case of notices either of claim or objection sent to the Assessor, the notice must be one "which can reach him" on the day specified in the statute, while with regard to the notice sent to the person objected to, it is sufficient if it "be posted" on or before that day.

No. 63.

Dec. 10, 1891.

Nelson v.
Robertson.

Now, is this distinction one which is warranted by the statutory provision? I think not. In the first place, the statute, as I read it, does not allow an objector the whole time between the publication of the Assessor's list and the specified day for giving notice of objection as a period for searching for objections only. On the contrary, it provides that within that period the search must not only be made, but the objections resulting from the search, if any, must be intimated. If the search is to be continued up till the last moment of the day specified, how is the objection when discovered to be intimated (as the statute provides, and Lord Ardmillan thinks) to the Assessor on that day? If not posted so as to reach the Assessor on that day, it is not in time. But if the intimation can be made to the Assessor so as to reach him on that day, why not also to the voter objected to? Lord Ardmillan says because the voter may be at a distance. But the statute has provided for that. It does not require that the notice shall reach the hands of the voter objected to on that day, but shall be given or left at the voter's residence as described in the Assessor's list, and what that is comes to the objector's knowledge at the same time as he learns that it is proposed to put the name objected to on the list of voters, for the Assessor's list gives both the name and the address at the same time. The objector has no concern with the time when the notice of objection reaches the voter; the statute does not require the objector to find the voter objected to or his place of residence, but only to send notice to the place described in the Assessor's list, whether that is the voter's ordinary place of abode or not. In the second place, the statute makes no difference or distinction whatever between the Assessor and the voter objected to in so far as regards the time within which the notice of objection is to be given, delivered, or left. The words used are the same in reference to both,—the notice in each case is to be given "on or before" the specified day. I dissent therefore from the view that there is any such distinction as that on which the judgment of the majority of the Court in M'Creath's case proceeded. If the distinction fails, then, as Lord Ardmillan says, the same conclusion must be reached in the case of notice of objection sent to the voter as in the case of notice sent to the Assessor, and that conclusion is, that such notice will not be held to be timeously given unless it reaches the place to which it is addressed on or before the day specified by the statute.

The respondent maintained further that, on a fair construction of the 9th section of the Act, 1856, the posting of the notice of objection was fulfilment of the requirements of section 4. I cannot agree with him. The 9th section

No. 63.

Dec. 10, 1891.
Neilson v.
Robertson.

merely provides that where notice is required to be given, it shall be sufficient "if such notice be sent by the post," &c. This, however, is nothing more than saying that posting the notice shall be sufficient compliance with the direction to give, or deliver, or leave the notice. It does not extend the time within which that must be done. Accordingly, if the notice must be given, delivered, or left on or before a fixed day, it must, to fulfil the statutory requirement, reach the place to which it is addressed "on or before" that day, whatever mode is adopted of conveying or communicating the notice. "I wish," said Lord Ardmillan in Rose v. Farquhar, "to guard against being thought to indicate any opinion that the mere posting of a claim on the day mentioned in the statute is in all cases sufficient. I do not think it is."

Nor can I agree with the respondent's view that the postmaster is the agent of the Assessor or voter, to the effect of making delivery of the notice to him equivalent to the delivery of notice to the Assessor or voter himself. I can find no authority for such a view. But I do find an authority against it—indirect authority I admit—in the case of Childs v. Cox, 20 Q. B. D. 290.

For the reasons I have stated, I am of opinion that the question now raised has not hitherto been settled by authority, and dealing with that question as still an open one, I think the objection stated by the appellant to the notice of objection sent to him by the respondent was a good objection, and should have been sustained by the Sheriff. The notice was not given, delivered, or left for the appellant "on or before the 21st September"; it was not therefore the statutory notice, and not being so, the objection which it intimated should not have been heard or given effect to by the Sheriff.

On the point raised by the respondent as to the incompetency of using this case to settle a similar question raised in reference to other voters than the appellant, I agree with the respondent. That course is only allowed by the statute where the point decided affects a claimant's or voter's qualification.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Trayner, and substantially in the reasons for his judgment. Objection has been taken to the entry of the name of John Neilson on the list of voters. The objection, I understand, is admittedly good, and it is not disputed that Neilson's name ought not to be on the roll. But it is maintained that the objection cannot receive effect because it was not intimated to Neilson within the time allowed by the statute.

Neilson's place of abode is stated in the entry to be Shotts. The notice was posted at Motherwell on 21st September about 11.30 p.m. after the last despatch of the mail for that day. So that it could not, and did not, reach Neilson until the 22d.

The question depends on the 3d, 4th, and 9th sections of the Burgh Voters Act (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 58), as amended and made applicable to counties by subsequent statutes.

The third section has reference to claims, and requires the claimant to give notice to the Assessor on or before 21st September.

The fourth section has reference to objections, and provides that an objector shall, on or before the 21st September, give or cause to be given a notice to the Assessor, and shall also, on or before such 21st September, give or cause to be given a notice to the person objected to, or leave it or cause it to be left at the place of his abode as described in the list.

These sections provide for the forms of notice and the day on which they are to be given. As regards the time of notice, the provisions are the same in reference to notices of claims and objections; and also in reference to notices to the Assessor, and to the person objected to, I cannot find the smallest difference.

No. 63.

Dec. 10, 1891.
Neilson v.
Robertson.

The 9th section applies equally to all these notices, and provides for the manner in which they are to be given. It provides that it shall be sufficient if a notice to the Assessor be delivered to him or left or sent to him by post at his place of residence or at his office for transacting his official business, and that it shall be sufficient if a notice to any other person be sent by post, with a sufficient direction to the person to whom the same ought to be given, at his usual place of residence.

I thought that a question might possibly be raised whether, construing these clauses together, it was not possible to hold that delivery at the post-office was made equivalent to delivery to the person. Such a construction, if admissible, might be convenient, as it would avoid questions as to delay in delivery caused by weather or otherwise, and not provided for by section 14, which are not easily solved in accordance with a strict reading of the statute. But in whatever way the statutory provisions as to notices may be construed, they must, I think, be applied indifferently to notices of claims and of objections and to notices to the Assessor, and notices to the person objected to.

I cannot find that the view that delivery to the post-office is made equivalent to delivery to the person has ever been adopted. It is not so in England, where, however, the question is excluded by the express provision of the Statute 6 Vict. cap. 18, sec. 100.

It was negatived in the case of Bruce v. Rose, December 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 267, where it was decided that a notice of a claim to the Assessor in Inverness was not well given by posting it at Tain on 21st September after the last mail for Inverness had left.

In Rose v. Farquhar, it was decided by Lords Ardmillan and Manor, Lord Benholme dissenting, that a claim posted at Tain which reached Inverness on the 21st September after the latest delivery of letters, and was therefore not received by the Assessor until the 22d, was sent in sufficient time.

In Mackenzie v. Cameron, 7 Macph. 291, a judgment to the same effect was pronounced in regard to a notice to the Assessor of an objection. I am not able to reconcile these cases with Bruce v. Rose.

The objector relied chiefly on M'Creath v. Smith, October 22, 1869, 8 Macph. 15, where a notice of objection was held to be timeously given to the person objected to which was posted on the day fixed by the statute, although it did not and could not reach him until the day following.

These cases were decided on the construction of sections 9, 15, and 21 of the County Voters Act (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 83), and therefore the exact questions which they decided cannot occur again. On that account the case of M'Creath v. Smith is not technically in point. The words of the two statutes are not exactly the same. But it must be admitted that it is difficult to find any material distinction between them, and if the case of M'Creath had been decided on the ground that the statute made delivery at the post-office equivalent to delivery to the person, I should have been inclined to accept that construction of the statute, and to follow that decision. But the judgment is not rested on that view at all, but on a supposed distinction between the requirements of the County Voters Act regarding a notice of a claim or objection to

No. 63.

Dec. 10, 1891.
Neilson v.
Robertson.

the Assessor and a notice to the person objected to. I am certainly unable to find any ground for that distinction in the provisions of the County Voters Act, and I am satisfied that there is none in the provisions of the Burgh Voters Act, which is the statute applicable in the present case, and the statute which now regulates the service of notices. I think that we are bound to decide in accordance with what we conceive to be the sound construction of that Act, although we may be forced to question the reasons for a previous judgment in reference to the County Voters Act.

With regard to the other question, I concur with Lord Trayner.

LORD ADAM.—I concur with your Lordships except upon one point, and that is as to whether the notice of objection in this case was timeously posted. My opinion on that matter is that this very question was raised and decided in the case of M'Creath, and I do not see any reason why that decision should not be followed in this case. I therefore think that we ought to hold that notice was timeously given.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, reversed the finding of the Sheriff-substitute, and remitted to him to restore the name of the appellant to the roll.

R. J. GIBSON, S.S.C.—J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 64.

Dec. 10, 1891.
Stewart v.
Stewart.

MRS MARY ANGUS OR STEWART, Pursuer.—Rhind—A. S. D. Thomson.
MRS JEANIE PATERSON OR STEWART (Stewart's Executor), Defender.—Mackay.

Succession—Legacy—Special legacy—Right in security.—Held per Lord Kyllachy (Ordinary) that the legatee of a specific moveable subject must take it cum onere, and redeem it for himself if it has been pledged or assigned in security by the testator subsequent to the date of the bequest.

OUTER-HOUSE
Id. Kyllachy.

THE pursuer in this case was Mrs Stewart, the mother of the late John Stewart, a farmer in Aberdeenshire, and the defender was the deceased's widow and executrix. By a mutual disposition and settlement, executed by the deceased and his wife some years before his death, he left to his mother, the pursuer, the contents of a certain policy of assurance upon his life. By assignation, dated within a few months of his death, he assigned this policy to his bankers in security of an overdraft; and at the time of his death the sum due to the bank exceeded the value both of the said policy and of another policy to which the bank also held an assignation.

The pursuer in these circumstances sued the widow and executrix for the amount of the policy. She pleaded the provisions of the settlement, and further;—(4) The said assignation not in any way altering or affecting the provisions of the settlement, the pursuer is entitled to payment as concluded for.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The contents of both the said policies having been assigned by the deceased John Stewart junior to the Town and County Bank, and uplifted by the said bank in respect of the debt due to it by him, are not payable to the pursuer under the provisions of the said mutual disposition and settlement.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 10th December 1891, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the policy in question was, subsequent to the date of the truster's settlement, assigned by the testator to the Town and County Bank in security of an overdraft due by him to the said bank. Finds in these circumstances that the pursuer is not entitled to the contents of the said policy, except subject to the claims of the bank, and that the defender, as executrix of the deceased, is not bound to free the policy from these claims out of the general estate: Therefore assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns." * No. 64.

Dec. 10, 1891.
Stewart v.
Stewart.

The pursuer reclaimed, but the case was afterwards compromised.

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—MACKENZIE & KERMACK, W.S.—Agents.

MRS SARAH M'CLURE OR NELSON, Pursuer (Appellant).—A. J. Young— No. 65.
A. S. D. Thomson.

DISTRICT COMMITTEE OF THE COUNTY COUNCIL OF THE LOWER WARD OF LANARKSHIRE, Defenders (Respondents).—Jameson—Dundas.

Dec. 11, 1891.
Nelson v.
County
Council of Lower Ward
of Lanark.

Reparation—Road—Precautions for safety.—A road authority in charge of a suburban road had in winter weather collected heaps of road-scrappings, 2 feet long, 18 inches wide, and 8 inches high, at the side of the footway, where it ran in front of cottages. On the opposite side there was a footway but no houses. The heaps were allowed to remain several days before they were removed. A woman coming out of one of the cottages in a dark night, and proceeding to cross the road, tripped upon one of these heaps as she stepped from the footway on to the road, fell, and broke her arm. Held that, in the circumstances, the road authority were in fault, and therefore liable in damages.

THE Crow Road, leading from the Great Western Road to Partick, is one of the roads within the district of the District Committee of the County Council of the Lower Ward of Lanarkshire. ^{2D DIVISION.} Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

In the course of this road there are on the east side of it various rows

* "OPINION.—The pursuer claims that the widow and executrix shall pay the amount of the bank's debt, so as to free the policy, and make the same available to the pursuer. The defender, on the other hand, maintains that the legacy was deemed by the assignation; or otherwise that the policy must be held to have been bequeathed cum onere, and so to be ultimately, as well as primarily, liable for the charge upon it.

"Curiously enough the point of law which is thus raised is one upon which there is no direct authority in the law of Scotland,—at least none was cited, and I have found none.

"According to English law a specific legatee is entitled to have his legacy redeemed at the expense of the testator's general estate from charges created by the testator—Bothamley, L. R., 20 Eq. 304; Ashburner, 2 Brown's Chan. Reports, 113; Williams on Executors, 1332; and although the rule as regards bequests of real estate appears to be altered by the Act 17 and 18 Vict. cap. 113, I do not find that there has been any alteration by statute with regard to specific legacies of moveable subjects. As expressed by Lord Thurlow in the case of Ashburner, 2 Brown's Chancery Reports, p. 113,—'If a testator gives a cup which is in pawn, it is a full gift, and the executor must redeem.'

"The rule seems to be the same in the civil law. At all events it seems to have been so settled by the time of Justinian (Institutes, ii. 20, 12), when the various forms of bequest (per vindicationem, per damnationem, sinendi modo, per precceptionem) had been abolished.

"But it rather appears to me that on this matter the law of Scotland has not followed either the civil law or the English law. It certainly holds—contrary to the English rule—that when a particular landed estate is disposed to a particular disponee, the latter takes it subject to any debts by which it is burdened, or with which it may be burdened by the testator—Stair, iii. 5, 17; M'Laren on Wills, 2, 488. And, while this is not perhaps necessarily conclusive as between a specific legatee in moveables and an executor or residuary legatee, I am not able to see that there is any distinction in principle. In the absence of authority, I think the analogy applicable to burdens on heritable estate must be followed, and, therefore, I am on the whole of opinion that the pursuer's claim must be repelled."

No. 65.

Dec. 11, 1891.
Nelson v.
County
Council of Lower Ward
of Lanark.

of cottages, one of which is called Rose Cottages. There are pathways on both sides of the road, but there are no houses on the west side of the road immediately opposite Rose Cottages. At some distance to the north there are houses on that side of the road, one of which is a shop. On Monday and Tuesday in the second week of February 1890 the roadmen employed on the road, following their usual practice, had scraped the mud off the road and piled it on the east side of the road close to the footpath, in heaps about 2 feet long, 18 inches broad, and 8 inches high. There had been frost some days before, which had broken up on the Saturday, and in consequence there was a large quantity of mud on the road.

On the evening of Wednesday Mrs Nelson, a woman of fifty-one years of age, who lived in one of the Rose Cottages, left her house to go to the shop for medicine. In stepping off the pathway on to the road, she caught her foot on one of the heaps, fell, and broke her arm. At this time it was eight o'clock, and quite dark.

She raised an action of damages in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire against the District Committee, concluding for £250 of damages, pleading that she had been injured through the fault or negligence of the defenders.

The defenders stated,—“Explained that the pursuer was and ought to have been aware that a heap of road scrapings was or might be on the road at the place alleged, such heaps being customarily and necessarily left on the road when cleaning it, and that if an accident occurred through her falling over such a heap, it was owing to her negligence in failing to avoid it.”

The defenders pleaded;—(4) The injuries of the pursuer not having been due to fault on the part of the defenders, or those for whom they are responsible, and, separatim, the same having been caused, or materially contributed to, by the fault of the pursuer, the defenders should be assoilzied, with expenses.

At a proof the facts already narrated were proved. As regards general practice, the only evidence was that of Robert Drummond, a road surveyor for the county of Renfrew, who had for four years been surveyor of roads in the Calder district of Midlothian, and for three years before that again had served in the surveyor's head office in Edinburgh. He deposed,—“The usual mode of cleaning roads of that kind is to draw the mud to the side, and to put it in heaps at the side of the road, and then they are removed later on by carts. These mud heaps have, as a rule, to lie for two or three days, till they are ready for removal. . . . B the Court.—(Q.) Do you give any instructions to your workmen as to the side on which they are to put mud heaps? (A.) Their general instructions are to put it on the side which will less inconvenience the public. We leave them to their own discretion as to which side will not inconvenience the public.”

The Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray), on 12th February 1891, pronounced an interlocutor, in which, after findings in fact to the effect already narrated, he found in law,—“(1) That in the circumstances the defenders or those for whom they are responsible, were in fault in allowing an obstruction of the nature of the heap in question to remain in the position in which it was on the night in question unlighted and unguarded, and that this was the main cause of the accident: (2) That no contributory negligence has been proved.” He decerned for £30 of damages.

On 8th August 1891 the Sheriff-depute (Berry) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds that it is not proved that there was fault on the part of the defenders, or any of their servants, for which they can be held liable in damages: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusion of the petition, and decerns.”

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—Road trustees were liable for accidents of this kind caused by acts of negligence such as this, e.g., heaps of stones left on the roadway,¹ a stone left on the roadway,² a trestle left there,³ or a heap of rubbish.⁴ The obvious remedy was to send carts every afternoon or evening to remove what was collected during the day. But if it was necessary to make heaps here, they should have been made on the opposite side, where there were no houses. Persons using the road were entitled to expect that it would be in a proper state, hence there was no contributory negligence in the pursuer.

No. 65.

Dec. 11, 1891.
Nelson v.
County
Council of Lower Ward
of Lanark.

Argued for the defenders;—They had done nothing that was not necessary and usual,—nothing that was not familiar to everyone who walked along a country road. That being so, the case was altogether outside the authority of the cases cited, where the obstacles were unusual, and such as should not have been left on a road. If there was any negligence it was in the pursuer herself. To adopt the remedy suggested in argument for the pursuer would involve enormous expense to the ratepayers, to meet an imaginary danger. Heaps on the other side of the road would have presented just the same danger.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am not prepared to lay down any general rule for the conduct of road-scraping, or to say that the scrapings must be taken away from the side of the road immediately. But those whose duty it is to scrape the roads must act reasonably in view of the character of the particular road and of the season of the year. It is not desirable that a heap of stiff mud, which is getting harder day by day, should be left in front of a row of cottages larger than is necessary. If there are such heaps made in front of houses, they should not be so large as to tend to throw down a person coming out of one of the houses on to the road after dark.

As regards the particular case on hand, I think it would have been much safer to have had the heaps at this place on the other side of the road; and the road authorities have made it plain that there is nothing to prevent that being done, by the fact that, since the accident, they have put them on that other side.

In these circumstances, I think that there was fault on the part of the defenders, and that the pursuer is therefore entitled to recover damages from them for her injuries. The Sheriff-substitute allowed £30, and this seems to be a reasonable sum in the circumstances.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I concur, but simply on the ground that, in the way in which this case is presented to us, I think the defenders were in fault.

LORD TRAYNER was absent.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-depute, repeated the findings in fact of the Sheriff-substitute, and of new decreed for £30.

ROBERT JOHN CALVER, S.S.C.—MACKENZIE & BLACK, W.S.—Agents.

¹ Findlater v. Duncan, July 18, 1837, 15 S. 1304, June 19, 1838, 16 S. 1150, 10 Scot. Jur. 507, H. L. 1839, M'L. and Rob. 911, 12 Scot. Jur. 135.

² Dargie v. Magistrates of Forfar, March 10, 1855, 17 D. 730, 27 Scot. Jur. 311.

³ Virtue v. Commissioners of Police of Alloa, Dec. 12, 1873, 1 R. 285.

⁴ Stephen v. Police Commissioners of Thurso, March 3, 1876, 3 R. 535.

No. 66.

SIR CHARLES H. A. F. L. ROSS, Pursuer (Respondent).—

*Sol.-Gen. Murray—Pitman.*Dec. 11, 1891.
Ross v. Powrie
& Pitcaithley.

POWRIE & PITCAITHLEY AND ANOTHER, Defendants (Appellants).—

G. R. Gillespie—Dundas—Fleming.River—Tidal and navigable—Foreshore—Obstruction in alveo—Fishings.—

The proprietor of the lands of S had a Crown grant of the salmon-fishings ex adverso of his lands in a tidal navigable river, the banks of which at ebb tide consisted of low mud flats, covered at every tide. The tenant of the fishings erected, with the sanction of the proprietor, a platform, based on shingle and piles, to facilitate his fishing. The foundations of the platform were in part, at least, in the alveus of the river.

In an action brought by the proprietor of lands and fishings on the other side of the river for removal of the platform, it was proved that a substantial part of the erection was in alveo, and that it was injurious to the pursuer's fishings. Held that the pursuer was entitled to have the whole erection removed.

Opinion (per the Lord Justice-Clerk) that a riparian proprietor upon a private or tidal river is entitled to prevent an opposite proprietor from making any alteration in alveo, or where an alteration has been made to insist on restoration without proving that the operation has caused or must cause damage to his side of the river.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Ross and Sutherland.

SIR CHARLES H. A. F. L. ROSS was heir of entail in possession of the lands and barony of Balnagown, including the lands of Bonar and the salmon-fishings "in the Kyle of Sutherland ex adverso of said lands. The lands of Bonar are situated on the right shore of the Kyle of Sutherland, below the point where it is entered by the River Carron, and extend for a considerable distance along the said shore ex adverso of the lands pertaining to Mr G. A. Jamieson, C.A., as trustee on the estate of Evan Charles Sutherland, of Skibo." The salmon-fishings on the left bank, belonging to Skibo, were let to Messrs Powrie & Pitcaithley, salmon-fishers.

The Kyle of Sutherland is the estuary of the River Carron, and is navigated by small vessels. At low tide the river finds its way to the sea by a channel about 150 feet wide, bounded by low banks of mud sand, and shingle, which are covered by the rising tide, and constitute the foreshore of the Kyle. On the south or Bonar side the bank of this channel was nearly continuous, but on the north or Skibo side the mud banks were much broken into by water channels, in which there was water at all states of the tide. The banks on the north side and the channels running through them were not of a constant shape or size, but varied in the course of years as the river or the tide deposited shingle or sand about them, or cut new passages for itself.

At the edge of the river channel, as that existed at low-water, and on the north side of it, the tenants of the Skibo fishings in May 1890 constructed a platform, that they might be able to draw their nets longer than they could otherwise have done as the tide rose. The platform was placed upon a line of piles about 150 feet long and about 2 feet in height. The piles were originally fastened together by boards, but these were subsequently removed. There was also some shingle or gravel shovelled up at the foot of the piles to support them. The direction of this line of piles was parallel to the flow of the water in the river channel.

The River Carron from Bonar Bridge, where it enters the Kyle, downwards flows from north to south, but at a point immediately above the point where the foregoing operation was executed it turns eastward, and flows into the sea in that direction. The lands of Skibo to the north were thus on the inside of the angle of the course of the river. On the Bonar side the river had, after 1876, been fenced in for some distance immediately above the erection by an embankment or breakwater to retain it in the channel above described. No. 66.

As soon as Sir Charles Ross became aware of the operations above described he raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Dornoch against Messrs Powrie & Pitcaithley and Mr Jamieson to have them interdicted "from encroaching on the alveus of the Kyle of Sutherland, and driving in piles, laying down stones, shingle, gravel, or sand or other material, erecting or extending embankments in the same, or along or in the channel of the Kyle of Sutherland, and narrowing and altering the same, or diverting the stream thereof ex adverso of the lands and estate of Skibo aforesaid, and of the pursuer's lands and estates of Bonar and Balnagown, in the parish of Kincardine and county of Ross and Cromarty, . . . and from artificially elevating the alveus and obstructing, narrowing, or deviating the stream of the Kyle at or near said part thereof." The petition prayed also for removal of what had been erected.

Dec. 11, 1891.
Ross v. Powrie
& Pitcaithley.

The pursuer averred that the works constructed by Powrie & Pitcaithley, "form an obstruction in the alveus of the Kyle. They have shut up the stream in parts which were open beyond the memory of man, narrowed the main channel, and diverted the flow and weight of the stream so as to bear unequally upon the south side, and are certain to cause great damage to pursuer's said fishing banks, both above and below the spot in question." This averment was denied by the respondents.

There were also averments to the effect that these works obstructed navigation and the passage of salmon.

Neither party alleged any title to the foreshores.

The pursuer pleaded;—(3) The defenders, in making the encroachments and raising such obstructions, have acted illegally, and are bound to restore the river to its former course, and to restore the alveus to its natural condition, and failing their doing so, the Court should grant warrant for the purpose as craved.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The averments of the pursuer, so far as material, being unfounded in fact, the interim interdict ought to be recalled, and the prayer of the petition otherwise refused. (2) The structure or erection complained of being in itself a legal erection, and being no obstruction or impediment to the passage of salmon or navigation, the interim interdict ought to be recalled, and the defenders assoilized, with expenses.

After various procedure a proof was led in May 1891. It was chiefly directed to the questions whether certain narrow water channels which pierced and passed through the Bonar mudbanks at a point immediately opposite the erection had or had not been caused, or aggravated by that erection. The pursuer's evidence went to shew that the water as the tide fell found its way over or round the isolated banks on the Skibo side, and that this tendency had been checked by the erection, with the result that the river, held in on the north, had burst its banks on the south and caused, or at least increased the channels complained of, which would, if they went on increasing, divert the stream from valuable salmon shots belonging to the pursuer further seaward. It was, further, one of the points made by the pursuer's witnesses that the piles were, to a large part of their extent, within the alveus of the river.

The defenders endeavoured to shew that the erection, if in the alveus at all, was so to a trifling extent only. They also directed their proof to shew that the channels complained of were not the result of the erection, but were only a new manifestation of a tendency which the river had always shewed to change its course. In proof of this they shewed that Sir Charles had found it necessary in 1876 to bank up part of his side,

No. 66. and they contended that his remedy now was to continue that embankment. They also adduced evidence to shew that the channels complained of had not increased in the course of the year during which the erection had existed.

Dec. 11, 1891.
Ross v. Powrie
& Pitcaithley.

It was proved that the main current of the stream as it passed the erection ran at the rate of $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles an hour, but that close by and for a distance of four or five feet outside the erection, the current was, comparatively speaking, inappreciable, being only at the rate of about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles.

The evidence is fully referred to in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk.

On 16th June 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (T. Mackenzie) pronounced this interlocutor, viz. :—" Finds that said erection is on ground below low-water mark, is an encroachment on the bed or alveus of the river (which is a tidal one, with varying currents and levels), and is situated ex adverso of the property of the pursuer on the south bank of the river : Finds that the effect of said erection has been to heighten the north bank, and thus to prevent and obstruct a considerable natural flow of water over the same to the north, and to throw the weight of water on to the south bank, with the result that a new channel of the river is being formed, or is in imminent danger of being formed, through the said south bank : Finds that the pursuer's rights of property there have thus been, or are in course of being, injuriously affected, and that he is in consequence entitled to have the defenders interdicted from proceeding farther with or completing the said embankment, and to have the same removed : Therefore continues the interdict already granted, and declares the same to be perpetual : Finds farther that the said embankment so far as begun and completed is illegal and injurious to the rights of the pursuer, as proprietor foresaid, and must be removed : Therefore ordains the defenders within ten days from this date to remove the same," &c.

The defenders appealed, and argued ;—(1) On the facts, the erection was in suo, and was innocue utilitatis. It could not cause the channels complained of, which were directly opposite, for with a current flowing so fast as this, if it impinged at all upon the erection it must be driven back upon the southern shore at a point much lower down ; besides there was interposed between the true current of the stream and the erection a strata or cushion of water which was quite quiet, shewing that, as a matter of fact, the current did not strike against it. The erection was in suo, for the proprietor was grantee of the Crown in the salmon-fishings, and had therefore from the Crown a grant of all rights in the foreshore or alveus necessary to facilitate these fishings, unless the exercise of navigation was thereby impeded,¹ which it was not. (2) On the law of the case, the doctrine of *Bicket v. Morris*² had been a good deal qualified by the late decision of the House of Lords in Colquhoun's case,³ as Lord Trayner had pointed out in a recent judgment.⁴ The question now was very much a question of circumstances whether damage had actually been caused or not. These cases had, at all events, settled this, that while a proprietor might complain of any encroachment on his property by diversion of stream by his opposite neighbour, and would succeed, even without proof of serious damage, because his property had been invaded against his wi-

¹ Per Lord Deas, at p. 527 of Mather, &c., v. Macbraire, &c., March 1873, 11 Macph. 522, 45 Scot. Jur. 337.

² May 20, 1864, 2 Macph. 1082, 36 Scot. Jur. 529, aff. July 13, 1866, Macph. (H. L.) 44, 38 Scot. Jur. 547.

³ Jan. 26, 1877, 4 R. 348, rev. July 30, 1877, ibid. (H. L.) 116.

⁴ McGavin v. McIntyre Brothers, May 30, 1890, 17 R. at p. 824.

a person standing up to vindicate a subordinate right, such as a right of passage (Colquhoun's case), or a right of salmon-fishing without property in the stream (the present case), must shew substantial damage to that right, which had not been done here. The cases subsequent to Colquhoun's & Pitcaithley.
 Dec. 11, 1891.
Ross v. Powrie

case were cases of proprietors ex adverso of one another.¹

The complainer argued;—On the facts, the channels were caused, or at least aggravated, by the erection complained of. The stream undoubtedly had a tendency to cut its way straight south to the sea, and for that very reason a slight obstruction to its easterly course would be all the more serious. It was not suggested that the channels were made by a direct diversion of the stream from one side to the other; the suggestion rather was that the bursting of the southern bank was the result of compression in a channel which had become artificially compressed. The evidence shewed that, but for the erection, the water would find its way northward over the Skibo banks. Again, the erection was almost altogether, at all events to a substantial extent, in alveo of the river. In no event was it in suo of the respondents, for they were not in right of the proprietor of the foreshore, i.e., the Crown. If so, then (2) as a matter of law, the rule of Bicket v. Morris applied, a rule which cases subsequent even to the case of Colquhoun,¹ shewed to be still the rule of the law of Scotland. Nor was there any reason for a difference because the alveus was the property of the Crown; indeed, that being so, the defenders were in all the worse position, for they were not operating in suo. The suggestion that because of the fact that the complainer had not a right of property, but only a right of fishing, the law was different, was negatived by the Duke of Roxburghe's case. The Duke had, on the part of the water in dispute there, which was beyond the medium filum, a mere right of fishing. Again, the respondents said that the erection, if on the bank, was in suo, the bank being theirs as part and pertinent of their grant of fishings; but the complainer must be allowed to put his right to his bank on the same footing, and then the attempted distinction was gone. A proprietor was entitled munire ripam as the complainer had done here, but not so to do it as to throw an unfair burden on his opposite neighbour.²

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer in this case is the proprietor of the salmon-fisheries on the south bank of the Kyle in Ross-shire; the river is a tidal river at the point in question. The action is against the tenants of the salmon-fishery on the opposite side of the river, and is raised for the purpose of interdicting them from placing obstructions in the alveus, and having them ordained to remove an obstruction they have already placed there, which, it is alleged, has or will have the effect of throwing more pressure of water against the complainer's bank, and so injuring his fishings. On the pursuer's side the bank, as it at present subsists, practically holds in the water in the channel at all times of the tide with certain small exceptions, to which I shall afterwards allude. On the defenders' side the case is different. As the tide falls, a number of low shore flats divided by channels more or less at an angle to the general direction of the stream are exposed on that side. The stream then practically flows between parallel banks, its width at and near the place in question being, roughly speaking, about 150 feet wide, and only a small quantity of ¹ Foote v. Robertson, July 16, 1879, 6 R. 1290; Duke of Roxburghe v. Waldie's Trustees, Feb. 18, 1879, 6 R. 663.

² Menzies v. Earl of Breadalbane, July 4, 1826, 4 S. 783 (N. E. 791), rev. July 4, 1828, 3 W. and S. 235.

No. 66. water flowing by the channels between the shore flats on the north. In this
 Dec. 11, 1891. channel the stream flows at that part of the channel where the bulk of the water
 Ross v. Powrie is with very great rapidity, the evidence putting it at more than nine miles an & Pitcaithley. hour. This stream flows in a curve from right to left, and therefore its pressure is against the south bank. The water has a tendency opposite the point at which the respondent's operations complained of were executed to make its way through the bank southwards in small streams, tending to cut off a peninsula which is formed by the river and the Firth of Dornoch beyond, and to convert the peninsula into an island, thereby of course diminishing the flow of water round the north side of the peninsula.

These were the circumstances of the case before the operations of the respondents, which are now complained of. The objections consisted in driving a series of piles into the ground for about 150 feet, and placing a platform on them to aid the fishermen in working their nets at certain states of the tide. At the bottom the piles are banked up to a certain height with shingle.
 At first boards were fastened along them, but these were afterwards removed.
 The line of the piles is practically parallel to the opposite, or complainer's bank.
 The piles are partly driven into one of the shore flats, and partly into the alveus covered with water at low water, even when the river is in summer flow. The whole erection is covered when the tide rises, and a substantial part of it is under water at low tide, when the river is sending down more water than it does in the driest part of the year.

The pursuer's case is that this erection is absolutely illegal, in so far as it is in the alveus, and that it is open to challenge, because it has the effect, or may have the effect, of compressing the stream, by preventing the free spread of the water to the northward, and thus does or may cause erosion on the south bank, with the effect that the water will break out more and more across the neck of the peninsula, and thus deprive the complainers of the flow of the river past the peninsula as they now enjoy it, and so injure their fishery at the mouth of the estuary.

The respondents on the other hand maintain, that the erection is not truly to any extent in alveo, that in any case it is plainly innocue utilitatis, and that the complainers have no ground for objecting to its being left where it is. I have considered this case with anxious care, the interests involved being so serious, and the possible results of any judgment to be pronounced upon fisheries in similar estuaries being so important. I have come to the conclusion that the Court ought not to interfere with the judgment given by the Sheriff-substitute. It appears to me that the evidence adduced for the complainer proves satisfactorily that the erection made by the respondents does interfere with the natural flow of the water. This is shewn by the fact that the water flows through the respondents' banked-up shingle and piles in a northerly direction when the tide is out and there is no flood water in the river. That is therefore plainly a natural direction for the water to take, even at the ebb of the tide,—I mean the water which comes down the river proper as distinguished from tidal water.

This point seems to me so important that I think it necessary to refer to the evidence. Mr Stevenson, the engineer, states that he examined the defenders' erection at "low tide" and when, "there was no fresh in the water." At that time he says, that "60 feet of this obstruction at its lower or eastern end, was in the water, and therefore in the alveus of the stream. There was water flowing through the shingle bed at the west end of the piling." He also says, that such an erection "would have the tendency to collect gravel at and around it." He also expresses his opinion that at the part of the erection, where the piles are not in water at low tide, the alveus has been "artificially raised." This means that part at least of the embankment put up round the piles by the defenders is placed in the alveus of the stream. Mr Black also examined the erection at low water. He says that at low water "there was water flowing between the piling at the east end, and percolating through the shingle along the whole land to an extent which convinced me that if said obstruction or embankment were removed there would be a clear flow of water northwards over the side of the present embankment and obstruction." He also says, that it tends "to accumulate deposits." He estimates that the shingle at the piles is from ten inches to a foot "above the natural unfixed shingle of the bed of the river," and that he is "convinced that the ground into which the piling was driven was on a level with low-water mark." James Bethune, a pilot, states that there is now "shingle along the line of them, where formerly no shingle used to be. Before these piles and shingle were put there the water had a free run northwards." The pilot Munro says, that at low water "there was about five inches of water along the front of the piles. Once the bank gets dry, the river water runs against the piles, and if they were not there it would run towards the Skibo side." William Bethune proves that when a net is shot at the place in question, it swings "round to the left bank near where the middle of the present obstruction now is." He also says, "At low water the whole of the piling of the defenders' obstruction appeared above water. At this time I could not see the base in which the piles were fixed, as it was below water. The piles were driven into the ground and banked up with stones. . . . The bank where the piling now is was never dry during the time I fished for Mr Marshall." That was in 1887. Peter Scott says the piles are driven within low-water mark; "my reason for believing this is that I saw the water run about the posts and over the gravel. When the nets are drawn there, they are drawn in the water and not on dry land. Before the piling was put up the water ran over the place towards the Skibo side, and it still does so at the bottom end of the piling where the boarding has been taken off." It is right to say that in cross-examination this witness says that six only of the piles were driven into ground which was "not dry at low water." Mr Manners, an engineer, says that "along the line of this row of piles there is a bank of shingle, evidently artificial. . . . At the lower end of this obstruction I noticed that the water flows over the top of this artificial shingle bank, and that for the remainder of its length the water percolates through the bank towards the Skibo side. . . . The artificial bank about the base of the piles obstructs the natural flow of the water towards the Skibo side." In cross-examination he says, "From my examination of the piling I concluded that if the artificial embankment were away the piling would all have been into ground below low-water mark."

The evidence for the defence upon this matter is of course not so strong, and is indeed in some respects contradictory of the complainer's evidence. It tends to prove that at the upper end of the defenders' erection there is dry ground, when the river is low, between it and the water. But it appears to me that, when the evidence is sifted, the true result is that the defenders' banking up of the piles with shingle is truly the cause of there being uncovered ground to the south of the piles at low water. Thus John Powrie admits that "water from the main stream trickles through the embankment on to the Skibo side." George Main

No. 66. admits that "if the embankment were removed from the ground on which it is built, a very little of that ground would be above low-water level. Were the embankment and piling removed, the water from the river would then flow towards the Skibo side." Then Mr Westland, the engineer, proves that the bottom of the respondents' erection is two feet lower than the opposite bank. He also found that at low water only one half of the defenders' erection was uncovered. Mr Gordon, the engineer, found the water at low tide about a foot up the piles at the lower end, and this witness expresses his belief that a quantity of shingle had not been deposited on the ground at the place, while there is no doubt that there was. This witness also admits that, if the banks on the Skibo side are raised by artificial means "the stream would not get relief, and if such relief were stopped the tendency of the stream would be to break over the Balnagown bank." Mr Young, the engineer, when the water was very low, found six of the piles, where they shew above the shingle under water, and he says that "assuming that the river gets lower in summer, then these piles would be above low-water mark." It is to be noted that it was in March when Mr Westland and Mr Young were at the place. Mr Calder says that some of the piles are in the water at low tide and that he "saw water trickling through the shingle bank, but I cannot be sure if it was low tide."

Now, that body of evidence convinces me that the whole, or a very substantial part of the respondents' erection is in the alveus of the stream. It is true that some of the witnesses for the respondents say that the defenders' erection is altogether above low-water mark, but their evidence cannot in my judgment overcome the great body of evidence to which I have referred. It is remarkable that the workmen who actually drove the piles and banked them up with shingle are not called as witnesses. It is not conceivable that if they, when they drove the piles, drove them into ground above the water at ebb tide, they should not have been put in the box to prove that fact. They must have known best, as they dealt with the ground as it was before any piles or shingle were placed there.

I have therefore come to the conclusion that it is proved that the respondents' erection is, to a substantial extent, indeed in my opinion practically to its whole extent, an encroachment on the alveus of the river. It seems to me, that, if that be so, then the embankment and piles must be to a greater or less degree an obstruction to the natural course of the water at that point. But if the water is obstructed, then the tendency must be, to some extent at least, to compress the flow of the water in the channel between the respondents' erection and the complainant's bank. In so far as there is increased difficulty presented to the water in going in the direction in which it naturally inclines to go at the place where the respondents have made their erection, in that degree must the water exercise more force elsewhere.

Now, the pursuer says that the practical effect is that the quantity of water which finds its way out to the southward opposite the respondents' erection is greater than the quantity which passed out there in the period before it was placed there. They produce a considerable body of evidence to prove this, and there is no counter evidence. They prove that while formerly the streams breaking out there were not more than an inch or two in depth, they are now as much as eleven inches in depth. This can only be the result either of the erosion of the bank by increased pressure, or by the level of the water being forced up by the diminution of the freedom of escape for the water in a northerly direction at the opposite side.

Dec. 11, 1891.
 Ross v. Powrie
 & Pitcaithley.

Such being my view of the facts of the case, it only remains to consider what is the law applicable to them. I take it to be settled law that no proprietor is entitled to place any obstruction upon the alveus of a stream, even although the stream is not tidal and he has the right of property in the solum up to the medium filum. The case of a tidal stream is a fortiori of an ordinary stream. The rights of the riparian proprietor are more limited, as he cannot have a right of property in the solum. He may obtain right to foreshore by grant from the Crown, but he cannot obtain a grant beyond low-water mark. The solum of the alveus is in the Crown, as one of the regalia majora, for public uses, and cannot be alienated. The law as regards the alveus of a river was very fully gone into in the case of Bicket v. Morris, and fully justifies, in my judgment, the statement that a riparian proprietor cannot by himself and his tenants maintain a right to alter the alveus of a river. Of course there are many unimportant things done by proprietors and tenants which are technically interferences with the alveus, such as driving in a stake or two to project the end of a fence, and prevent stock passing out of a field, or the like. These no one objects to, and they would probably not be held ground for an interdict if challenged, on the principle "de minimis non curat pretor." But wherever there is any definite alteration of the condition of matters as regards the alveus, the law is that an opposite proprietor may insist on stopping what is being done, and having matters restored. The only exception which has been made to this is the case of those having right to salmon-fisheries, who are held entitled to maintain their fisheries in the condition in which they have been occupied. For example, if heavy boulders are swept down in flood on to a salmon shot, these may be removed on the ground that they interfere with the use and prevent the beneficial use of a right of franchise in salmon-fishing. That was decided in the case of Macbraire. It was held to be no interference with the rights of an opposite proprietor, although it was truly an interference with the alveus, which could injure the complainer, being only a maintenance of the status quo, and only done to prevent destruction of a valuable right. But that case went only to a right of preservation and restoration, it had no bearing upon the question whether an opus manufactum, a new erection, may be placed in the stream. The law appears to me to be distinctly settled on that question, to the effect that, if the alveus is altered by the act of the opposite proprietor, or those in his right, the other proprietor can first stop his proceedings, and second insist upon restoration, and this without the complainer being required to prove that the operation has caused, or must cause, damage on his side of the river. Such was the law laid down in Bicket v. Morris, and it is well expressed in Lord Benholme's judgment, which is approved by the House of Lords "as being perfectly sound in principle," when he says,—“Without my consent you are not to put up your building in the channel of the river, for that in some degree must affect the natural flow of the water. What may be the result no human being with certainty knows, but it is my right to prevent your doing it, and when you do it, you do me an injury, whether I qualify damage or not.”

Lord Cranworth expresses this in other words, viz:—“The owners of the land on the banks are not bound to obtain or to be guided by the opinions of engineers or other scientific persons as to what is likely to be the consequence of any obstruction set up in water in which they have a common interest. There is in that case, and in all such cases there must ever be, a conflict of evidence as to the probable result of what is done. The law does not enforce upon riparian proprietors the duty of scanning the accuracy or appreciating the weight of such

No. 66. testimony. They are allowed to say: 'We have a common interest in the unobstructed flow of the water, and we forbid any interference with it.' This
 Dec. 11, 1891. is a plain, intelligible rule, easily understood and easily followed, from which I Ross v. Powrie & Pitcaithley. think your Lordships should not allow any departure."

Applying these views to the present case, I think your Lordships can have no hesitation in holding that this erection, if to any substantial extent in alveo, may be objected to by the complainer, on the footing that it may cause changes in the flow of the stream, which may cause injury to his property, and, if so, that its removal must be ordered.

One question remains. This erection it is said is, if in alveo at all, not altogether in alveo. My own view upon the evidence is that it is substantially all in alveo. I am inclined to hold that, where a substantial part of such an erection is certainly in alveo, even when a river is at its very lowest, it is not proper to deal with the matter by attempting to define the exact line of low water of the river. The line of low water of a river at the extreme time of drought is not truly the line of low water. The true line is that at which the flow will run in the dry season of an ordinary year. But if that be the sound view, as I think it is, then I have no doubt that practically the whole of this erection has its base within low-water mark. I therefore hold that it is all liable to be removed. But even were it otherwise, it is beyond doubt that a substantial part of the erection is below the line. If this is so, then it is certain that it is only a question of inches as regards the whole erection being in the water flow. And as it undoubtedly checks the flow of water towards the Skibo side, it is an erection which, if it tends to injure the interests of the opposite proprietor, cannot be allowed to remain. This is, I think, the logical result of the case of Menzies v. Breadalbane. A proprietor may protect his bank, but not in such a way as to cure his own injury by injuring his opposite neighbour. If then the respondents' erection tends to injure the complainer's property, as on the evidence I hold it does, I am of opinion that, although part of the erection be slightly above the low-water mark in part of its length, yet still the whole erection is open to the complaint made against it.

I may say further, that, even if the law were not as I have stated as regards erections on the bank, I should still be inclined to hold that the whole erection should be ordered to be removed. It is a unum quid, and even upon the respondents' own shewing it is to a substantial extent in the alveus, the rest of it being on a shore-flat close to the line, and tending, as the evidence shews, to collect sand and gravel on the ground below low-water mark, immediately in front of it.

But I feel bound to say that my own opinion is that the complainer has proved the erection to be in alveo, and that therefore it is in its entirety illegal.

I therefore move your Lordships to find substantially in terms of the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD YOUNG.—This case is difficult and doubtful, and it is so with respect to every point which arises in it. But on the whole matter, and after giving my best attention to the very able argument we have heard, I am not satisfied that there are satisfactory grounds on which to set aside the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think the complainer is entitled to prevail. I proceed on the ground that it is sufficiently established by the evidence that the works constructed by the respondents are injurious to the complainer's salmon-fishings. No. 66.

Dec. 11, 1891.
Ross v. Powrie
& Pitcaithley.

LORD TRAYNER.—The pursuer in this case complains that the defenders have recently erected an embankment in the Kyle of Sutherland, and in the river which flows through it, which injures the pursuer's fishings ex adverso thereof, or which, at the least, threatens to injure these fishings very seriously. The defenders admit that they have erected the embankment complained of, but justify their action on the grounds (1) that their embankment is erected in suo, and (2) that it is innocue utilitatis. Looking to the fact that the embankment is a novum opus, confessedly for the purpose of improving the defenders' fishings, and not for the purpose of fortifying their bank, it seems to me that it lies upon the defenders to shew that they are entitled to do what is now complained of.

On a careful consideration of the proof, I am satisfied that they have failed to do so.

In the first place, I think the defenders have failed to shew that the erection complained of is in suo. Some witnesses give evidence to the effect that the embankment is altogether in alveo of the river; others describe it as to a considerable extent in alveo of the river, and as to the remainder on the alveus or foreshore of the Kyle; others again say that the embankment is erected on ground that is dry at low water. Whichever of these views be correct, the embankment cannot be said to be erected in suo of the defenders or their landlord. The alveus of the river (it being tidal and navigable) is vested in the Crown, and the foreshore of the Kyle is vested in the Crown also—at least, I must so presume in the absence of any averment that the proprietor of Skibo has any proprietary right therein. Now, if the embankment is entirely within the alveus of the river, and injures or threatens to injure the rights of the pursuer, it is quite clear that it is illegal and must be removed. If, on the other hand, it is erected partly on the alveus of the river, and partly on the foreshore of the Kyle, I think that the same result follows. I regard the embankment as a unum quid, and if part of it is illegal I think the entire removal must be ordered. I do not think that the pursuer is required to shew that every yard of the embankment is an illegal encroachment on his right in order to obtain the remedy he here seeks. It being clear that part—a substantial part—of the embankment is undoubtedly illegal, it follows, in my opinion, that the embankment must be removed.

Again, if the embankment is entirely on the foreshore, that is, above low-water mark, I think the pursuer is still entitled to insist on its removal, because it affects the ordinary flow of the water, both in the Kyle and in the river, to his prejudice, and may, if allowed to remain, prejudice his rights more than it has yet done. This view is, I think, in accordance with the principle of the decision in Morris v. Bicket, and in the earlier case of Menzies v. Earl of Breadalbane's Trustees. In expressing myself as I have done, I am not to be taken as entertaining any opinion against the view that the preponderance of the evidence is to the effect that the whole embankment is erected in alveo.

In the second place, I think it is not established that the embankment is innocue utilitatis. On the contrary I think it is established, and established beyond doubt, that the embankment now does injury to the pursuer's rights, and will do serious injury to those rights if allowed to remain where it is. It may not be proved—I do not think it is proved—that the embankment has caused the channels, shewn on the plan produced, running from A and C to B, but it is

No. 66. distinctly proved that, since the erection of the embankment, these channels have increased both in width and depth, and that such increase has been caused by the embankment. The pursuer's apprehension that the whole body of the river might or would be diverted to these channels within a comparatively short time is, in my view, by no means imaginary or fanciful. I think the pursuer has good ground for apprehending such an event if the embankment remains where it is. If such an event happened, it would cut off the pursuer's fishing at the Black Scalps altogether, an injury to his rights which he certainly has both title and interest to prevent.

I do not go further into the details of the case, as your Lordship in the chair has already done so fully. I am of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to prevail, and that the judgment appealed against should be affirmed.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact in terms of the findings in fact in the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 16th June 1891: Of new ordain the defenders, on or before the 20th day of January 1892, to remove the embankment complained of, and remit," &c.

J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—Agents.

No. 67. MITCHELL & BAXTER AND ANOTHER, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—
Guthrie Smith—C. K. Mackenzie.
 Dec. 12, 1891. HARRY CHEYNE (Curator Bonis to A B), Defender (Respondent).—
Johnston.
 Mitchell & Baxter v. Cheyne. THE BANK OF SCOTLAND, Defender (Respondent).—Pitman.
 HARRY CHEYNE (Curator Bonis to A B), Petitioner.—Johnston.
 MITCHELL & BAXTER AND ANOTHER, Respondents.—Guthrie Smith—C. K. Mackenzie.

Judicial Factor—Curator Bonis—Bank cheque granted by incapax.—Held (1) that an incapax to whom a curator bonis had been appointed was not entitled to grant a cheque in payment of expenses incurred to his law-agent in opposing the petition; and (2) that a reclaiming note against the interlocutor making the appointment had not the effect of suspending the appointment so as to validate the cheque.

Judicial Factor—Curator Bonis—Expenses of opposing appointment.—The Court, in affirming an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills making the appointment of a curator bonis on the ground of mental incapacity, pronounced no order as to expenses. On appeal the House of Lords affirmed the interlocutor on the merits, and found the law-agents who acted for the incapax entitled to their expenses in the House out of the estate. The Court, on a note by the curator bonis, held that the law-agents were also entitled to their expenses in the Court of Session out of the estate.

Judicial Factor—Curator Bonis—Expenses.—Law-agents, who had acted for an alleged incapax in unsuccessfully opposing the appointment of a curator bonis, held not entitled to claim against the estate for expenses incurred in prosecuting an action in a Sheriff Court for delivery of documents belonging to the alleged incapax in the hands of the curator bonis, the action having been raised after the appointment of the curator bonis by the Lord Ordinary, but before the hearing on a reclaiming note.

1ST DIVISION. (SEE ante, A B v. C B, 18 R. 90, and 18 R. (H. L.) 40.

Ld. Wellwood.

On 15th August 1890 the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Kincairney) appointed Mr Harry Cheyne, W.S., to be curator bonis to A B, then an inmate of Saughton Hall Asylum. A B reclaimed, but on 8th November 1890 the First Division adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, No. 67. and on 10th December, pending an appeal by A B to the House of Lords, the Court authorised execution to proceed to the effect of enabling Mr Cheyne to extract his appointment, and act as curator bonis. The Court did not pronounce any order regarding expenses.

Dec. 12, 1891.
Mitchell &
Baxter v.
Cheyne.

Pending these proceedings, on 23d October and 6th December 1890 A B granted two cheques drawn on the Bank of Scotland, with which he had an account, for £300 and £700 respectively, in favour of Messrs Mitchell & Baxter, the law-agents who were acting on his behalf in the curatory proceedings. These cheques the bank declined to honour, except with the authority of Mr Cheyne, as curator bonis, and this authority he declined to give, and accordingly, on 13th January 1891, A B and Messrs Mitchell & Baxter brought an action against the bank and Mr Cheyne as curator bonis for payment of the cheques, alleging that they had been granted to meet the expenses incurred and to be incurred in conducting A B's case in the curatory proceedings.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders the Bank of Scotland having had in their hands funds belonging to A B available for payment of the cheques libelled, the same operated as an assignment of the sums for which they were respectively drawn in favour of the pursuers Mitchell & Baxter, from the time when the cheques were respectively presented to the said bank; and decree for the sums therein, with dues of protest, interest and expenses, ought to be granted as concluded for. (2) The pursuer A B was entitled to oppose the application for the appointment of a curator bonis, and the expense thereby incurred, so far as reasonable and proper, being a legal charge on the estate whether the opposition was successful or not, he was entitled to provide the necessary funds by cheques on his bank account in favour of the solicitors employed to attend to his interests. (3) The said cheques having been granted with full understanding of their meaning and object at a time when A B was free to operate on his bank account, they are valid and binding. (4) As A B is subject to no hallucination or delusion affecting his capacity for business, and has not been found by a jury incapable of managing his affairs, the defences ought to be repelled and decree pronounced in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defender Cheyne pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The statements of the pursuers are not relevant and sufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (3) The pursuers Messrs Mitchell & Baxter, when they obtained the said cheques from A B, being aware that he was incapable of managing his own affairs, and that the matter of the appointment of a curator bonis to him was pending in Court, are barred, personal exceptione, from recovering on said cheques. (4) This defender's appointment as curator bonis having been made by the Court of Session, and extract pending appeal allowed, this action, as a means of recovering the account of expenses alleged to have been incurred by A B to the pursuers Messrs Mitchell & Baxter is incompetent, and ought to be dismissed. (5) The cheques founded on having been granted while the drawer was not of sound mind, are invalid.

The pleas for the bank were substantially to the same effect.

On 24th March 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) sustained the second plea in law for the defenders, and dismissed the action as laid, finding the defenders entitled generally to expenses.*

* "OPINION.—. . . This action is raised by A B 'and Mitchell & Baxter, law-agents and conveyancers in Edinburgh, his solicitors,' to have the defenders the Bank of Scotland and Mr Cheyne ordained to make payment to the pursuers of the two sums of £300 and £700 contained in the said two

No. 67.

Dec. 12, 1891.
 Mitchell &
 Baxter v.
 Cheyne.

The pursuers reclaimed, but on 9th June, before the hearing on the reclaiming note, the curator bonis presented a note for special powers to cheques, together with the expenses of protesting and noting the cheques. The summons does not contain any alternative conclusions for damages, or for payment to Messrs Mitchell & Baxter of money properly and necessarily expended by them for A B. It is framed, no doubt advisedly, on the footing that A B was capable of granting the cheques, and that on presentation they operated as an assignation of the sums contained in them in favour of the holders, Mitchell & Baxter—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, sec. 53.

"It was at first contended for the pursuers that it must be held that A B, not having been cognosced, was and is capable of managing his own affairs, or at least that it must be so held until it is finally decided by the Court of last resort that he is not. It was maintained that it lies upon any person denying his capacity to contract or dispose of his means to prove this in each case before a jury. I am unable to take this view. I am of opinion that although the appointment of a curator bonis is not permanent in this sense, that it falls on the nearest agnate coming forward and claiming the office of tutor, or on the reconvalence of the ward, it has while it lasts the same effect as cognition following on a brieve from Chancery and the verdict of a jury in so far as regards the ward's estate. Now, the effect of cognition is, that, until a declarator of reconvalence is brought, it is conclusive of the incapacity of the lunatic during the period which the verdict covers. It was keenly maintained in the case of Bryce v. Graham, 6 Sh. 428, affd. 3 W. and S. 323, that it was beyond the powers of the Court, without proceeding on the verdict of a jury, to deprive a man of the management of his own affairs, but it was solemnly decided by the House of Lords, after a remit to the Court of Session (the proceedings in which are reported in 6 Sh. 425), that in respect of a practice of above 100 years such appointments are competent. The effect of an appointment by the Court of a curator bonis is, therefore, as regards the estate while it lasts, practically the same as cognition following upon a verdict of a jury—that is to say, the ward is held to be as incapable as a pupil of alone managing his own affairs or disposing of his property.

"I am therefore of opinion that the effect of the judgment of the Court was to establish that at the dates when the cheques were granted A B was incapable of effectually dealing with his means and estate. Therefore the bank and the curator bonis are relieved of the burden which would otherwise have been upon them to prove A B's incapacity by other evidence. Any other view would lead to the result that it would be possible for a person of unsound mind, pending appeal from Court to Court, to dispose of the whole of his estate, and thus defeat the very object of the appointment of a curator bonis.

"In the concluding argument for the pursuers it was strongly urged that at least the pursuers are entitled in this process to prove that the sums sued for were in whole or part properly and necessarily expended for behoof of A B, and that they are entitled to recover such sums, as may have been instructed to have been properly expended, from the curator bonis. If this had been practicable I should have been glad to utilise the action for such a purpose. But the defenders do not consent to this course, and I cannot in the absence of consent adopt it. In the first place, the action is framed upon another footing. A B himself is made the leading pursuer, and the action is laid on the cheque alone. As I have indicated, this shape of action was no doubt intentionally adopted for this reason, that the cheques were not granted exclusively for expenses already incurred, but also in great part for expenses to be incurred in carrying the opposition further; and therefore the action, at least in so far as regards the sum of £700, could not have been laid on the footing of disbursements and expenses already made and incurred on behalf of the ward. There was also perhaps this consideration, that if the cheques are good no question as to the amount expended or required need arise. The bank must pay to the extent of the funds in their hands.

"I therefore feel that I have no alternative but to dismiss the action.

the Junior Lord Ordinary, in which he prayed for authority “(1) to pay the expenses incurred to the said Messrs Mitchell & Baxter, which relate solely to opposing the petition for appointment of curator bonis to the ward before the Lord Ordinary and in the Inner-House, as the same shall be taxed by the Auditor of Court, and to remit to the Auditor to tax the same accordingly; and (2) to make a payment or advance to the said Messrs Mitchell & Baxter on account of expenses incurred or to be incurred in connection with the said appeal to the House of Lords, but on condition that they find caution to repeat such payment or advance in the event of the House of Lords not allowing the expenses of the appeal to form a charge against the ward.” * No. 67.
Dec. 12, 1891.
Mitchell &
Baxter v.
Cheyne.

The curator objected to payment being made out of the estate of expenses incurred by Messrs Mitchell & Baxter in prosecuting an action in the Sheriff Court of Edinburgh against Mrs A B and the curator bonis for delivery of the securities and other documents belonging to A B in their hands. This action was raised on 4th September 1890, and was dismissed by the Sheriff, and an appeal against his interlocutor was dismissed by the First Division on 8th November 1890.

On 25th June 1891 the House of Lords affirmed the interlocutor of the Court of Session appointing the curator bonis, and found Messrs Mitchell & Baxter entitled to their expenses in that House.

Thereafter the reclaiming note and the note for special powers came before the Inner-House together, the Junior Lord Ordinary having reported the note.¹

curator bonis having now been appointed, who is administering the ward's estate, the proper course is to apply to him for repayment of past expenses, and an advance of any further expenses which may be required to prosecute the defence. If he does not think fit to pay at his own hand, or to apply for special powers to the Court, it is open to the pursuers themselves to apply to the Court for special powers or instructions to the curator bonis to repay or advance the necessary funds. I think it right to say that I have little doubt that on proper application being made to the Court the curator bonis will be empowered or ordered to pay out of the ward's funds the proper expenses connected with his opposition to the application for appointment in this Court. An advance to meet the expenses of an appeal to the House of Lords is in a different position; that will be a matter for the equitable consideration of the Court, having regard to the whole circumstances of the case, with which they are familiar. No doubt in disposing of the application they will give due weight to the serious importance of the question to A B, the conflict of medical opinion, and the fact that A B's estate, out of which the expenses must come, is so substantial.”

* The note set forth a report by the Accountant of Court, concluding thus:—“In the circumstances as detailed, the Accountant is of opinion—(1) That authority may be granted to the curator bonis to pay the expenses incurred to Messrs Mitchell & Baxter, W.S., which relate solely to opposing the petition for appointment of curator bonis to the ward before the Lord Ordinary and in the Inner-House, as the same shall be taxed by the Auditor of Court; (2) That authority should not be granted to pay the expenses relating to the endeavour to obtain delivery of the ward's securities, as such expenses ought not to have been incurred while the petition for appointment was undisposed of by the Court; and (3) That payment may be made on account of the expenses incurred, or to be incurred, in connection with the appeal to the House of Lords, but only upon condition,” &c., as in the prayer of the note.

¹ Authority for Curator Bonis.—Bryce v. Graham, 6 S. 428, affd. 3 W. & S. 323.

Authorities for Mitchell & Baxter.—Rhodes v. Rhodes, L. R., 44 Ch. Div. 94; Wentworth v. Tubb, 2 Younge & Collier, Ch. Rep. 537.

No. 67.

Dec. 12, 1891.
Mitchell &
Baxter v.
Cheyne.

LORD PRESIDENT.—We have here to consider certain questions relating to the expenses incurred in proceedings with reference to the appointment of this curator bonis.

I am, in the first place, of opinion that the decision of the House of Lords in dealing with the costs in that House carries with it as a necessary consequence that the expenses of the opposition in this Court are to be dealt with in the same way.

As regards the action on the two cheques, it is important to observe that the first of these cheques is dated after the judgment of the Lord Ordinary making the appointment of the curator bonis, and that the second is dated after the judgment of this Division refusing a reclaiming note against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, while the action was not raised till 13th January 1891, after interim extract of the curator's appointment had been allowed to go out. Now, the question is, whether the expenses incurred in this action were expenses incurred for the benefit of the ward's estate. Mr Smith cited some English cases, but I do not think that they have much bearing on this question, for they related to the case of necessities supplied to the ward. We have here to deal with a much more specific legal problem, as to the effect of taking a document of debt from a person whom the Court have superseded in the management of his affairs. It appears to me that an action founded on such a document is an action which ought never to have been brought. I think it is an action which from the first was doomed to failure, and which consequently could not possibly prove of benefit to the ward's estate. I think, therefore, that Messrs Mitchell & Baxter not only are not entitled to their expenses out of the estate, but must also relieve the estate of the expenses to which they have put it by bringing the action; or, in other words, that they must be found liable in expenses.

In the Sheriff Court action also I am not for allowing any part of the expenses to fall on the estate. That action was raised after the appointment of the curator bonis had been made; and that being so, while it would of course have been quite competent to come to this Court with any question as to the custody of the ward's papers, for the ward and Messrs Mitchell & Baxter to go to the Sheriff Court was practically to assert, contrary to the determination of the Court, that the ward remained dominus of his own affairs.

LORD ADAM.—With reference to the first point, I should have thought that the most proper and convenient time for disposing of the expenses incurred in opposing the curator's appointment in this Court would have been when the whole facts were before the Court. We are told the practice is otherwise, and that this practice was recognised and acted on in the present case, and consequently that there was no finding as to expenses when the appointment was made. That being so, I concur that as the House of Lords thought right to allow the expenses of the opposition in that House, it is a fortiori that the expenses of the opposition here should be allowed.

In the Sheriff Court action expenses cannot be allowed as a charge on the estate. It appears to me that that action was an entirely unnecessary and useless proceeding. If it was thought necessary to regulate the custody of the ward's papers, the proper course would have been to have made a motion in the petition, when the matter would have been at once disposed of.

In the action on the cheques I concur. A more unfounded action I have scarcely ever seen. The pursuers ought to have gone to the curator, and they would then have received payment of their just expenses. They, however, rendered no account to him, but instead, after receiving these cheques, they proceeded to bring this action. I think that there was no hope of their succeeding in the action, and that being so, I think the estate cannot be made liable in the expenses of it.

No. 67.
Dec. 12, 1891.
Mitchell & Baxter v. Cheyna.

LORD M'LAREN.—It must often happen in the case of persons having property to be managed, and afflicted with disease affecting their capacity, that a diversity of opinion exists as to whether it is for their benefit that the management of their affairs should be put into other hands. When a difficulty exists, or the afflicted person has capacity sufficient to give instructions to agents to oppose, it is usual for the Lord Ordinary to make a remit to skilled men of his own selection, instead of merely accepting the formal medical certificates which are lodged with the petition, and in all such cases the claim for the expenses of the opposition would be considered in a liberal and indulgent spirit. But when a judgment has been given by a Court of first instance the presumption is changed, and the right of the agent to have his costs out of the estate will depend on the circumstances of the particular case. Here, as the House of Lords have allowed the expenses of both parties to the appeal to be charged against the estate, it follows that those incurred here must be so allowed. If that had not been so, I might have had doubts whether this action should have gone beyond the Lord Ordinary's Court. On the other two actions I concur with your Lordships.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutors:—

In note for curator:—"Having resumed consideration of the petition and whole process, with the note for the curator bonis, and answers thereto for Messrs Mitchell & Baxter, also report by the Accountant of Court referred to in said note, and the judgment of the House of Lords in the appeal by the ward against the petitioner Mrs D., and heard counsel for the parties, authorise and empower the curator bonis, in terms of said judgment of the House of Lords, to make payment out of the funds of the ward in his hands of the expenses incurred by both parties in respect of said appeal to the House of Lords, as the same shall be certified by the Clerk of Parliaments: Further, authorise and empower the curator bonis to make payment out of said funds of the expenses incurred by Messrs Mitchell & Baxter which relate solely to opposing the petition for the appointment of a curator bonis before the Lord Ordinary and in the Inner-House: Further also approve of the second (2) head of the conclusions of the opinion of the Accountant of Court, dated 2d June 1891, relating to the expenses of the proceedings to obtain delivery of the ward's securities, and decern; remit the accounts of expenses other than the accounts of expenses incurred in respect of the appeal to the House of Lords, to the Auditor to tax and to report."

In the reclaiming note:—"Refuse the reclaiming note, and decern: Find Messrs Mitchell & Baxter liable in expenses generally to both defenders, the Bank of Scotland and Harry Cheyna, the curator bonis, and remit the accounts of expenses to the Auditor to tax and report."

MITCHELL & BAXTER, W.S.—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 68. THE GALLOWAY SALOON STEAM PACKET COMPANY, Pursuers (Reclaimers).

—D.-F. Balfour—Salvesen.

Dec. 12, 1891.
The Galloway
Saloon Steam
Packet Co. v.
Wallace.

ANDREW WALLACE, Defender (Respondent).—Lord-Adv. Pearson—Dickson.

Company—Directors' qualification—Register—Beneficial interest—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89).—In an action by a company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862-86, against a shareholder for payment of a call, the defender pleaded that the call had not been validly made, on the ground that the directors who made the call had not the requisite qualification, in respect that their shares, although registered in their own names, were truly held in trust for another. Held that the defence was irrelevant, inasmuch as the directors were ex facie of the register the holders of the shares, and must be held entitled to all the privileges of shareholders, as they were liable to all the obligations.

Company—Directors' qualification—Articles of association—Construction—"Ostensible holder."—The 6th article of association of a company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862-86, provided that any two of the directors should be a quorum, and that any member holding ten shares should be eligible as a director. The 4th article provided that "in case any share or interest in this concern shall be held in the name of a company or firm, only one individual partner of that company shall be entitled to attend and vote at the general meetings, and to give proxy, . . . whose name shall be entered in the books of the company as the ostensible holder."

Held that the 4th article did not apply to the case of persons registered as individual shareholders, although they held in trust for a company.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Wellwood.

THE GALLOWAY SALOON STEAM PACKET COMPANY was, upon 8th June 1886, registered under the Companies Acts, 1862-86, as an unlimited company, with a nominal capital finally fixed at £44,000, in shares of £10 each. The number of shares issued was 4316, and £6, 17s. 6d. was paid on each of them.

Upon 7th July 1891 the directors of the company, at a meeting attended by two (being a quorum*) of their number, Messrs Aitken and Jordan, resolved to make a call upon the shareholders of £1 each, payable upon 1st August.

Andrew Wallace, solicitor, Leith, who held 804 shares, and was a director of the company, declined to pay the call, and the company on 21st August raised an action to enforce payment of the amount payable by him upon his shares.

The defender averred, and the pursuers admitted, that the two directors who made the call were registered in 1891, Mr Aitken as holder of 40 shares and Mr Jordan as holder of 100 shares.

The defender further averred,—(Stat. 14) "The defender has recently learned . . . that none of those claiming to be directors, with the exception of the defender, are qualified to be directors. The whole shares standing in the said other directors' names truly belong to the said North British Packet Company or the North British Railway Company, and the said so-called directors have no beneficial interest therein, and are merely the nominees of the said North British Packet Company or the said North British Railway Company. The shares belonging to the said North British

* The 6th article of association of the company was as follows:—"The business of the company shall, as aforesaid, be conducted under the superintendence of the directors before named, any two of whom shall be a quorum, and thereafter of the directors who shall be named and elected by the company as hereinafter directed at the aforesaid stated general meetings, to be held annually on the last Monday of November, and every member holding ten shares of the stock of the company shall be eligible and may be elected a director. . . ."

Packet Company or the said North British Railway Company are registered in separate names in order to enable the said companies to evade the provisions of article 4* of the Galloway Company's articles of association, so as to allow them to control the management and administration of the latter company. The North British Railway Company has put forward the North British Packet Company as nominal holders of said shares, because the North British Railway Company is not entitled to hold such shares. The North British Packet Company is entirely composed of partners who are shareholders in and nominated by the North British Railway Company, and the whole capital of said Packet Company is found and contributed by the North British Railway Company."

No. 68.

Dec. 12, 1891.
The Galloway
Saloon Steam
Packet Co. v.
Wallace.

The pursuers denied that there was any evasion of article 4, or that the directors were not qualified to act.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defender, in respect of the shares held by him and of the call thereon, is liable to the pursuers in the sum concluded for. (2) The defences are irrelevant, and should be repelled.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The call in question not having been validly made, the defender should be assoilzied. (3) The directors who claim to have made the said call not being qualified to act as directors or to make the call, the defender should be assoilzied. (4) The pursuers' material averments being unfounded in fact, the defender should be assoilzied.

On 24th November the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood), before answer, allowed the defender a proof of his averments in his statement of facts so far as not admitted, and to the pursuers a conjunct probation.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The defences were irrelevant. They contained no relevant allegations of any such disqualification of the directors as could invalidate the call. In the first place, the directors who made it were duly elected to the office, and each of them was admittedly entered on the register as the holder of more than ten shares. Being thus registered they must according to the 23d section of the Act of 1862 be deemed "members of the company" holding more than ten shares each, and they were thus duly qualified to act as directors under the 6th article of association. It was irrelevant to inquire whether they were beneficial owners of these shares or not. The register was conclusive on the matter, and it was incompetent to look behind it.¹ Being

* The 4th article of association was as follows:—"A general meeting of the partners shall be held upon the last Monday in November 1886, and a general meeting shall also be held upon the last Monday of November every year thereafter during the subsistence of this copartnery, for the purpose of electing directors as after mentioned, and for considering and adopting such measures as may be submitted to them tending to promote the welfare and prosperity of the company. At all general meetings the members shall have a right to vote in person or by proxy, such proxy being always a member of the company, and empowered by a proper mandate holograph of the granter, or duly attested according to the rules of the law of Scotland; and the votes of the members at said meetings shall be counted and valued not per capita, but according to the number of shares held by each voter respectively, and a majority in point of value shall decide and determine every matter or question. In case any share or interest in this concern shall be held in the name of a company or firm, only one individual partner of that company shall be entitled to attend and vote at the general meetings, and to give proxy as aforesaid, whose name shall be entered in the books of the company as the ostensible holder, and no trustee on the bankrupt estate of a partner shall be entitled as such to attend any meetings or to vote by proxy at the same."

¹ Pulbrook v. Richmond Consolidated Mining Co., 1878, L. R., 9 Ch. Div. 610; Bainbridge v. Smith, 1889, L. R., 41 Ch. Div. 482; Muir et al. v. City of Glasgow Bank, Dec. 20, 1878, 6 R. 392.

No. 68.

Dec. 12, 1891.
The Galloway
Saloon Steam
Packet Co. v.
Wallace.

then registered individually, they were liable for all the obligations of a shareholder, and in equity must also be entitled to all the privileges arising from the fact of being a registered shareholder. In the second place, it was said that both the directors were holders of the shares in trust for a company, who were the real holders, and that under the 4th article of association only one could vote for the company, and that having regard to the 6th article the call made by the other director was bad, as it required two directors to make a quorum. Now, on this point the defender had attempted to shew that a limited company like the railway company could not have been registered as a shareholder in an unlimited company like the Galloway Packet Company. That, however, was quite erroneous. As long as the memorandum and articles of the latter company did not forbid it, there was no legal impediment in the matter. While in Muir's case it was established that trustees could not become shareholders "as trustees," so as to limit their liability to the trust-estate, the opinion of the Court proceeded on the footing that if it could have been shewn that in Scots law the trustees were a corporation, the result would have been different. The limited company in the present case was not a partnership at common law, but a corporation whose stock was divided into shares legally vendible in the market, and duly registered under the Companies Acts. The clause relied on in article 4 by the defender had nothing to do with a director's qualification. It did not mean that a company must name an "ostensible holder" to be registered as owner, but merely one to vote at general meetings, just as in private trusts one trustee was frequently nominated to represent the trust.

Argued for the defender;—He was entitled to a proof of his averments, which were that the directors who made the call were not qualified to do so. Both of them were nominees of and held in trust for the railway company, who were the real holders of the shares, and the purpose of this was to get behind the stipulation in the 4th article of association. Under that article the railway company were only entitled (if entitled to be registered in this company at all) to be represented by a single nominee, and under the 6th article two directors were required to make a quorum. Now, to begin with, it was anomalous that an unlimited company could ever come to consist of one or more companies limited by shares. Certainly there was no direct authority for the proposition. But assuming that the railway company could be registered as a holder of shares, one person had to be put on the register as its nominee, and he was the "ostensible owner" of the shares in the sense of article 4. No doubt a private individual could hold a number of shares in a company, and divide them among a number of his friends, so as to increase his voting power without the assignees having any beneficial interest in the shares, but the 4th article of association had guarded against a company acquiring shares and doing the same thing.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The pursuers' company is registered under the Companies Acts as an unlimited company, and the defender is a member thereof and holder of 804 shares. At a meeting of the directors of the company held on 7th July last, at which two and a quorum of directors were present, a call was made on the capital of the company of £1 per share. Under that call the defender became liable for the sum of £804 in respect of the shares held by him but as he refused to pay the same this action has been brought against him to enforce payment. The defender has stated in defence some objection to the validity of the call, but the only objection now maintained is that the call is

No. 68.

